Every State under the Constitution has the right to make silver as well as gold a legal tender. They are equal in the eye of the Constitution. Yet if a State should pass a law making silver a legal tender the General Government says no, that it has the sovereign power of coinage and it will not coin silver; that it has the power of regulating the value of coins, and it will exercise the power to exclude foreign coins; and thus it sweeps away one of the most vital rights of the States and the people. In this way it cuts off one of the financial arms of the States. It is a financial mayhem of the States, leaving them with one arm instead of two to fight against the encroachments of monopolies and taxation. This demonstrates the fact that the money power is outgrowing all the restraints of the Constitution; it pushes through them like Job's behemoth through the snares. The act of February 12, 1873, demonetized the silver dollar, and the amendment of the House proposed to restore it. The Constitution, justice, equity, and honor say let the ancient coin be restored.

There is another outrage which has been perpetrated upon the people, but I have not time to enlarge upon it. It will be remembered that on the adoption of the Federal Constitution we had no American coin. It was all foreign, and the Spanish milled silver dollar was constituted by statute the unit of value of this country. Will any gentleman or Representative here be kind enough to point out any statute where there is any other unit of value fixed by law? It is nowhere to be found. Yet, in despite of all that, you have demonetized the old coin which formed your unit of value and which enabled this Government first to inaugurate its system of commerce and discharge its debts.

Not only so, Mr. Speaker, but there is another thought which I wish to lay before this honorable body, and the device which is meditated is no shallow one. This body must understand that there is a European project now on foot, in which a certain party in the United States sympathize, that is to reach an international unification of the value and standard of coin; and it is to make the gold coin the standard of value, and to demonetize silver. Suppose that England, Germany, and the United States succeed in the scheme of inducing the nations to demonetize silver, what would be the result?

Our Director of the Mint in his report for 1874, speaking of gold and silver, said:

The world's stock of precious metals is generally estimated at from ten to twelve thousand million dollars, nearly equally divided as to the two metals.

The silver coin being destroyed, it would leave the world's stock of gold coin about five or six thousand millions. This would appreciate the value of gold twofold by making it scarce and increasing the demand for it. The Government of the United States and the States and our corporations being largely indebted to England and Germany, would find the burden of their debt doubled, because those, with other European nations, could not spare the gold to come and remain in the United States. Such a project, if successful, would make the rich richer and the poor poorer. It would deprive our people of one of the means of paying their debts—all the contracts, public and private, being payable in gold or silver. This would be a folly only equaled by its injustice.

The people will not always remain in ignorance of the frauds which have been perpetrated against them. In due time they will administer the proper retribution.

But my time will not permit me to extend my remarks further. I will close by appending to my remarks an instructive and valuable article from the Cincinnati Commercial of July 8, 1876.

THE FINANCES OF FRANCE AND GERMANY.

During the disappearance of the precious metals from circulation in this country, the old double standard was abolished by indirection. Of course this was not done accidentally, but systematically and in the interest of the holders of securities, with the purpose of increasing the weight of debts, public and private. The main money question before the people of the United States is, whether the double standard shall be restored. We want resumption of specie payments, but we demand that it shall be upon the old specie basis. Our debts were made when there were two money metals. We do not propose to impose on the people resumption in one metal.

The debts up to 1873 were payable in coin of "gold and silver." We propose that they shall be paid in "gold and silver." That's fair, isn't it? Those who are in favor of an exclusive gold standard use the example of England. We have referred to the greater prosperity of France under her double standard, and the existence of that standard in France has been disputed. We have obtained exact information on this subject, and submit it in the form in which it was received:

CINCINNATI, July 7, 1876.

The Editor of the Commercial:

Some few weeks ago you expressed a wish that I would ascertain and give you the exact status of silver in our sister-republic of France. In compliance therewith I wrote to Paris and have this day received the following reply.

Yours, respectfully,

JAMES GILMORE.

PARIS, June 23, 1876.

SIR: We can reply as follows to the several inquiries conveyed by your letter of the 2d instant.

The five-franc piece is an unlimited legal tender, and may, therefore, be employed to any extent for payments; the smaller silver coins are of inferior fineness, and acceptance of the same cannot be enforced beyond an amount of fifty francs per each payment.

The Bank of France issues no more five-franc notes and destroys those which return to the bank in course of circulation.

The bank has at present on hand 581,278,000 francs in silver coin and bullion, 1,468,340,000 francs in gold coin and bullion.

In March, 1875, the bank held 495,000,000 francs in silver and 1,325,000,000 francs in gold, which shows that the respective increases of the silver and gold paid in have taken place in proportions which do not differ so widely as might be anticipated from the great abundance of silver.

From our previous remarks on five-franc pieces, it follows that, in case the bank resumed specie payments, these could be legally effected in silver coin, using the pieces inferior to five francs to the maximum extent of fifty francs per payment.

We will add, for your guidance, that one-fourth-franc pieces have been withdrawn from circulation, and are replaced by twenty-centime pieces.

The commercial value of gold and of silver is as follows, namely: silver of 1000-1000 fineness, 218·89 francs per kilogram; gold of 1000-1000 fineness, 3434.44 francs per kilogram. The kilogram is equivalent to 32.1543 ounces.

It is on the above basis that silver and gold are quoted, with so much per cent. loss or premium.

The mint receives, however, these two metals on the following footing: Gold, 3437 francs per kilogram; silver, 220.56 francs per kilogram.

In consequence of the international treaties, the mint, being provided with silver for its coinage till December, 1878, does not, for the present, receive any more of this metal.

Subjoined you have the weekly condensed report of the Bank of France, which was published yesterday.

Yours, truly,

MARCUARD, ANDRÉ & CO.

France has done well to adhere to her bimetallic money. The financial depression and disturbances in Germany are to be largely attributed to the action of the imperial government looking to demonetizing silver. Germany attempted to adopt the gold standard upon receiving the indemnity of France, and has thereby placed herself in great difficulties. She is attempting to rid herself of the people's money—silver—to the extent of 200,000,000 thalers. M. Henri Cernuschi, author of Mécanique de l'échange, in a pamphlet on Bimetallic Money, describes the troublesome task upon which Germany has entered, as follows:

"Where can all this silver be sent to or what can be done with it? Up to the present England and the United States admit only gold as a legal tender. Consequently, these countries cannot absorb the silver furnished by the German thalers. France, Italy, Belgium, Switzerland—that is to say, the Latin union—though admitting the bimetallic régime, have coalesced to prevent the Germans coming to their mints to have their thalers turned into pieces of five francs; and to this end they have by common agreement suspended their ancient free coinage of silver. Austria and Russia are condemned to a chronic state of paper currency; they cannot think of acquiring the silver of Germany. There remain China and India. In these countries gold is not employed, as their payments are made in silver. But they have neither heavy credits on Germany nor the rest of Europe, and are therefore not in a position to send thither large sums. One can hardly imagine a cause for a great exportation of silver from Berlin to Pekin short of the hypothesis of a decisive battle being lost by the Germans in fighting against the Chinese, and the latter having imposed a heavy indemnity on the former.

"Moreover, we should bear in mind that if it is hard to find an outlet for demonetized silver, the purchase of the gold to replace it is no less difficult.

"London, the chief mart of precious metals, can only furnish Australian and Californian gold according to the supplies received thence. Were the usual stock, of which the English themselves stand in absolute need, trenched upon, the result would be a terrible crisis in the British market, which would immediately re-act upon all the rest of Europe, bringing with it ruin and disaster.

"It is scarcely necessary to point out the gigantic losses Germany would, before causing this disastrous crisis, entail upon herself should she continue to offer heavy sums of silver and to demand heavy sums of gold. The silver so offered would be more and more depreciated, and the price of gold would rise in a converse ratio, entailing a loss of millions to the German treasury.

"The ministry of the empire have foreseen these difficulties. To meet them they inserted in the decree, ruling that from January 1, 1876, all payments shall be made neither in florins nor thalers, but exclusively in marcs, a restrictive clause, to maintain in circulation the thalers, which are to be counted as gold, and to be each held as equivalent to three marcs.

"We see from this that the imperial government wishes to secure itself time, and hopes to demonetize slowly. But a slow demonetization is not without serious drawbacks, since it determines the exportation of gold. Here are the reasons why it does so:

"Since demonetization has begun silver, which is constantly offered to foreign markets, goes on falling in price, while at home the value of the thaler, this coin being a legal tender under the restrictive clause above mentioned, and appraised at three golden marcs, is not depreciated. Bankers, therefore, when they have payments to make abroad are careful not to transmit thalers. They send gold marcs, reserving their thalers for home payments. Government buys back the gold in foreign markets, and the bankers go on exporting it. The Treasury thus undertakes to weave a Penelope's web without any Ulysses in the distance. Already 20,000,000 of marcs have been sent abroad, the sixth part of all that has been coined. To sum up, Germany has judged prudent not to demonetize rapidly, while the success of a slow demonetization appears highly doubtful."

Discussing the remedies for the disordered finances of Germany, the same writer says:

"Germany is not committed to the monometallic system to the extent of being unable, without a great effort, to abandon it. On the contrary, she has never so closely approached a bimetallic régime, which in point of fact she already legally, though provisionally, possesses. In order that bimetallism become permanent and absolute, it would suffice for her government to ordain, firstly, that the coinage of gold and silver in the public mint shall be open to every one; secondly, that the weight of a silver marc shall be equal to one-third the weight of a thaler; thirdly, that pieces of four or five silver marcs shall be struck in order to make rouleaux of one hundred marcs, which cannot be done with the existing coins of three marcs—the thalers; fourthly, that no more thalers shall be struck, and the existing ones hereafter melted down and transformed into pieces of four or five marcs; fifthly, that there shall not be under the value of two marcs any more coins of low standard, and that those of five marcs, the coinage of which has begun, shall eventually be called in.

"It is obvious that the application of a law to this effect would not meet with any difficulty, and it would be attended with important advantages. The German government would be relieved of its monetary cares; it would be no longer obliged to seek issues which do not exist for its silver; it would not be obliged to demand more gold than can possibly be supplied; it would avoid the losses ensuing by the continued fall of silver, and purchase of gold, which goes on rising; it would cease to fear the exportation of golden marcs; and finally, satisfied with having in the whole empire a single denominational unity, the marc, it would leave the Germans free to make use at will of gold or silver money, as was always practiced in the states of the Latin Union up to 1874.

"The coalition formed between France, Italy, Belgium, and Switzerland to resist the monetary enterprises of Germany would be at once dissolved. The monetization of silver would be free in these countries, and there would be an end to a monetary war without precedent and without end, which is as contrary to scientific principles as to the interests of the States by whom it is waged. The English market, and with it the continental markets, would escape from the crisis which is inevitable if the German government persists in demanding more gold than can be furnished.

"Is there an economist, banker, or statesman who can deny the reality and the importance of the advantages we have just enumerated?"

The people of the United States are in the humiliating position of having had the double standard abolished in the dark by the gold ring; that is to say, the people here have been deprived of one of the precious metals, and they are expected to submit, because the metal in which they have had their rights stolen from them is cheap.

We think we can trust the intelligence of the people to resist this oppression. They can obtain valuable lessons pertinent to the case in studying the prosperity of France under the double standard and the depression in Germany resulting from the attempted demonetization of silver. The people of the United States never had the great question of abolishing silver money referred to them. They were deprived of their rights in silver by a juggling coinage regulation, and those who are urging the continuance of the exclusive gold standard must be of the impression that the people do not know their rights or dare not assert them.

Mr. COX. I do not propose to discuss this bill with reference to the proposition rejected in the conference. That proposition spreads over a large and open sea of tempestuous discussion. It might well engage our continuous attention for a week. It involves not merely the demonetization, but the remonetization of silver, and all the business relations of the whole people.

I know perfectly well what the Constitution says in relation to gold and silver both in the eighth section of the first article wherein Congress has the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, and in the tenth section of the same article where it is declared that no State shall make anything but gold and silver coin a legal tender. These constitutional clauses are sacred, and nothing in this bill derogates from them.

I cannot now enter upon that question. It bears me away from the conference report. Silver should not be demonetized. No vote of mine shall tend that way. This bill does not thus tend.

I agree with the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] that legally, and I will go further, and say morally, silver is a part of the coin of this realm and should be so utilized. This report proposes to use it properly.

But, sir, the precise question before the House now is one concerning convenience; it is temporary; it is not constitutional or economical in a large sense. This report is not amendable. You have to vote ay or no upon it. If you vote for it, you facilitate the issue of subsidiary silver coin, so as to accommodate the people between now and our next session of Congress. You fill the vacuum caused by the displacement of the fractional currency. You help the people in their need and distress for "change." If you vote it down, I suppose I speak with parliamentary propriety when I say that there is no hope of such relief at this session either in this body or the other.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to come back to the proposition before the House. You all remember the first bill introduced here for the issue and fair distribution of the $10,000,000 of silver coin in exchange for an equal amount of legal-tender notes, or really for so much fractional currency in the final result. That first bill, reported from the committee of which I am chairman, was intended to open new sluices for the fluent circulation of those $10,000,000. That was the simple original bill, intended only to give facility to a prompt and fair distribution. The various amendments made since are in fact each and all irrelevant to that bill, which had one object and only one. To that bill the Senate made an amendment, striking out the word "now," which was well enough. Then they added the third section of another silver bill which we passed. It had reference to the trade-dollar, and was intended for good reasons to impair its value or demonetize it to a certain extent for certain purposes on the Pacific. That was the bill as the Senate sent it back to the House. Then on this bill thus amended by the Senate the House fixed the whole bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania as to the issue of the twenty millions of silver coin minted out of bullion to be bought in the market on certain conditions and limitations.

Now, sir, I desire to say that a better bill than either that for twenty millions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or than the original ten-million-dollar bill to which the House attached the twenty-million bill, might be enacted with advantage. I refer to the bill introduced by the gentleman who represents the Saint Louis district in Missouri, [Mr. WELLS.]

This bill of the gentleman from Missouri authorizes—and I beg the attention of the House to it, for I believe it would be most acceptable when this matter shall properly come up—it authorizes any owner of silver bullion to deposit the same at the assay office in New York, or at any coinage mint, and to receive in payment therefor subsidiary silver coin at a rate of price per standard ounce to be fixed and announced from time to time by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. It provides that the cost of the coinage shall devolve on the seller of the bullion, and the profit or seigniorage arising therefrom shall accrue to the Government. So that if that bill were a law the Treasury would not have to go out and spend its money on hand to buy the bullion in the market; but every man in the country who owned bullion and deposited it in the assay offices or mints should there have it coined, the Government paying nothing for the bullion and receiving pay for the coinage. That seems to be the most sensible bill which has been introduced in connection with this subject. But it is not now before the House. I hope it may be considered, however, when we consider more comprehensively how best to monetize silver.

The simple question is shall we now, in pursuing the idea of making the old silver dollar a legal tender, the discussion of which has been raised by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANDERS,] lose the whole benefit of the ten-million and the twenty-million bill which have been so carefully considered by both Houses, and so sedulously guarded by proper provisions.

I might agree with all that was said by the gentleman from Indiana. I agree that even the bonds should be paid in silver as well as in gold. I will not stop to argue the proposition that silver being now 20 per cent. below gold and 10 per cent. below greenbacks, that it is a good time for one class and not for another. I will not stop to argue the relation between the debtor and the creditor class in this connection. These matters might all be pertinent, and in my judgment the points seem well taken. But the question now is, shall we forego passing this bill for silver change; the ten millions and the twenty millions; or lose the measure as matured and the consequent benefit of it to the people, because we do not by this report reach a larger relief?

That, sir, is all that I intended to say at this time.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York one question.

Mr. COX. Very well.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Can we not appoint another conference committee, should this report not be concurred in?

Mr. COX. I should think from the indications I have seen, without referring to the Senate or saying anything that would be irregular, that such a committee would be utterly fruitless of result. We would gain nothing by it.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. That is not the question; can we not do it?

Mr. COX. I suppose you could raise another conference by some management here. I proposed to yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] but he is not in the Hall, and therefore I will yield five minutes to his colleague, [Mr. TOWNSEND.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I rise to support the report of the conference committee. I think it is a report that ought to be accepted by this House, and I am sure that it will commend itself to the sound judgment of all the people of the country.

I shall address myself chiefly to that portion of the report which has reference to what is called the Landers amendment, making the silver dollar of 1861 a legal tender for all debts, public and private; and I want to say that I agree with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDERS] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FORT,] in the hope and desire that the national bonds of which they have spoken shall be paid according to the original meaning and intent of the contract.

Mr. LAWRENCE. What is that?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Ohio inquires what was the original meaning and intent of the contract? We have to gather it from the circumstances surrounding the offer and taking of the loan itself when first made. We have to look to what the Government did; and when we examine its acts we find them in the promises and action of the agents of the Government who had charge of the negotiation of our great loan. The negotiation of a loan of over $1,000,000,000 was intrusted to a single house. The house of Jay Cooke & Co. were the sole parties authorized to negotiate the loan; they were authorized to go into the market and obtain it; they were the recognized and responsible agents of the Government. They went into the market; they distributed their circulars all over the country and they assured every man and every woman who could scrape together $50 or more that these bonds which they were selling to the people were payable principal and interest in gold. There was no time during the whole negotiation of the loan when some of these circulars dated in 1863 and distributed by their subagents were not to be found in every hamlet, every village, and every city on the continent, without objection from the Treasury Department; and in these circulars thus sent forth in reply to the inquiry "Will the face of the bonds be paid in gold when due?" Jay Cooke & Co., the accredited agents of the Government, with the sanction of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the sanction of Congress, (for there was no expression of opinion or action by the Secretary or Congress to the contrary,) said: "These bonds are called five twenties because, while they are twenty-year bonds, they may be redeemed by the Government in gold at any time after five years."

Again, in answer to another inquiry, they say that "Congress has provided that these bonds shall be paid in gold when due." And again they say in the postscript: "Those who neglect these 6 per cent. bonds, the interest and principal of which they will get in gold, may have occasion to regret it." I submit as a part of my remarks the entire circular. It was an original circular emanating from their house, hundreds of thousands of which were circulated throughout the country to induce people to invest in the national loan. It reads as follows:

——, BERKS COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA, March 20, 1863.

JAY COOKE, Esq.,
United States Loan Agent, 114 South Third Street, Philadelphia.

DEAR SIR: I see by our papers that you are selling for the Government a new loan called five-twenties. I expect to have shortly a few thousand dollars to spare, and as I have made up my mind that the Government loans are safe and good, and that it is my duty and interest at this time to put my money into them in preference over any other loans or stocks, I write to get information of you as follows:

First. Why are they called five-twenties?

Second. Do you take country money or only legal tender notes, or will a check on Philadelphia or New York answer for subscriptions?

Third. Do you sell the bonds at par?

Fourth. As I cannot come to Philadelphia, how am I to get the bonds?

Fifth. What interest do they pay, and how and where and when is it paid, and is it paid in gold or legal-tenders?

Sixth. How does Secretary Chase get enough gold to pay his interest?

Seventh. Will the face of the bonds be paid in gold when due?

Eighth. Can I have the bonds payable to bearer with coupons or registered and payable to my order?

Ninth. What sizes are the bonds?

Tenth. Will I have to pay the same tax on them as I now pay on my railroad or other bonds?

Eleventh. What is the present debt of the Government, and what amount is it likely to reach if the rebellion should last a year or two longer?

Twelfth. Will Secretary Chase get enough from custom-house duties and internal revenue, income taxes, &c., to make it certain that he can pay the interest punctually?

I have no doubt that a good many of my neighbors would like to take these bonds, and if you will answer my questions I will show the letter to them.

Very respectfully,

S. M. F.

OFFICE OF JAY COOKE, SUBSCRIPTION AGENT, AT OFFICE OF JAY COOKE & CO., BANKERS, 114 SOUTH THIRD STREET, Philadelphia, March 23, 1863.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 20th instant is received, and I will cheerfully give you the information desired by answering your questions in due order.

First. These bonds are called five-twenties because, while they are twenty-year bonds, they may be redeemed by the Government in gold at any time after five years. Many people suppose that the interest is only 5.20 per cent.; this is a mistake: they pay 6 per cent. interest.

Second. Legal-tender notes, or checks upon Philadelphia or New York that will bring legal tenders, are what the Secretary allows me to receive; no doubt your nearest bank will give you a check or legal tenders for your country funds.

Third. The bonds are sold at par, the interest to commence the day you pay the money.

Fourth. I have made arrangements with your nearest bank or banker, who will generally have the bonds on hand. If not, you can send the money to me by express, and I will send back the bonds free of cost.

Fifth. The bonds pay 6 per cent. interest in gold, 3 per cent. every six months, on the 1st day of May and November, at the Mint in Philadelphia or at any subtreasury in New York or elsewhere. If you have coupon bonds, all you have to do is to cut the proper coupon off each six months and collect it yourself or give it to your bank for collection; if you have registered bonds, you can give your bank a power of attorney to collect the interest for you.

Sixth. The duties on imports of all articles from abroad must be paid in gold, and this is the way Secretary Chase gets his gold; it is now being paid into the Treasury at the rate of $200,000 each day, which is twice as much as he needs to pay the interest in gold.

Seventh. Congress has provided that the bonds shall be paid in gold when due.

Eighth. You can have either coupon bonds, payable to the bearer, or registered bonds, payable to your order.

Ninth. The former are in fifties, one-hundreds, five-hundreds, and one-thousands; the latter in same amounts, also five-thousands, and ten-thousands.

Tenth. No! You will not have to pay any taxes on these bonds if your income from them does not exceed $600, and on all above $600 you will only have to pay one-half as much income tax as if your money was invested in mortgages or other securities. I consider the Government bonds as first of all; all other bonds are taxed ½ per cent. to pay the interest on the Government bonds, and the Supreme Court of the United States has just decided that no State, or city, or county can tax Government bonds.

Eleventh. The present bonded debt of the United States is less than three hundred millions, including the 7 3-10 Treasury notes; but the Government owes enough more in the shape of legal-tenders, deposits in the sub-treasuries, certificates of indebtedness, &c., to increase the debt to about eight or nine hundred millions. Secretary Chase has calculated that the debt may reach one thousand seven hundred millions if the rebellion lasts eighteen months longer. It is, however, believed now that it will not last six months longer; but even if it does, our national debt will be small compared with that of Great Britain or France, while our resources are vastly greater.

Twelfth. I have no doubt that the revenue will not only be ample to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government and all interest on the debt, but leave at least one hundred millions annually toward paying off the debt, and that the Government will be able to get out of debt again, as it has twice before, in a few years after the close of the war.

I hope that all who have idle money will at once purchase these five-twenty year bonds. The right to demand them for legal-tenders will end on the 1st day of July, 1863, as per the following authorized notice:

SPECIAL NOTICE.

On and after July 1, 1863, the privilege of converting the present issue of legal-tender notes into the national 6 per cent. loan (commonly called five-twenties) will cease.

All who wish to invest in the five-twenty loan must, therefore, apply before the 1st of July next.

JAY COOKE,
Subscription Agent,
114 South Third Street, Philadelphia.

Those who neglect these 6 per cent. bonds, the interest and principal of which they will get in gold, may have occasion to regret it.

I am, very truly, your friend,

JAY COOKE,
Subscription Agent, at office of Jay Cooke & Co.,
114 South Third Street, Philadelphia.

* * * * * * * *

Mr. KELLEY. By whom?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. By Jay Cooke & Co., as I said before, the recognized agents of the Government, by whose acts, recognized by the Government and Congress, we are morally if not legally bound.

Now, the objection that is made by the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Illinois is that these bonds were purchased at 40 per cent. on the dollar. How were they purchased? They were purchased from the Government with the money issued by the Government, with its legal-tenders, which it had let fall from the one hundred cents which it got for them to a depreciation of forty cents on the dollar, and with which, as it appears by the circular, it invited the people to invest in the bonds. The Government had no right to complain, and no one now has a right to complain that the Government issued bonds at a hundred cents on the dollar and took in payment its own notes, which it let fall to the depreciation of forty cents on the dollar, whereby the people who held the notes were the sufferers. It only put those persons in a proper position who were suffering from its own inability to keep its paper promises at par. The people had suffered that depreciation and they were entitled to have that depreciation and loss made good to them, and the best the Government could do was to give its bonds, payable at a distant day, for its depreciated legal-tenders.

Now, sir, I say that that was right and proper and according to the idea held out by the accredited agent of the Government, which was afterward followed up by the declarations, if I remember right, of Secretaries Fessenden and Chase, that the bonds were payable in gold. That a party or a government is bound by the recognized acts of its agents is a well-known principle both of morals and of law. A doubt, however, was started whether from the wording of the bonds they were payable in gold, and on March 18, 1869, by the first act of General Grant's administration, which was entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," and which was intended to settle that doubt and silence cavilers, it was declared that—

> The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest known as United States notes, and of all interest-bearing obligations of the United States except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver.

This was a declaratory act, and was an express recognition of the promise that the Government agents had made, that the bonds should be paid principal and interest in gold.

But gentlemen say that the word "coin" is used in the act, and not the word "gold." To know what was intended by the word "coin" we must look at the condition of the metallic currency at that day.

The subsidiary coins were not a legal tender beyond $5, and consequently it did not mean that depreciated currency.

The silver dollars were evidently not in the contemplation of Congress, for only $4,709,490 in silver dollars had been coined from the foundation of the Government to the year 1869. Only $1,000 in silver dollars had been coined between 1805 and 1839. They formed no part of the circulation; practically they had become obsolete, and not one payment in ten thousand was made in the silver dollar, and probably not $200,000 were then in the United States. The halves and quarters of the old standard were not contemplated, for they did not form one-tenth part of the coinage of the country, there having been coined of such only $68,679,507 up to 1853, when the new coinage was only made a tender up to $5. The greater part of both had been exported in settlement of balances due foreign nations. The only coin then thought of was the gold coin, of which up to 1869 there had been coined at our mints the sum of $695,891,622. Gold was the only coin in circulation for the payment of large debts up to the opening of the war. No one thought of anything else, no one paid in anything else who by law was required to pay in coin, for it was the easiest to obtain. And when the act of 1869 was passed the only recollection of Congressmen of coin was gold coin, for silver had only been used for change, and gold had been the means or medium for the payment of large obligations.

I repeat it, then, that the word coin in the act of 1869 was intended to mean gold coin alone, for it was the only or uppermost idea in the minds of all when it was uttered, especially as silver coin, except for the minor transactions, had passed out of sight and out of mind; in fact, almost all the silver coins but the overvalued subsidiary coins had left the country, and it is most likely that none of the men who passed the law had ever seen a silver American dollar.

Not to accept this report but to allow the proviso or amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDERS] to prevail would be to allow the solemn obligations of the Government to be paid off in coin worth less than eighty cents in the dollar, and give such a shock to our credit as would disgrace us in the eyes of the civilized world and depress our bonded obligations 20 per cent. in value. It would, besides, drive every gold coin out of the country within an incredibly short space of time. Within a week British standard silver has sold in the market at fifty-four pence sterling per ounce, equal in our currency to 92.726 cents. This makes the value of two silver half dollars weighing 385.8 grains, 74.53 cents; the value of the old silver dollar of 412.5 grains, 79.70 cents; and the value of the trade-dollar of 420 grains, 81.134 cents.

Gold is at 112 premium, making the legal-tender paper dollar worth 89.29 cents. Thus it is proposed to pay our obligations with silver dollars 20 3-10 per cent. below par, and worth nearly ten cents less than the paper dollar. This would be partial repudiation. Nay, more, it would be an imposition on the masses of the people, requiring the laborer to take less for his wages, the farmer to take less for his wheat and corn, the mechanic to take less for his work than he had contracted to receive. It would also add to the price of every commodity that should be bought with such currency.

This depreciation in the price of silver has been effected by many causes. The demonetization of silver by European countries, the great supply of the American mines, the falling off of the demand in India have all tended to this depreciation and greatly disturbed the proportionate values of gold and silver, which had ranged at 15½ or 16 to 1.

The weight of the gold dollar is 25.8 grains and the weight of the old silver dollar is 412.5 grains. If three more grains were added to the silver dollar the proportion would be exactly as 16 to 1. At the present price of silver, however, the gold dollar is to the old silver dollar as 20.7 to 1, and the gold dollar is to the subsidiary silver (two half dollars) as 21.4 to 1. And all this difference in the proportions between the two metals has taken place within a very short space of time.

It is said, however, that gold has appreciated, and that silver has not depreciated to the extent I have named. It may be true that gold may have slightly appreciated since the demonetization of silver by Germany and the Scandinavian countries, but there is no certain evidence that such is the case. A small advance may have taken place in the controversy between France and Germany to obtain sufficient gold for their respective uses, but of this no one can affirm with certainty. For a time there was a small advance given by the Bank of England for American double eagles, but from this advance the bank has receded, and there is no commodity of certain quality and steady price that indicates any such advance; and it is beyond the power of man to say that such appreciation has taken place. No European political economist, so far as I have observed, maintains it. On the contrary, it would seem as if gold had depreciated in value, if the wages of labor afford any test, for wages are higher in the golden State of California in gold than in the Eastern States in legal tenders, as shown in Young's late work on Wages in Europe and America.

It may be safely said that as a practical measure we have never had a double standard in successful operation in this country. We have tried the experiment, but it has failed. We had to change the proportions in 1833, and then again in 1834, and again in 1853. It is just as impossible to keep up a fixed proportion between the values of gold and silver as between wheat and corn, or whisky and tobacco. The Rhode Island colonists tried it with their wampum-peage two hundred years ago, and failed. The values of all these articles will depend on demand and supply and other causes, and no legislation can prevent it. It never did prevent it and never will.

The only sound policy for any government to pursue is to have a single standard, and to use that metal for it which is most valuable in the eyes of the world. The European governments have found that out, and are abandoning the double standard, mostly using gold, but silver only for subsidiary coins; but legislators in this House are anxious to adopt the worn-out devices which European governments have cast aside. There is no wisdom in this. It is taking a step backward in financial science, and acknowledging that we cannot learn by the experience of others. It is turning back the finger upon the dial of time.

I repeat it then, in my judgment, we should have but a single standard, and that standard should be gold. Silver should be used only in subsidiary coins, in tokens under one dollar in nominal value, and so overvalued as not to be liable to exportation, and for the small contracts of every-day life. I know that such a policy would not be agreeable to the owners of great bonanza silver mines, but it would conduce to the interests of the people, and would prevent them from being taxed 10 to 20 per cent. in all their transactions that might be made in silver coin.

It is said that we must utilize our silver, and that the best way to do it is to put it into coin. By the act of 1873 we made the trade-dollar; we gave to the mine-owner the whole seigniorage on his bullion and we coined for him one hundred and twenty-five cents' worth of coin from his ounce of fine silver when standard silver was only worth at present rates about ninety-three cents to the ounce, and allowed it to be a legal tender to the amount of five dollars. Happily, we have taken away this special privilege by the bill in conference, and his only use for trade-dollars is now in foreign markets.

There is no reason why the owners of silver mines should have special privileges to the disadvantage of the people, and the legal-tender quality of the trade-dollar has been withdrawn in pursuance of a sound political economy.

I need add little or nothing concerning that part of the report which adopts what is called the Payne bill. It is a measure that relieves temporarily the scarcity of small change that has been occasioned by the hoarding of greenbacks. The ten millions of subsidiary coin that can at once be thrown into the circulation, in exchange temporarily for the legal tenders, will be sufficient to supply the pressing demand for change, and the disposition to hoard will pass away as soon as the people see that they can get as much as they want.

The Randall bill provided for an additional twenty million of subsidiary coin to supply a vacuum that my colleague thought would exist because of the destruction of the greenbacks. I thought when his bill was before the House that his estimate was too high by ten millions, and offered an amendment accordingly. The principle of that amendment has been adopted by the committee.

The committee of conference has modified his bill so that the whole amount of the fractional currency and subsidiary coin shall not exceed fifty millions, a sum amply sufficient when we remember that the whole amount of fractional currency authorized by law was fifty millions, and that not more than forty-two millions and a half thereof were ever at one time in the hands of the people.

I think the report of the committee should be adopted. It will give us an abundant supply of subsidiary coin, it will save us from a depreciated currency, and at the same time preserve our national honor as involved in the payment of our national obligations, and will show to the world that we intend to pay our debts according to the general understanding of the terms of the contract between the Government and the people, and which we have since recognized by appropriate legislation.

Mr. COX. I yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I cannot say what I desire to in five minutes, but I can express the hope that this report may be rejected by this House as a measure involving dishonesty, discreditable to the House and the country.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] tells us that it would be dishonest to pay the foreign bondholders in silver which has so greatly depreciated, and yet this report which he sustains proposes to go on buying silver with gold-bearing bonds or money that would redeem such bonds in order to make the American people accept it when greatly debased as money. Not valuable enough to pay the rich bondholder, says the report, but more than valuable enough to pay the farmer for his wheat and the laborer for his day's work. It may be answered that this report does not propose to issue 5 per cent. gold bonds. It proposes, as I have said, to buy silver with money which would buy these bonds and it leaves them outstanding. It proposes to bring us to specie payments by enlarging our gold obligations, by adding to our gold expenditures in order to make a fractional currency of $50,000,000 for the purchase of the mere material of which we pledge the revenues of the country to the payment of $2,500,000 interest in gold annually. But more and worse, we incur this gold indebtedness for the purchase of a depreciating commodity. A commercial house in my district advised me but yesterday of the rate of its purchases of silver during the last six months.

I submit the brief but suggestive statement:

You may be interested to know that—

January 28 we paid	$1 21¼
February 19 we paid	1 18⅞
March 16 we paid	1 19½
April 3 we paid	1 17
May 19 we paid	1 16½
June 19 we paid	1 13⅛
June 29 we paid	1 11⅛
July 5 we paid	1 09
To-day	1 06

all gold, for silver bullion, 9.9+ fine, mint assay, per troy ounce. Say to-day $1.06 gold per troy ounce against $1.21¼ gold per troy ounce in January.

Shall we go on and bind the laboring-people, the farmers, the manufacturers, the capitalists of this country, to pay $2,500,000 annually in gold for a material out of which to make fractional currency while it is declining with the measure of rapidity indicated by these purchases? Can we increase our power to pay our debt by depriving ourselves of one of the great elements for its payment? Can we increase our resources by depriving silver of its quality of money and yet using it as a mere token coinage? What has depreciated silver? We and Germany by demonetizing it have deprived it of its use and consequently of its value. Silver is valuable as money. It is no longer used for plate. Families do not have it converted into table services; they can get white metal in forms of equal beauty and the robber will not carry them off, for he cannot melt it into ingots as he can silver. Nickel-plating is cheaper and more durable than silver-plating. So that, by demonetizing silver, we who own the most valuable silver mines of the world, depreciate its value and will soon close the least productive mines and will thus deprive another class of laborers of opportunity to earn wages. We it is who are running up the price of gold, measuring the price by all our commodities, including silver. We are running it up as rapidly as the mercury went up a few days ago in yonder thermometer, proving that our unchangeable standard is of everchanging value.

I pray you, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, to pause. Stand by the provisions of the Constitution. Maintain the first dollar you ever had, and the only dollar you had until 1834. Then other nations rated silver at 15½; that is to say, that silver and gold bore the relation of 1 to 15½. Gold was discovered in the Southern States, and in order to make a market for it we put silver up to 16 to 1, that other nations might thenceforth take our silver and leave us our gold When we put it up to 16 to 1 it was more profitable to take our silver, and it was exported, leaving gold to circulate. In the present condition of her affairs, Germany would be compelled to remonetize silver if we re-establish our old dollar which the joint resolution of March 18, 1869, fully recognized. We are the masters of the situation. When we pay the German bondholders in silver dollars such as they agreed to receive, Germany, which is to-day struggling to get gold enough to maintain her credit, will remonetize her thaler and other silver coins, and our joint action will restore the old relation of 15½ or 16 of silver to 1 in gold. The oft-referred-to resolution of March 18, 1869, is as follows, and proves our right to pay our debt, principal and interest, in silver coin:

The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin, or its equivalent, of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligations has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money, or other currency than gold and silver.

Mr. COX. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. KASSON. I answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] appealing for the rights of labor that we who sustain this report demand of this House so to provide that you shall not cheat the wages of labor at the rate of eighty cents for a dollar's worth of service by making silver an unlimited legal tender when more depreciated than paper money. If we owe the laborer a month's wages, let him, in God's name, have a dollar's worth of real money for a dollar's worth of labor, and let him not be—as that gentleman proposes—paid off at the rate of eighty cents. The laborer is worthy of his hire, paid in good, sound gold money.

Now, sir, I leave that proposition against the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. No man deals honestly by the producing interests or the labor of this country who does not propose as soon as possible to pay them good, hard money for the product or the worth of their labor; and on that platform I have stood for years against all the clamors for inflation and all the attempts to reduce the money of the United States to the level of the money of San Domingo, where they take a market-basket full of it to market to get a dozen of eggs for breakfast. The laws of supply and demand, say gentlemen, must regulate the value of money, whether it be gold, silver, or paper. Where you require a laborer to take, as in San Domingo, $1,000 in money to buy his breakfast, are you increasing the value of money by increasing the demand for it? I regret that there is not more time to go into this whole subject, but there is not time, and I leave it.

One word in answer to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT.] He says that we passed in 1869 that law of public credit and national faith, one of the noblest laws ever passed by Congress as the representative of the national and popular honor, without consulting the people in their popular assemblies. Sir, at the convention at Chicago in 1868, one of the parties announced to the people of this country, and announced it in the face of those who were clamoring for repudiation, that the people of this great Republic would not repudiate, but would pay their bonds according to the letter and the spirit of the contract. We went before the people on that platform, and among others, the people of Tennessee, my honorable friend's own State, and by more than 20,000 majority the people of that State approved that platform, and the people of the whole country elected upon it a majority to this House, which, with the Senate, passed the act of 1869. It was one of the most glorious tributes ever rendered by a republic to public virtue and public honesty. It showed that the intelligent American people would repudiate demagogues, but would not repudiate public faith nor national honor, the two priceless jewels of our Republic.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. KASSON. I have but a few minutes.

Mr. BRIGHT. I only want to make a correction. I suppose the gentleman does not wish to do me an injustice.

Mr. KASSON. I certainly do not; and if it is not taken out of my time I will yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SPRINGER.) It must be taken out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. KASSON. Then I hope I will be allowed to go on; and if I have done the gentleman any injustice he will have an opportunity to correct it.

Now to this report, which is before the House, it is not a proposition that leads logically to all this debate upon the legislation of past years. There is no proposition in it to demonetize silver, to change its legal-tender quality, nor to increase the public debt. There is a proposition in it simply to get silver small coin into circulation throughout the borders of the United States in response to earnest demands for it. The whole purpose of the Committee on Banking and Currency and of the committee of conference, as I understand it, is to facilitate the remonetizing of small silver by providing for its more rapid coinage and distribution among the people. There is not a clause in this report, as I understand it, that proposes to increase by one dollar the debt of the United States, whether bonded or otherwise. There is a clause that authorizes the exchange of one kind of money for its full value in silver bullion to be coined and distributed among the people, in order to increase the stock of silver coin in circulation in the community. That is the whole purport of this proposition. A vote for the report is not a vote to demonetize silver, but it is a vote to remonetize it and to satisfy the demand of the whole community for a supply of silver change.

Mr. COX. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] for five minutes.

Mr BURCHARD, of Illinois. I shall vote to concur with the report of the committee of conference, although I supported the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDERS] authorizing the coinage of the silver dollar. This dollar, issued under the law of 1792 and the law of 1837, was the unit of value and a legal tender in payment of all debts, and is a legal tender to day unless the provision has been repealed in the revision of the laws.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Repealed by the act of 1873.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I said by the revision of 1873. I do not mean the coinage act, but the revised code of 1873. As this report now stands it presents a proposition to authorize the issue of $50,000,000 of subsidiary silver coin. I am for that. If I cannot have the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDERS] and also provide for the issue of the legal silver dollar, and the committee of conference on the part of the House have only been able to secure the coinage of $50,000,000 of subsidiary silver coin, I am willing to take what I can get. I am glad to have one conference committee report an agreement.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Allow me to correct the gentleman. I did not agree to the report.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The majority of the committee of conference did. All legislation is the result of concession and compromise among individual members as well as between the two Houses. Because I cannot get all that I want I shall not decline to accept what is satisfactory to me as far as it goes. This much I desired to say in justification of those who voted for the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, but will now vote to concur in this conference report.

Prior to the organization of the Government, in 1786, under the Confederation, the Spanish milled dollar was recognized as the unit of account and the standard of value. That dollar, or its equivalent, the American silver dollar of 371¼ grains of pure silver, for nearly a century continued not only the unit and standard of value, but a "legal tender in payment of all sums whatsoever."

The coinage act of 1873, unaccompanied by any written report upon the subject from any committee, and unknown to the members of Congress, who without opposition allowed it to pass under the belief, if not assurance, that it made no alteration in the value of the current coins, changed the unit of value from silver to gold. It made the gold dollar the unit of value. It omitted the silver dollar from the list of silver coins, although the Mint at Philadelphia was then coining the same silver dollar and had during each of the two preceding years coined more than a half million of silver dollars.

Our monetary system had adopted and was based upon both gold and silver as its standard of value. The coins of each metal were legal tender; those of gold had been changed. The eagle of to-day contains 15$\frac{6}{10}$ less grains of pure gold than the eagle coined from 1792 to 1834. The silver dollar coined in 1872, under the act of 1837, contained 371¼ grains of pure silver—the identical weight of pure silver in the silver dollar established in the first coinage act passed by the Government. The relative values of gold and silver were established by that act at 15 of the latter to 1 of the former. The alloy was one-twelfth for gold coin and about 10$\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for silver coin. All gold and silver coins issued from the Mint were made a lawful tender in all payments whatsoever.

It was further provided by the act of 1792—

That the money of account of the United States shall be expressed in dollars or units, dimes or tenths, cents or hundredths, and mills or thousandths, a dime being the tenth part of a dollar, a cent the hundredth part of a dollar, a mill the thousandth part of a dollar, and that all accounts in the public offices and all proceedings in the courts of the United States shall be kept and had in conformity to this regulation.

The eagles were each "to be of the value of $10 or units, and to contain 247½ of a grain of pure or 270 grains of standard gold."

The dollars or units were each "to be of the value of a Spanish milled dollar as the same is now current, and to contain 371$\frac{4}{5}$ parts of a grain of pure or 416 grains of standard silver; half dollars each to be of half the value of the dollar or unit."

The acts of 1834 and 1837 changed the standard of purity for both gold and silver coins, so that gold coins were made to contain nine-tenths instead of eleven-twelfths of pure gold, and the silver coins by the act of 1837 were made to contain nine-tenths of silver and one-tenth alloy. The increased purity of the standard was compensated by a diminution of the weight of the silver coins, so that the dollar silver coin and the fractional parts of the dollar contained the same amount of pure silver as required prior to the passage of the act for the same denominations. The dollar was established at the weight of 412½ grains, the half dollar of the weight of 206¼ grains, and lesser coins at the proportional number of grains that their proportional value bore to the silver dollar. It was also provided—

That dollars, half dollars, and quarter dollars, dimes and half dimes shall be legal tenders of payment according to their nominal value for any sums whatever.

The gold coins were to consist of eagles, weighing 258 grains, and the half and quarter eagles, containing respectively one-half and one-fourth as many grains of standard gold. While silver coins issued prior to the passage of the act continued a legal tender for their nominal value only, gold coins issued after July 31, 1834, remained a legal tender.

In 1853, without changing the standard of purity of coins in any respect and without changing the weight of the silver dollar or its relative exchangeable value or unlimited legal-tender power in payments, Congress provided for coining silver coins subsidiary to the silver dollar and reduced their weight. It provided for a silver half dollar of 192 grains of standard silver, a quarter of a dollar of 86 grains, as well as a dime and half-dime correspondingly reduced in value.

The silver dollar was not named and not disturbed. The coins mentioned and provided for in the act were made a legal tender for sums of $5 and less.

Thus stood our coinage and standard before and during the contraction of our present large indebtedness and at the time our outstanding United States notes and bonds were authorized and issued.

The laws authorizing national loans from 1861 to 1875 provide for payment in lawful money or in coin. They promise to pay dollars. The dollar or unit was, and continued until 1873 to be, the silver dollar of 412½ grains of standard silver as well as the gold dollar of 25.8 grains of standard gold. The public credit act of 1869 was a pledge to pay the bonds in coin or its equivalent. Our dollar or unit of value, the standard for over eighty years, the silver dollar weighing 412½ grains, still "a legal tender in payment for any sums whatever," was being coined and issued by the Mint.

Did we guarantee the value? Did we promise that if gold appreciated and silver declined we would cease to mint or use the silver dollar and pay in the more valuable metal? Unless our legislation has depreciated or debased the coin, we are under no legal or moral obligation to pay our public debt in any coin better than the silver dollar, then legal tender and unit of value. If our legislation has caused the depreciation, we have the right and it is our duty to undo the evil.

The funding act of 1870, which authorized the refunding of $1,500,000,000 of the national debt at lower rates of interest, and under which $500,000,000 of 6 per cent. bonds have been refunded into 5 per cent. bonds, expressly provided that the bonds thus issued should be payable in coin of the then existing standard of weight and purity. The act itself excludes the idea that this coin must be gold, for a subsequent section of the act authorized the deposit of gold in the Treasury for which gold certificates by the terms of the act were to be issued payable in gold. The bonds were to be paid in coin of the weight and purity established by law; the gold certificates must be paid in gold.

The coinage act of 1873 provided for the issue of a trade-dollar of 420 grains of standard silver. It failed to provide, in fact impliedly forbade, the coinage of the silver dollar. That silver dollar still remained a legal tender for payment at its nominal value of any sums whatever.

The revisers of the code completed the work of degrading the silver dollar and overthrowing the standard of value established by our fathers. The code provides that silver coins shall be legal tender only for sums not exceeding $5.

The recognition of silver dollars as, jointly with gold coins, a standard of value and their coinage at the Mint will stay the rapid appreciation of gold now so manifest in the depressed and falling price, measured in gold, of commodities throughout the world. To restore the silver dollar is just to the public creditor, the private citizen, and above all to the people whose earnings must procure the coin to redeem the promise of the Government to pay its debt in coined dollars of the standard established by law when the debt was contracted.

But I do not insist upon tying this great question, this important subject of legislation, to a proposition which I also heartily favor and desire to pass, to supply a much-needed circulation of subsidiary silver coins.

The demonetization of silver in 1873 was done ignorantly, hastily, and inadvertently. Its restoration should be undertaken carefully and considerately and accomplished after full discussion and due deliberation. When we have secured the $50,000,000 subsidiary silver coin, we will see what can and ought to be done about the silver dollar.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire to say that, though I favor the continued coinage of the silver dollar and making it a legal tender as it was prior to 1873, yet, for the reasons advanced by my colleague [Mr. BURCHARD] and others, I shall vote to concur in the conference report.

Mr. COX. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] for ten minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I can hardly conceive a situation in which the House could be brought more directly face to face with what seems to present on the one hand public honor and on the other the deepest public disgrace than the alternative propositions now presented to this House in this report. Everything in the way of controversy hinges upon the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANDERS.] It is claimed that, by the terms of the act of 1869, it would be lawful for us to pay the public debt in silver dollars such as might have been coined under the law as it stood in 1861.

Now I desire to recall to the mind of the House the letter and the spirit of that law. After all the doubt and the turbulent excitement about what the actual obligation of the nation was in regard to the public debt, the first act of the Congress approved by President Grant made a solemn declaration designed to put all those doubts to rest. It was declared by Congress that—

The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment—

In what? Not in silver, not in gold, not in coin, but—in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligations has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana, rose.

Mr. GARFIELD. I decline to be interrupted. The declaration there was that the payment of all these national obligations not specifically currency obligations was to be in "coin or its equivalent." Now, what did Congress mean? What were our laws before 1861? Why, Mr. Speaker, since 1834 we have had one standard, a dollar; and we have by law embodied it in two metals, gold and silver. But all the time, in order to have one standard, not two, we have sought to make the coins of the two metals conform to the one standard; keeping the amount of metal in one so adjusted to the amount of metal in the other that a dollar of gold should be equivalent to a dollar of silver. Every hour that we had a double standard it was double only on the ground of equivalency; and when by reason of the shifting value of the two metals in reference to each other, the silver dollar and the gold dollar have varied from each other in value, Congress has undertaken to equalize them by increasing the amount of metal in one or decreasing the amount of metal in the other. We always sought to avoid the evil of having two kinds of dollar, one worth more than the other. And when Congress promised to pay in coin it was a promise to pay gold coin or silver coin of equal value to the same nominal sum in gold. I cannot believe that this statement will be denied.

Congress saw a few years ago that it was going to be difficult to keep up the equality or equivalency of the dollar in the two metals; so it dropped one of the metals, except as a subsidiary coin, and left the national standard of value embodied in the other, namely, in gold. Now, the fact that in 1873 we adopted a device to preserve the constancy of the value of the dollar does not by any means signify that we meant to change the old obligation so that men to whom the Government owes money can lawfully be paid in money of a different value.

By monetary changes abroad and by mining developments at home it has happened that to-day, by reason of the fluctuations in the relative values of the two metals, silver has so depreciated that if it were now a legal standard of payment of all amounts the employés and other creditors of the Government could be compelled to accept seventy-nine cents as full payment for every dollar due them, and thus they would be swindled to the extent of twenty-one cents on the dollar by being compelled to receive silver rather than gold, or to the extent of ten cents on the dollar by paying them silver rather than Treasury notes. And the most amazing feature of the case is that some good men, holding these places of high responsibility, do not see that this would be as dishonest as it would be ruinous in its results to the credit of the nation.

Let it be remembered that we are solemnly bound by the act of 1869 to pay in coin or its equivalent. Dare any man say that we can pay in this so greatly depreciated silver and really obey the law of equivalency which was the basis and spirit of the statute of 1869? He denies the principle of equivalency who proposes to pay in this silver coin. He violates the law who violates the essential object of it—equivalency.

If you insist on paying in silver, then I insist that your silver dollar must be equivalent to your gold dollar. Do gentlemen consent to maintain equivalency in the two standards and then pay in silver? Manifestly not. Their incentive is gone the moment they are asked to pay one hundred cents on the dollar. Some one has said that there is an innate desire in the human mind to get a chance to cheat somebody. A great minister once said that there were two things in human nature which when united always made iniquity complete—one was the desire to do a dishonorable thing, and the other was the opportunity to do it. It has happened in the fluctuations of these metals that there is now a notable opportunity to cheat several millions of men by adopting the baser metal as the standard of payment, and thus accomplishing a swindle on so grand a scale as to make the achievement illustrious. By the proposed measure one-fifth of the enormous aggregate of public and private debts can be wiped out as with a sponge. This nation owes $2,100,000,000, and private citizens of the United States probably owe $2,500,000,000, possibly more. At the present moment the relation of debtor and creditor in the United States involves nearly $5,000,000,000. It is proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDERS] that at one fell stroke one-fifth of all this enormous sum shall be wiped off, repudiated, and that this process shall be called honest legislation! Since I have been in public life I have never known any proposition that contained so many of the essential elements of vast rascality, of collossal swindling, as this. I do not charge that such is the purpose of the gentleman; but such, in my judgment, is the effect of the amendment proposed. But, aside from the political ethics involved in this scheme, we should consider its effects upon the business of the country.

Gentlemen may remember the financial shock of 1837, the later shock of 1857, and that still later in 1873. Conceive them all united in one vast crash, and the financial ruin, the overthrow of business would be light in comparison with the shock which would follow if the principle here proposed were adopted. By a principle improperly called "Gresham's law," for it was known as far back as the days of Aristophanes, where two legal standards of value are put in circulation in the same country, the less valuable always drives out the more valuable. Put in operation the provision now suggested, and all our gold coin will leave the country as fast as it can be carried abroad. Do this, and a revolution in our monetery affairs utterly unparalleled in the history of our nation will follow. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] in his remarks, gave the key to the philosophy of this proposed legislation. "Why," said he, "what does a man want to do with silver when he can have something made of white metal that the thief will not care to steal?" What is the meaning of that? It is that he wants money so cheap and so valueless that nobody will care to steal it.

Mr. KELLEY. I was speaking not of money but of household utensils.

Mr. GARFIELD. It amounts simply to the grim summary of Thomas Carlyle, the theory of "cheap and nasty," quantity at the expense of quality, glittering sham at the expense of reality.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. KELLEY. Does the gentleman from Ohio mean to say I speak of white-metal for money? If he does he will compel me to denounce his statement as false.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. COX. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. PHILLIPS.]

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, there are several features in the bill reported from the committee which it behooves this House carefully to consider. What I wish first to state to the gentleman from Ohio in order to correct what he has said is, that while he read from the statute, he did not read it all. First it states that the obligations of the United States shall be paid in coin or its equivalent, and next that they may be paid in other currency than gold and silver in case the obligation does not require them to be paid in gold or its equivalent.

I wish to say a word further to the gentleman from Ohio. He endeavored to create an impression upon the House that the design was by the word "equivalent" that Congress should be compelled when silver declined to add to that silver enough to make it equal to gold, and when gold declined to add to it enough to make it equal to silver. Read the law, and gentlemen will see that such was not its purpose. Such is not the language, Mr. Speaker, and such was not the intention of the law. The real design was that if the payments were made in paper or other evidences of credit or money, that it should be at their gold market-value.

What I wish to impress upon the House as a practical question involved in the bill as reported is this: that the demonetization of silver in Europe by the four great powers has caused a decline in silver more than our production. The production of silver in the Nevada mines by application of improved machinery alarmed oriental and other nations which absorbed it. It also alarmed the leading nations in Europe and they demonetized it. What was the result? They stand to-day on the edge of the most terrible financial crisis that ever threatened any set of nations. And to-day where do we stand? We have a resumption act by which it is proposed in little more than two years to put the whole of our credit upon a gold basis; and we propose in this bill, I say, in spite of what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has said, to take a step to demonetize our silver coin and to take away one of the elements of the coin of the Republic—our constitutional money, legal coin when all our debt was contracted. It is proposed to place the whole public and private indebtedness, the whole floating debt of the country, not upon gold and silver coin, but upon a narrow basis of gold coin alone. We have a pyramid of public and private credit on a basis of gold and silver, and now we propose to take one-seventh part of the base away. If that be done, I say the credit of the Government, the credit of the individual, with this basis diminished from gold and silver to gold alone, will crumble in the most awful crash that ever visited a nation and shattered its credit and commerce to pieces.

The purpose of the law as here proposed, the alarming fact with reference to it, as it comes from the Senate, is that it demonetizes the old silver coin. The gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] who says he wishes to pay labor not in one hundred and sixty cents for two dollars, but in two hundred cents—to that gentleman I wish to state that he really does not propose to do anything of the kind. On the contrary, he proposes to go to a gold basis with $5 as the lowest amount of gold coin, and this reduced, and fast reducing in value coin of subsidiary silver, halves and quarters, as a legal tender for $5 or $20, and thereby proposes to pay to the bondholder in five-dollar gold pieces, and the laboring-man not in gold coin but in silver coin at, as he says, one hundred and sixty cents on two dollars, which is the only thing in which he can be paid for his labor and the only thing in which he will be paid. I am amazed at a gentleman of his intelligence urging such a measure with such an argument.

Mr. Speaker, there are some things in the report to recommend it. The alarming feature, however, is that it incorporates those things steadily and persistently brought into the House in the interest of money to increase its value and always give them the highest-priced article. You can see by the statute just read that it was not until 1869 the attempt was made by legislation to fix any coin payment in the statutes—several years after the war closed, and after the obligations were incurred. You can see from that day, step by step, attempts in legislation to increase the value of these securities. You can see, step by step, the destruction and demonetization of silver to destroy that constitutional coin and elevate the value of these securities by paying them in an article much higher, an article 20 per cent. higher than the old constitutional coin in which we can legally pay them. We have it in our power now to force the remonetization of silver as coin, and thus increase its value. It seems as if all these changes of legal standards were in the interest of the bondholder, home and foreign, and the only interest which does not seem to stir the sympathies of this House is the interest of the long-suffering taxpayer.

[Mr. HOLMAN addressed the House. His speech will appear in the Appendix.]

[Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD remarks on the pending bill. See Appendix.]

Mr. COX. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL. It would be well to inquire what it really is that this bill embraces. The first feature as to which there seems to be no difficulty in either House relates to taking away from the trade-dollar legal-tender qualities. I need not consume any time upon that question. Both Houses have voted with great unanimity upon the subject. The next feature relates to subsidiary coin. And the effect accomplished by this report is to give to the Government the opportunity of issuing fifty millions of subsidiary coin in substitution of the amount of fractional currency now out; and in addition thereto up to fifty millions which is about six millions more. And we accomplish that result without issuing any bonds or any permanent indebtedness of the Government such as was provided for in one of the sections of the act known as the resumption act.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. May I ask the gentleman, how does he pay for the excess?

Mr. RANDALL. I pay for the excess by buying it with $200,000, until I gradually get out or purchase $200,000 of bullion with the greenback money in the sinking fund, and I issue that out as the resulting coin at the subsidiary value; the Government thereby gaining the seigniorage.

I would be willing and desire to go a little further and aggregate sixty millions of subsidiary coin; but it was thought that in view of the fact that not more than fifty millions could be minted until we came here again, it was better to yield that point.

I believe that $60,000,000 of subsidiary coin, in view of the increased population of the country, can be well floated in this country for change money.

There was a difficulty between the Senate and House as to the two sections which I originally suggested. The House was unwilling to make it an agency for retiring any greenbacks whatever. The Senate were willing to agree to the $20,000,000, provided we would retire an equal amount of greenbacks, mixing two questions which clearly ought to be separate—the question of greenbacks and the question of subsidiary coin. However, after a conference the Senate yielded that point, and we succeeded in incorporating into the report the bill as it originally passed the House, and which keeps the two questions separate and does not provide for the withdrawal of greenbacks. I say, therefore, that there are two plain features in the report: First, we get rid of increasing any of the indebtedness of the Government, permanent or otherwise, by the issuance of subsidiary coin, and we secure an amount of subsidiary coin for the use of the people of the country of $50,000,000, which is a great thing to accomplish. If you do not adopt this report, you may encounter the danger between now and December next of having a dearth of change money by which the retail business of the country can be conducted.

Mr. COX. I yield now five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. WILLARD.]

Mr. WILLARD. The bill which we are now considering as it left this House and went to the conference committee embraced two measures, one to give an enlargement of the amount of subsidiary coin for the use of the country, and the other to make the old American silver dollar a full legal tender for the payment of all debts, public and private.

Now as the bill is brought to us from the committee of conference it retains only one of those measures, and we are asked by the chairman of the committee to forego the consideration of the remaining measure on the ground that it will embarrass the passage of the other.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it of course becomes a question in regard to the importance of this particular measure which we are desired to postpone; and upon this permit me to say that in view of the great currency contest that is going on, not only in this country but throughout the world, between the creditor class on the one hand and the debtor class on the other, it seems to me that if we take into consideration the condition of our national finances and the condition of our people, it is the most momentous question that can be presented to us, and that this Congress ought not to adjourn until it meets it and disposes of it on the ground and in accordance with the principles of exact and equal justice.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has proclaimed that the amendment which was offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANDERS,] and which is now shorn from the bill, was a swindling measure; but let me say that the swindling in regard to this subject has already taken place in the moneyed centers of the world; for England, which holds in large measure the credit of the world, and Germany, which has become also a great credit-holding nation, have been determined to exclude from the uses of commerce a part of the coin of the world in order to appreciate that other portion of the coin which they choose to retain. There has been a studied and persistent effort on the part of the great capitalists of our times to appreciate the value of their credits and to take from the debtor classes that which honestly belonged to them.

We have recently, Mr. Speaker, become a debtor nation. Late events, the events of the last fifteen years, have made us a debtor nation to a greater extent than we ever dreamed of, and there is now a greater national debt estimated per capita resting upon the population of this country than upon that of any other nation, I believe, in the civilized world, unless we make an exception perhaps of England. And where are our dues to be paid? They are to be paid in those great commercial centers to which I have alluded; and just as a planet in the skies may appear to the ordinary observer a fixed star and its movements may not be observed, just so there has been within the last few years a gradual appreciation in the value of gold, and we as a nation, the greatest silver-producing nation on the planet, are asked to throw our influence on the side of the creditor class and against our own interest and the interest of every American citizen. I trust, sir, that we shall consider that this is not simply a question for our own people, but a question which attracts the attention of the whole world.

We ought in this struggle in regard to the currency standard to array ourselves with the Latin nations of Europe, with France, with Spain, and Italy, as well as with the vast populations of Asia, and demand that silver shall not be excluded from being a part of the world's coin. Our own home interests demand such action on our part, as also do the growth and extension of our commerce with all those nations which require the boundless products of our silver mines in exchange for the results of their manifold industries. Let us not take the side of greedy England and grasping Germany in this coinage contest, but let us courageously champion those industrial classes who are striving to prevent gold from having an undue appreciation in comparison with all the productions of honest labor. We fight on the side of equal justice to all and against the unjust exactions of foreign monopoly when we fight for the restoration of the old-fashioned silver American dollar to its rightful place in our American currency.

Mr. COX. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SAVAGE.]

Mr. SAVAGE. I only wish to read the balance of the sentence read by my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] to show the wrong construction he put upon the word "coin:"

> The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin, or its equivalent, of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States—> except in case where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold or silver.

There the gentleman stopped. I read the remainder of the clause:

It will be seen that the words "gold and silver" are used as equivalent to the word "coin," as used in the first part of the clause, and showing the construction which this body at that time put upon the word "coin."

Mr. KELLEY. That was the act of 1869?

Mr. SAVAGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. I now yield two minutes to my colleague, [Mr. HEWITT.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. In the two minutes allowed me the most I could do would be to ask a question, and I will refrain even from that. But I wish to remind the House that when the proposition was originally made to substitute silver for the paper fractional currency of the United States I opposed it with all the ability at my command. And to day if I could go back and withdraw the silver from circulation and substitute the fractional paper currency I would vote for it and advocate it as a measure of sound public policy. But that time has gone by. The law of Gresham, which has been quoted here to-day, that the inferior currency, meaning by that inferior in market value, will drive out the superior currency, that law has been in operation until the paper fractional currency is disappearing and the silver currency is taking its place. The consequence is that there is a dearth of currency which cannot now be supplied except by the substitution of silver coin.

Now, while I am embarrassed to the last degree in view of my convictions on this subject by voting in favor of the report of the committee of conference, I am driven to it by this consideration: that whatever loss may be involved in it, the loss to the community by the interruption of its business, by the stoppage of all retail trade, by the inability to pay the wages of labor, by the inability of the laboring man to get his daily supplies, will be so great that unless we furnish currency of some kind it will be recorded against this House that we were a parcel of blunderers, who took away from the people their only currency they had and gave them nothing instead. Hence I shall vote for this report of the conference committee, not as a measure of choice, but as one of absolute necessity against which I can and ought to make no resistance.

Mr. COX. I have but three minutes left, and I will close the debate in that time and then call the previous question.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. COX. In the three minutes which I have remaining I desire first to answer what seems to be an erroneous impression on the part of many gentlemen on both sides of the House. There is nothing in this bill reported from the committee of conference that proposes either to issue bonds or more greenbacks for the purchase of silver bullion. Nor does it retire the legal-tenders. The House will remember that the bill originally did propose to retire greenbacks; but, on the motion of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] one section of the original bill contained the clause "or in exchange for legal-tender notes." That clause, however, was stricken out by a decided vote of this House.

Any matter connected with the volume of our currency, therefore, does not come up now. We propose to make no more debt; we issue no more bonds, we create no more interest by the passage of this report, and we are not embarrassed, as the Senate was, by inflation, contraction, and greenback questions.

The House has already approved every proposition in this conference report except one. That one is in the proviso of the twenty-million section. That proviso is to this effect:

That the amount of money at any one time invested in such silver bullion, exclusive of such resulting coin, shall not exceed $200,000.

When this bill went from the House to the Senate the proviso had for its limit the sum of $1,000,000. For some cautious purpose, of which we should not complain, the Senate reduced the sum to $200,000, exclusive of the resulting coin. Therefore, if gentlemen will look closely at this bill they will find that the conference report really makes our bills thus coalesced safer and better in that respect. It guards against reckless, speculative, and excessive expenditure for bullion "at any one time." In every other regard this House has already approved this bill.

If gentlemen vote for this conference report, it does not follow that they do not approve of the proposition of the honorable gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANDERS.] That is an open question. It ought so to remain, when gentlemen like the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] arise here and say that silver was wrongfully demonetized by the act of 1873. But I ask him why, as the then chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, he did not at that time, May 27, 1872, oppose that measure? It passed this House by yeas 110, nays 13, and was reported by Mr. Hooper, of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] was the chairman of that committee, and did not say a word against it.

Moreover, I would like to ask my honorable friend from Pennsylvania—although I cannot allow him to reply, [laughter,] I will ask him in the RECORD—why it is that he is so anxious to make silver legal tender for all public dues? Will it not make the tariff 20 per cent. less according to his theory? I would like myself to see the tariff cut down 20 per cent. and let the depreciated silver be paid for public as well as private debts, as proposed by the gentlemen from Indiana and Pennsylvania. But will the gentleman favor that? I imagine not. But the tariff has no business in connection with this conference report. Its discussion is as irrelevant as the discussion on this bill as to making the silver dollar a legal tender.

I hope the House will vote on the measure pure and simple. It is a measure for the accommodation of the people between now and December next; that is, to pursue the policy begun of silver coin in the place of fractional paper currency, for the business of the public, whether north or south, east or west.

I now call the previous question, and hope the House will sustain the call and agree to the report of the committee of conference.

The previous question was seconded, there being on a division ayes 111, noes not counted.

The main question was then ordered, which was upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. LANDERS of Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN, and others, called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the report.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 129, nays 76, not voting 82; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr., Ballou, Banks, Banning, Beebe, Bell, Blair, Bliss, Bradley, William R. Brown, Buckner, Horatio C. Burchard, Samuel D. MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were presented by U. S. GRANT, jr., one of his secretaries.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKS submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3478) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
WILLIAM A. J. SPARKS,
L. A. HURLBUT,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. A. LOGAN,
A. T. CAPERTON,
WILLIAM WINDOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement and ask another conference. The Senate, I understand, has re-appointed the same conferees; and I suggest that this course be adopted in the House.

The motion of Mr. SPARKS that the House further insist and ask another conference was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. RANDALL, Mr. SPARKS, and Mr. HURLBUT as the committee of conference on the part of the House.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF AMESBURY.

Mr. HAYMOND. I rise to make a privileged report. The Committee on Banking and Currency have directed me to report back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3693) changing the name of the First National Bank of Amesbury to the First National Bank of Merrimac.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Banking and Currency. Is there objection?

Objection was made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. SCHLEICHER,] that the House go into Committee of the Whole upon the unfinished business of yesterday's session. That motion failing, the regular order will be the morning hour for the call of committees. Meanwhile, however, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SAMPSON] rises to a question of reconsideration, a matter of higher privilege. Before that gentleman proceeds the Chair will lay before the House several messages from the President.

ELIZA JANE BLUMER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message and accompanying documents:

To the House of Representatives:

For the reasons stated in the accompanying report by the Commissioner of Pensions to the Secretary of the Interior, I have the honor to return without my approval House bill No. 11, entitled "An act granting a pension to Eliza Jane Blumer."

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 13, 1876.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, July 8, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith a bill (H. R. No. 11) entitled "An act granting a pension to Eliza Jane Blumer," and to invite your attention to the inclosed copy of a communication addressed to me on the 7th instant by the Commissioner of Pensions relating to said bill.

In the opinion of this Department the misdescription of the soldier in the bill is of such a character as would render it difficult if not impossible to carry the provisions of the bill into effect should it become a law.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

CHAS. T. GORHAM,
Acting Secretary.

The PRESIDENT.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., July 7, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith engrossed House bill No. 11, giving to Eliza Jane Blumer a pension as the widow of Henry A. Blumer, private of Company A, Forty-seventh Pennsylvania Volunteers, with the suggestion that, if the bill is intended to pension Eliza Blumer, whose application No. 46382 on file in this Office has been rejected, it should designate the soldier as of Company B of said regiment, it failing to appear from the records of the War Department that he served in any other company than that last named.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. A. BENTLEY, Commissioner.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. RUSK. I move that the message of the President, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

NEW ZEALAND.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President, and accompanying report from the Secretary of State.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 1st ultimo, a report from the Secretary of State upon the subject.

U. S. GRANT.

WASHINGTON, July 13, 1876.

To the President:

The Secretary of State has the honor to report that upon the 21 day of June he received a copy of a resolution of the House of Representatives in the following words:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed, if not inconsistent with the public service, to furnish to the House copies of the correspondence between the State Department and the government of Great Britain in relation to the sequestration of the lands and property in New Zealand claimed by William Webster, an American citizen, by purchase of the native chiefs of that country by Webster before its cession to and occupation by the British government.'

No correspondence has taken place between the Department of State and the government of Great Britain in relation to the sequestration of the lands and property in New Zealand claimed by William Webster, an American citizen. In the years 1841 to 1844 certain correspondence was had between the legation in London and the foreign office of Great Britain in reference to the general question of land titles held in New Zealand by American citizens, but no correspondence has taken place in regard to the particular claim of Mr. Webster.

Respectfully submitted.

HAMILTON FISH.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 13, 1876.

The message and accompanying papers were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

VINDICATION OF THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. WAIT, by unanimous consent, submitted the following report:

The special committee, to whom was referred the resolutions submitted by Mr. WHITE, and adopted by the House on the 26th of April last, directing an inquiry into certain alleged improper attempts of the Clerk of the House and his subordinates to influence legislation, beg leave to report:

That on investigating the facts they find no foundation whatever for the charges contained in the newspaper article recited in the preamble of the resolution; and executing the specific instructions of the House they find from the testimony taken by the committee—

First. That neither the Clerk nor his subordinates have "violated any law or done any act inconsistent with their position as employés of the House;" and Secondly. That "further legislation" is not necessary to protect the House from undue influence on the part of its officers and employés.

The committee recommend that the resolution be laid on the table and the committee discharged.

The report was adopted.

Mr. WAIT moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. SAMPSON obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. LYNDE.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I rise to a question of consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin desires to ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. LYNDE. I ask, by unanimous consent, to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 332) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1867, and for other purposes," approved June 22, 1874, returned from the Senate with non-concurrence in the amendments of the House, and to insist upon the amendments of the House disagreed to by the Senate, and to agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed as managers of said conference on the part of the House Mr. LYNDE, Mr. LORD, and Mr. FRYE.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SAMPSON] rises to call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 3370) to amend the statutes in relation to damages for infringements of patents, and for other purposes, was ordered to be engrossed. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] raise the question of consideration?

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I do. I raise the question of consideration.

Mr. HUBBELL. And pending that I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. SAMPSON. I have this only to say in relation to the question of consideration——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question of consideration is not debatable.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, of New York, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1970) relating to the approval of bills in the Territory of Arizona;

An act (S. No. 391) to authorize the Secretary of War to purchase a parcel of land on the island of Key West, Florida;

An act (S. No. 627) making an appropriation to pay the claim of Butler, Miller & Co.; and

An act (S. No. 843) establishing the rank of the Paymaster-General.

FORTS AND MILITARY POSTS IN TEXAS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report on the act to purchase sites in Texas for forts and military posts; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FAULKNER for two weeks; and

To Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri, an extension for twelve days.

MRS. ELLEN J. BROSNAN.

On motion of Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Mrs. Ellen J. Brosnan, there being no adverse report thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Will the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUBBELL] yield to me for a moment?

Several members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUBBELL] that the House adjourn.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 80, noes 67.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. CULBERSON: Memorial of the Cherokee Nation of Indians, by their delegates at Washington, District of Columbia, protesting against the allowance of the claim of the North Carolina band of Cherokee Indians to any part of the funds or annuities belonging to the Cherokee Nation, to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. No. 36) to restore the name of Captain Edward S. Meyer to the active list of the Army; and

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the conference committee on the bill of the House (H. R. No. 3411) for the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue be authorized to correct their report, namely, so that it will read, instead of in "line 22, (section 3,)" "lines 16 and 22;" also to insert in the matter inserted in lieu of lines 27 and 28, same section, after the word "Columbia" the words "from money;" also, after the matter inserted after the word "it," line 3, section 7, strike out the rest of the sentence in line 4, to wit, the words "is necessary to make an even and regular grade."

The resolution was concurred in.

ISSUE OF SILVER COIN.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) for the issue of silver coin having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate to said joint resolution, and agree thereto amended, as follows:

In line 4 strike out the word "now" and insert "at any time."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the second amendment of the Senate to the said joint resolution, and agree to a substitute for said House amendment, as follows:

Add to the second amendment of the Senate the following:

SEC. 3. That in addition to the amount of subsidiary silver coin authorized by law to be issued in redemption of the fractional currency, it shall be lawful to manufacture at the several mints and issue through the Treasury and its several offices, such coin to an amount that, including the amount of subsidiary silver coin and of fractional currency outstanding, shall, in the aggregate, not exceed at any time $50,000,000.

SEC. 4. That the silver bullion required for the purposes of this act shall be purchased, from time to time, at market rate, by the Secretary of the Treasury, with any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; but no purchase of bullion shall be made under this act when the market rate for the same shall be such as will not admit of the coinage and issue, as herein provided, without loss to the Treasury; and any gain or seigniorage arising from this coinage shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury, as provided under existing laws relative to the subsidiary coinage: Provided, That the amount of money at any one time invested in such silver bullion, exclusive of such resulting coin, shall not exceed $200,000.

And the House agree to the same.

JOHN SHERMAN,
GEO. S. BOUTWELL,
LOUIS V. BOGY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

H. B. PAYNE,
SAML. J. RANDALL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I feel it to be my duty to explain very briefly my position with regard to this report. I concurred with the committee in making it, and I hope that it will be adopted. Nevertheless, it does not accomplish the object which I desired, which was to make silver a legal tender for all amounts excepting duties upon imports and the interest upon the public debt; not but what I believe that according to law duties upon importations can legally be paid with silver and that we have a right to pay the interest upon the public debt also with silver, because it is one of the coins recognized by law in force at the time that provision was made for the payment of duties and for the issue of bonds of the Government. Believing that to be the law, nevertheless, as a matter of policy, I am at this time willing not to insist upon the execution of that as a matter of strict right. In concurring with the report of the committee of conference, I did so because the session is very far advanced and I feel the necessity of providing a subsidiary coin for the use of the people. Subsidiary coin is becoming already very scarce. Therefore, it is a matter of absolute necessity to provide something as a measure of relief.

I have felt, and I feel now, that it is very difficult to impress upon the mind not only of the Senate but of the country the great importance of making silver a legal tender. We all know that the price of silver at this day is very low; that it is more depressed than it has ever been heretofore; but the cause of this depression is well understood. It can only be temporary. In my opinion the fact that silver is now so depressed is the stronger reason why we should avail ourselves of its existence to make it a legal tender, because by making it a legal tender a value would be imparted to it, to say the least, equal to greenbacks; you would thereby furnish to the debtor class the means of payment equal to greenbacks, and enable the country to carry out all its contracts based at the time they were made on the basis of paper when it was worth from 15 to 20 per cent. less than gold.

We have provided by law for the resumption of specie payment at a given time. Whether that be a wise law or not is not now properly a question to be discussed. It is there, and it is not worth while upon an occasion like this to criticise it. We are bound to resume at a given time if this law is not repealed, to wit, on the 1st day of January, 1879; and whether we succeed in resuming or not efforts will be made to do so. The consequence will be that greenbacks will be continually appreciated until they will be equal in value to gold. That being so, every existing obligation contracted at the time when this paper money was worth 15 to 20 per cent. less than gold will have to be paid in greenbacks equal to gold. The effect of this will be oppressive, especially on the debtor class. How can that be avoided? I see but one way, which is to provide a coin—a silver coin—to take the place of those greenbacks which necessarily will appreciate to the value of gold. Silver, the old standard dollar of 412.8 grains, the money which has existed in this country from the very beginning of the Government, ought to be provided and made a legal tender so as to take the place of the paper legal-tenders.

But we are told by Senators, and the public press coincides with the sentiments expressed on this floor, that gold is now too low and that the money thus issued would be depreciated money. In my opinion, if you will impart to silver the character of a legal tender, you will give to it a value at least equal to greenbacks, and it would be better that it were not worth more than this paper for some time to come. Impart to silver a value equal to gold and issue twenty, thirty, forty, or a hundred millions, and what would become of it? It would be treated just as gold is now treated, as an article of merchandise. It would not circulate. It would accumulate in the great centers of trade, and the country would have no more in circulation than it has now of gold. Not that I favor a depreciated currency, but I favor a coin which, for the time being, in a moment of suspension of specie payments, as is the fact now, will take the place of the irredeemable paper money and enable contracts to be fulfilled upon a basis of the same character in which they were entered into originally. I furthermore believe that resumption of specie payment is an impossibility as long as we maintain the one gold standard. The only way to effect this is by issuing silver coin and make it a legal tender, and if between this day and the day of resumption we are able to put into circulation from eighty to one hundred million dollars of this coin and diminish the legal-tender paper to a corresponding amount, resumption will be possible, while the amount to be redeemed will be less and the means of doing the thing correspondingly increased. The amount of paper legal tenders is now about three hundred and fifty millions. By diminishing this one hundred millions there will remain but two hundred and fifty millions to be redeemed, with one hundred and fifty millions in gold now in the country. By adding one hundred millions of silver redemption is easy.

Hence, while I concur with this report, because I see the necessity of providing a subsidiary coin, which is becoming very scarce, nevertheless, in concurring, I was well aware that we abandoned the greater object, which was to make silver a legal tender. But the session is far advanced, and there is not as much unity of opinion upon that subject as I would desire. Not only gentlemen on the other side but some of my friends on this side think that silver is too low at this time to justify making it a legal tender. Gentlemen who are in favor of silver as a legal coin under ordinary circumstances have doubts if it is wise to do so now because of its low price. It is only astonishing that it is not lower; and being low is the best reason, in my opinion, why we should now provide for its issue, believing that so soon as it is made a legal tender a greater value will thereby be given to it, at least equal to the present paper legal-tenders.

If gold were demonetized and silver monetized would not the former go down immediately and the latter go up? Silver is demonetized in a manner all over Europe and in this country. It is demonetized by law in England and in Germany and by financial regulations throughout the Latin states as a measure of protection against the silver invasion that would come from Germany. France, Belgium, Italy, all the Latin states are compelled to limit their coinage of silver. Hence at this time there is no demand for silver except for the arts. The amount consumed for that purpose we know is comparatively small. That it is depressed is, therefore, not astonishing; but the fact that it is not more so is really remarkable. The result will be that this great question, in my estimation the greatest before the world at this period in the material order, will have to be reconsidered and re-investigated by the commercial nations. England cannot carry on her vast commerce with China, Hindostan, and her Indian possessions with silver depressed as it is now. Throughout all the East, in India, China, and all the Eastern nations silver is the only standard; and it is now depressed so low that the exchanges between that vast region of the world and England are at a rate perfectly ruinous and the commerce existing between these two points is on the eve of being destroyed. Hence the subject has to be reconsidered and re-examined.

I am anxious to impart a value to silver for another purpose. We ought not to forget the fact that to-day we are the great silver-producing nation, and if the price of silver remains depressed as it is now, and perhaps to be still more so, all the silver mines in this country will have to stop operations; for they cannot go on with any profit on the present basis. The silver-mining operations of the interior of the continent will have to stop, thus creating a loss of forty or fifty millions a year, now of such value in paying the annual balance against us.

Mr. President, under the circumstances it is not my desire or intention to discuss this subject. I only wished to avail myself of this opportunity to place my views before the Senate, because in concurring with this report I have not carried out the views which I entertained. I did so from necessity. My intention is at an early day, not during this session because it is too far advanced, again to urge upon the consideration of Congress the absolute necessity of making silver a legal tender for all amounts.

I have no disposition to detain the Senate now, and I hope the report of the committee, although not carrying out my views but to a very limited extent, will be adopted.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Mr. President, I do not know why so promising a beginning should have so small an ending. I indulged the hope that the report of the committee would at least have been of such a character as to permit us to take the sense of the Senate on the transcendantly important proposition of making money, full-weighted, full legal-tender money, out of our great staple, silver; that we would have been permitted to record our votes for or against the restoration of the only legal unit of value in this country, namely, the silver dollar of the Constitution, of which we were deprived by indirection in 1874. We were deprived of it in the interest of the creditors and to the injury of the debtors of the country. But in this hope I was mistaken. I find that instead of taking any step toward the undoing of the vicious and unjust legislation of 1874, and restoring us to the same condition which we were in when specie payments were suspended—to the position we occupied when our debts were contracted—the committee have contented themselves with bringing in a bill, or rather a report, to substitute for full legal-tender paper money, debased, underweighted, subsidiary, token money to the amount of $50,000,000. In order to resume specie payments to that extent the committee would transfer the stamp of Government from the paper money, which they urge is redeemable and redeemable only in gold, to an underweighted silver token not redeemable in anything; and for this purpose they would increase the bonded indebtedness of this country, or at least take out of the sinking fund that which would decrease it if applied to that purpose. Verily, the mountain has been in labor and a mouse brought forth.

Under the present system the fractional currency is as good money, or can be exchanged for such, as any other portion of the currency. The poor man's money and the rich man's money are one as good as the other; but under the system which the committee recommends the poor man's money is good only in this country and by force of law; his scanty saving must, of necessity, be in debased token coinage; for it is in that that he will be sure to receive his wages. But the money-lender's and rich man's money will be good everywhere, needing neither Government stamp nor law to keep it up. This sort of a scheme will in no wise relieve the wants of the country or remove the pall of doubt and uncertainty which now hangs over it and causes complete stagnation and paralysis in every industrial department.

I do not see why the Government should pay out a great many millions of dollars to get a subsidiary money, when if we are not to have full-weighted money we might just as well put a stamp on paper, for it is nothing at last but a stamp on metal, and a very small amount of metal at that, compared with what it is intended to pass for. It does not meet the case at all, and I believe that the country would be infinitely better off to continue to print its fractional currency upon paper. Paper can be got, type can be got, and labor can be got from any portion of the world; but silver is scarce; it is not produced everywhere, and if we are not going to use our silver now as money, but simply to use it as a token, I think we had better continue on with our present system until necessity forces us, as it is sure to do, to use silver as full money and not subject our currency to abrasion and loss when other and cheaper material will answer for a token currency as well.

I am sorry that I have been unable, judging from the speeches that have been delivered on this floor, to make myself understood by Senators who, I am sure, are in favor of relieving the distressed condition of the business men and the laboring classes of this country. Notwithstanding this, I shall say but a few words on the subject at this time.

The distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] the other day told us that he was in favor of the silver dollar, provided you made a silver dollar that was worth a dollar. He says, "Give us a dollar that is worth a dollar, and then I am in favor of making that silver dollar a legal tender for any amount." Now the question arises what is a dollar? What does the gentleman mean by saying "worth a dollar?" We propose a silver dollar that is worth as much as any dollar that any debtor in this country owes. What other or larger silver dollar does anybody want? We propose a silver dollar that equitably liquidates obligations in this country; and this being done, what is the difference, Mr. President, as to what is the size of your unit of value?

I seems to me that—whether purposely or not I am unable to say—two questions have been mixed up with regard to the resumption of specie payments. Gentlemen tell us that we should have a standard of gold, and they tell us we must have a particular unit of that standard. The old unit in the standard of gold was 25$\frac{8}{10}$ grains of gold, nine-tenths fine. No business has been transacted upon that unit in fourteen years; no obligations have been made upon that unit in fourteen years; no notes have been drawn, no mortgages have been executed upon that unit.

Then I ask, if the paper dollar of to-day is worth only eighty-nine cents in gold, is it honest, is it right, is it legitimate, that by a trick of legislation you shall make the debtors of this country pay one hundred cents where they owe but eighty-nine? I think nobody dare answer that question in the affirmative. Gentlemen are asking for an ideal unit that has not been in existence in this country since 1861. Nobody has been doing business on the gold dollar. The people have been doing business on such a unit as the Government furnished them. I say when you resume specie payments, that is one thing; but to resume specie payments in a particular unit of a particular standard, that is an entirely different thing.

In 1834, when the business of the country was based upon silver, when all the contracts of the country were in silver, then gold was a legal tender equal with silver. At that time there were 27$\frac{4}{10}$ grains of standard gold in the dollar. When Congress attempted to equalize the two metals was it attempted to increase the weight of the silver dollar, which was 6$\frac{4}{10}$ per cent. below the value of the gold dollar? Was it attempted at that time to raise the value of the silver dollar to the gold dollar? No, sir. Congress said it would be an outrage on the rights of the business men of the country; an outrage not to be tolerated; therefore they took one and seven-tenths grains out of the gold dollar to make it comport with the contracts and with the engagements that existed in the country.

There are but two classes of persons interested in what shall be the unit of value: the debtor and the creditor. To the man who owes nothing and the man who has nothing owing to him, it is not important what your unit of value shall be. If you should make two dollars out of one of the present dollars, to the man that owes nothing and has nothing owing to him all that would happen would be that he would ask twice as many dollars for what he had to sell and pay twice as many for what he had to buy.

I wonder what was the reason that in 1792 Alexander Hamilton insisted that 371$\frac{4}{10}$ grains should be in the silver dollar. What a piece of stupidity it was! He must have been an old fogy to have put such an odd number of grains into a dollar—371$\frac{4}{10}$ grains. Why did he not put 400 so as to admit of easy decimal relations? Why did he not put 500 or 200, so that relative calculations could be easily made? Why did he put into the dollar exactly 371$\frac{4}{10}$ grains? Why did he do this when the Spanish milled dollar had 375 grains in it?

Because Hamilton knew that the unit of value made no difference to anybody but debtor and creditor, and he took the Spanish milled dollars and assayed a large number of them to find out what was the average value of that dollar and he found that 371$\frac{4}{10}$ grains of pure silver was in the dollar and that 371$\frac{4}{10}$ grains exactly measured the dollar that the debtor owed in this country. Hence that was the weight of the dollar ordained in 1792. He made a real dollar to exactly measure the value of the contracts in the country which had been made in dollars. He did not attempt to inflate contracts so as to agree with an ideal unit, as is proposed to be done now.

At the present time, when we have a paper dollar that is worth eighty-eight or eighty-nine cents in gold, we find a clamor made on the part of certain sections of this country that these dollars shall be "appreciated" by force of law to one hundred in gold. Sir, the gentlemen who talk so loudly of this sort of resumption are very fortunate in the fact that they find their own interest lying in the same direction with the "honor" of the Government. If you want to get to equitable specie payments, make a metal dollar that the debtor can earn with the same amount of labor as he now can earn the paper dollar which he owes, and you will have no difficulty about resumption. Do not make a dollar that gives from 15 to 25 per cent. bonus to the creditors of this country and punishes the debtors to that extent.

I predict that whenever the people of this country have a square vote on this proposition they will never submit to resumption in the present gold unit. I have been in favor of remonetizing the silver dollar because I believed that to be a preventive against the further issue of irredeemable paper money, because I believed we could the sooner and easier get to hard pan, and felt sure that the present temporary depression in silver or rise in gold must be of very short duration.

We know the cause of the so-called decline in silver; we know that Germany has not more than $150,000,000 on hand now of surplus silver to feed the world with, and we know that this country needs a great deal more than that sum to supply her wants; and if the demonetization of silver in Germany—for certainly it is not overproduction, because the world is not producing more now than it did five years ago—if the demonetization has caused the appreciation of gold and decline of silver, the remonetization of silver by this country will cause silver to go back to its old normal relation with gold. It is a very easy thing, but is it a wise thing for the creditors of this Government to assist to demonetize half the money of the world and thus double its debts?

I hold it to be sound in political economy and philosophy that it is against our interest that any gold should be used as a circulating medium in this country until we have paid our debts. What an unheard-of proposition, that a country burdened with $2,000,000,000 of public debt should attempt to introduce a machine for effecting its internal exchanges that would raise the burden of such debt at least 20 per cent., and not only this, but increase also the weight of a vast amount of corporate, municipal, State, county, and city debts!

What peculiar claims have the Tweed gang upon the tax-payers of New York? When they got the bonds of that city to a large amount, they swindled the city. They did not give value to the extent of twenty cents on the dollar for the bonds that they now hold. Why should the tax-payers of New York be bound to pay these dishonestly obtained bonds in gold, when by their terms they are at best payable in paper? Why should this country, whose bonds were sold for greenbacks when greenbacks were worth but fifty cents on the coin dollar, resume specie payments in a particular metal and make those bonds good dollar for dollar in that metal and thus compel the tax-payer of this country to pay them in such particular metal? I want to know why in the resumption of specie payments every dollar of indebtedness over this broad land, which indebtedness amounts probably to $1,500,000,000 of State, county, and city indebtedness, shall be unnecessarily raised 20 per cent., and the tax-payer burdened with this unjustly increased weight of obligation?

I want to know why the seven or eight thousand millions of private debts which exist in addition to those of the nation, the States, and the municipalities, and which were engendered in greenbacks, shall be increased in the interest of the creditor and to the ruin of the debtor. I tell you, sir, it is not the money-lender that gives prosperity to the country; it is the active business man; it is the borrower, the hopeful, the industrious, the enterprising man; he who is always in debt. That is the man who lends fleetness to the wings of commerce; that is the man who gives elasticity to the flagging footsteps of industry. It is not the man who, instead of inaugurating enterprises, sits back and lends money. If any legislation is to be had, it should be in favor of the masses of the people of the country. Let a few honest words be said for Lazarus; let us not always be nodding to Dives. We hear a wail throughout this country from certain classes whenever you propose to make money plenty so as to keep up prices at the range in which they were when debts were contracted. We hear a wail lest somebody with a fixed income is going to be hurt, or somebody with a fixed salary is going to be hurt. We have heard no words of encouragement or defense for that much larger class who have incomes neither fixed nor unfixed, but who have very fixed obligations to meet.

I have already said more than I intended to when I arose. I did not intend to go further than to protest against the smothering of this great question by the action of the conference committee so that a fair vote of the Senate cannot be had upon it.

We now come to the proposition of issuing subsidiary coin, something foreign to the bill that we thought we were going to discuss, and upon whose merits we can get no vote because many gentlemen in this Chamber who are in favor of issuing a full-weighted silver dollar are also in favor of this proposition of subsidiary coins. I should have liked a vote taken so that the people of this country could know who it is that is in favor of inflation; I mean that worse kind of inflation, the inflation of debts and a contraction in the prices of property and labor. That is the inflation which the people ought to dread the most.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the following points in this connection:

First. I would warn the Senate of the serious juncture of business affairs throughout the country.

No remedy exists for this state of affairs but that of giving the country such a unit of value as will encourage bank discounts, render the money market easy, and enable debtors and mortgagors to equitably liquidate their indebtedness. Such a unit of value is only to be found in the silver dollar.

Second. That the present time is the best for the application of this remedy. Gold has risen, and with it the greenbacks, which, owing to a perversion of the law, are now based upon gold. I say that gold and greenbacks have risen so high that the latter will purchase in the market enough silver to render possible the resumption of specie payments in silver. The accomplishment of this result would put an end to the existing fall of prices and tightness of loanable funds. Let the present opportunity pass and it may never again be in our power to recall it.

Third. That, in order to consolidate her recently-established unity, Germany has resolved to call in the numerous silver coins of her component states and issue gold coins instead. Her efforts to carry out this policy, which, whatever may be its wisdom from a political or dynastic point of view, is financially unsound and dangerous, has caused a rapid rise in gold and fall in silver. The nature of this perturbation in the long-standing relation between the metals is such that it can only be temporary. While it is our last opportunity. No other country except the United States is in a position to take Germany's rejected stock of silver; specie payments having been suspended in many of the countries of Europe. We know exactly how much silver Germany has to sell. We know exactly how much we need in order to resume specie payments and with it our lost commercial prosperity. The two amounts are substantially the same; so that if we absorb Germany's stock, the price of silver will rise and gold will fall, until the old-time relation will be restored. Why, then, shall we refuse to seize this propitious moment and refuse to make avail of the advantages it offers us?

Fourth. I have said that the present abnormal enhancement of gold and depression of silver can only be for a time, but unless we put a stop to it at once by removing the restraints imposed by the sinister legislation of 1873, a great revulsion will be brought upon the country. A new and further expansion of paper will occur. Either this or repudiation will be the only choice left us. And the evil may not stop here. You propose to consummate an act of great injustice upon a free people, and I warn you that it is not to be done with impunity. Our forefathers revolted from authority rather than pay an enhanced price for a few chests of tea. Now you would assist to impose an addition of 20 per cent. to all the debts of this country, and I do not believe that the spirit of liberty is so dead with our people that you will succeed in accomplishing this purpose without opposition. You are treading upon dangerous ground. You are pressing the spring down too far.

Fifth. To arrest the present rise of gold and fall of silver will be to save the country from numberless sacrifices and dangers. To refuse to do it will invite new difficulties and disorders. It is in your power to adopt either course. Upon you lies the grave responsibility of deciding this important subject correctly.

Sixth. The country will hold us to a strict accountability and the votes on this subject will be scrutinized with more severity six months hence than on any other subject.

Seventh. Before this Congress meets again the opportunity to purchase silver at 20 per cent. under gold will be lost. The opportunity to resume payments in specie will be lost. The opportunity to relieve the commercial dread and uncertainty which now tie the hands of industry will be lost.

Eighth. There are other grave dangers with which inaction on this subject menaces us. Our fisheries, the whole product of which is valued at but a few millions a year, have always formed an important subject of legislation with us. It forms the basis of many of our foreign treaties. It has often drawn us into controversies which threatened the country with war. And yet how insignificant are not all of the New England fisheries compared with the Pacific coast mines. The product of these mines amounts to over a hundred millions a year. They form the basis of the industries of several important States. They support directly and indirectly several millions of persons. Their product is indispensable to the world and forms an indissoluble portion of its industries. Yet you propose to destroy them all by adverse legislation or inaction. Is this a wise or just course?

Ninth. If you fail to restore the silver dollar to its rank of full legal tender, and so neglect the mining interests of the country, the mines will be closed and all the capital invested in the veins of the Sierra Nevadas will be lost. At one blow you will destroy hundreds of millions, and to the industrial distress that already exists in the East you will add that of the far West. The mines, once abandoned, will never be re-opened. If neglected for six months the restoration of the old normal market relation of 16 to 1 will not be sufficient to induce their re-opening.

Tenth. Nature has given us the vast range of the Sierra Nevadas rich with argentiferous deposits. That which the world has sighed for fifty centuries to grasp and in quest of which this continent was drenched in blood by its Spanish conquerors, nature has given us in reward for scientific and enlightened labor. But no sooner do we come into possession of the coveted prize than you would deprive us of it by legislation.

Eleventh. We have protected everything in our laws except the precious metals. Codfish, bodkins, shoe-strings, and tombstones are protected; even iron, steel, nickel, and copper are protected; but not gold and silver. These great metals which differ from all other substances in the most important respect that there is a vast stock of them on hand in the world stored up from the ages, these bases of contracts, these conservators of prices, of the relations between capital and labor, of property, of civilization, these we do not protect at all. More than this, we propose to destroy that one of them which we produce in the greatest abundance and to adopt the one which Great Britain almost monopolizes.

Twelfth. The trade of Asia lies at our doors. Instead of opening these doors to it, we propose to double lock and bolt them. By assisting to lower the purchasing power of silver we deny ourselves all the profits of this great commerce.

Thirteenth. You will render almost valueless a vast portion of our possessions stretching from Mexico to Alaska. Adding to this your one-sided taxes on iron, steel, tools, chemicals, and the numerous other commodities employed in the production of silver, you will cause great discontent among the people of the Pacific coast States, and induce them to believe that they are denied that equal protection and encouragement which they are entitled to under the terms of the Constitution.

Fourteenth. The size of a unit of value is of no account except between debtors and creditors. Give these a unit which accurately measures the contracts between them and you do justice to both. This is what was done in 1792 by adopting the silver dollar. This is what would be done by adopting it now. No man would complain and the country would enjoy an immense relief.

Fifteenth. Subsidiary coins are only tokens representing gold. Substantially they are promises to pay gold printed on silver. They had better be printed on paper; it is cheaper.

Sixteenth. The error which lies at the base of all erroneous views on this subject is the supposition that gold is immovable. But this is fallacious. Gold is subject to the same laws of supply and demand as other commodities. It rises and falls just the same. This fact is discernible whenever it is valued in any other commodity than itself. Whatever there seems to be of fixity about gold applies with even greater force to silver, because its production and consumption are more regular. The assumed immobility of gold reminds one of the geocentric theory of the universe, which theory assumed the earth to be stationary and all the planets and the sun to revolve around it; whereas we now know that the earth revolves around the sun and the sun itself around some more distant center.

The question before us is too important to be buried beneath a puerility like this error. We must settle it with all our eyes open or we will bring upon the country such an aggravation of distress, and that quickly too, that no man can foresee in what dire disasters it will end.

Seventeenth. It is claimed that the issue of token coins under the bill now before us will be a step toward the resumption of specie payments in the East. I maintain that, on the contrary, it is a step toward the suspension of specie payments in the West. The Pacific coast States, California, Nevada, Oregon, and some of the Territories, and to some extent also the State of Texas, have a specie currency and have never suspended specie payments. This currency, according to the custom of the country and under the law as at present construed, is of gold. In this state of affairs the Government, under the act of 1853, issued several millions of silver tokens which were sent to these States and put into circulation, the Government receiving for them their nominal or tale value in gold, thus making some 10 or 15 per cent. by the operation and flooding those States with a large amount of subsidiary coins.

After having done this, the Government under the present bill will turn right around and sell this same sort of subsidiary coin to the Eastern States for par in greenbacks. The Pacific States took this coin and gave gold for it, with the understanding, derived from the law as it then stood, and relying upon the good faith of the Government, that none of it would be issued except for gold. But, in violation of this faith and after you sold all you could for gold, you sell the same coin in the East for greenbacks, which are at 12 per cent. discount in gold. At the present time a man in California can sell a gold dollar for $1.12 in greenbacks and buy $1.12 in subsidiary silver coins, which the law makes him to pay out at par in California. By compelling the Pacific States to pay you gold for what you are now selling for greenbacks you wronged them out of some $600,000. By now issuing fifty millions more of this token coinage you will compel them to suspend specie payments. Already your token coins are at a discount of 6 per cent. in San Francisco, and this depreciation will be aggravated by the present bill. You have in effect left that coast without any par fractional currency for their gold coins. This anomalous state of affairs has produced an extraordinary derangement of the currency. Wholesale prices are quoted in gold and retail prices in debased silver. There can be but one ending to this. That ending will be suspension. The Pacific coast community must have small coins, and the value of those coins must be in accord with the larger ones. The former cannot be repudiated, because there must be a fractional currency, and there is no way of replacing the debased coins. Our banks cannot issue fractional notes. But gold will cease to be paid. This means suspension of specie payments and the exportation of some thirty millions of gold from the country.

Yet the legislation which is responsible for it is by some erroneously styled and by others complacently regarded as "a step toward specie payments!"

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. SHERMAN. I forego making any remarks on account of the peculiar circumstances, so as not to delay the trial. I will simply say that the question of the dollar is postponed to the next session, and this bill simply deals with subsidiary coin and makes suitable provision to get that coin into circulation. That is all there is in the conference report.

The report was concurred in.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move that the regular hour of the meeting of the Senate until otherwise ordered be eleven o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine.

The motion was agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Legislative and executive business will be suspended, and the Senate will now proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap.

The Senate then proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap having adjourned then resumed its LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes its legislative business.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONKLING presented a petition of shipping merchants of New York, praying the passage of the House bill relative to the distribution of the Geneva award; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of New York and a petition of ship-owners of New York, praying the passage of House bill No. 3187 to amend the Revised Statutes relative to merchant seamen; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am instructed by the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1816) to repeal section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to report it back, and ask that the committee be discharged and the bill referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It is a proposition for new legislation.

The report was agreed to.

GOODS AT INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 146) to amend the act approved June 18, 1874, relating to the admission of articles intended for the international exhibition of 1876, to report it favorably, accompanied by a letter stating its purpose and which justifies the committee in asking that it be considered now. It is to facilitate the payment of duties on articles brought to the international exposition.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for the reading of the letter I send to the Chair.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 30, 1876.

SIR: Representations have been made to this Department by foreign exhibitors at the international exhibition and others that it is in many instances impracticable for such exhibitors who desire to sell and deliver dutiable articles during the exhibition to comply with existing laws and the Treasury regulations made thereunder requiring prepayment of duties or the securing of the same by bonds.

In view of the international features of the exhibition and the desirability of promoting the wishes of foreign exhibitors so far as possible consistently with the security of the revenue, it is deemed proper that some modification of these laws and regulations be made as to goods sold during the exhibition.

It is believed that a joint resolution in the form herewith inclosed will meet all the difficulties complained of, and I respectfully recommend its passage by Congress.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. F. CONANT,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. MILTON J. SAYLER,
Speaker pro tempore House of Representatives.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REVISION OF RULES.

Mr. FERRY, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the subject of the revision of the rules of the Senate, have directed me to submit a report and ask that it may be printed. I desire to state in this connection that the committee have given much time and care to this revision, and believe that they have so revised and classified the rules that they will commend themselves not only to the consideration but perhaps the approval of the Senate.

I desire also to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that they have ordered a new edition of the Manual and provided for that edition, and it would seem desirable that these new rules, if they meet the approval of the Senate, should be embodied in that manual. The report will probably be printed and laid upon the table to-morrow. I trust that the different Senators will give such attention to the report as will enable the committee to call it up promptly at an early day and ask the consideration of the Senate to the question of the adoption of the new rules.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. MAXEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 989) for the relief of John G. Tod, of Texas, of the late Texas navy; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The hour of one o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, being the river and harbor bill.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me to call up the bill (S. No. 982) providing for the construction of the Washington monument, which the committee were instructed to report?

Mr. MORRILL. I have not had time to examine that bill. I hope the Senator from Minnesota will allow it to go over for half an hour.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will be continued. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations will be read.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 99, to reduce the appropriation for the improvement of Penobscot River, Maine, from $12,000 to $10,000.

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish to suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that the word "five" in line 99 should be stricken out and "four" inserted, to make the apportionment.

Mr. ALLISON. That is correct. I move to strike out "five" and insert "four" in line 99, so as to make the clause read:

For the improvement of Penobscot River, Maine, $10,000; $4,000 of which shall be expended at or near the "Narrows" in said river at Bucksport.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 102 and 103 in the following words:

For the improvements at Richmond Island, Maine, $15,000.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope those words will not be stricken out, because I have been disposed to follow the action of the committee and to act upon the suggestions which they have made, and acting upon those very suggestions, this item should remain in the bill. I suppose in presenting the bill to the Senate the committee intended to have a general regard for the commerce of the whole country. Maine has a coast with indentations of five hundred miles, and nearly all the European commerce passes along by it, and there is in addition thereto also the domestic commerce. The House bill for all those purposes, and embracing more harbors than there are in any two States in this Union, appropriated $40,000. The Senate committee reduced it to $15,000. That is the small regard which the commerce of the country in that direction is to receive. But when you come to Richmond Island—that is the point now to which I invite the attention of the Senator who has the bill in charge—we find it a harbor of refuge upon the coast of Maine, by which all our domestic commerce and all the commerce of Europe passes. It is one of the most desirable harbors as a harbor of refuge on our coast anywhere, and the engineers tell us, I think, that there have been about $100,000 expended in the improvement of this harbor, and the engineers tell us that this $15,000 closes up and completes the work, as it will, and I think they have entered into contracts to complete it.

Now, taking it to be the view of the committee that you ought not to commence to any extent new works and expend a small sum of money for them, you ought to allow this to remain, because it completes the work and is of a most important character. I hope, therefore, that this amendment will not be agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, this Richmond Island is very near the coast, and a year or two ago an improvement was begun connecting the island with the mainland by a breakwater, throwing in loose rock and stone with a view of making, as the Senator from Maine says, a harbor of refuge; but it has remained there for a long time without being connected with the mainland, and Major Thom, who has in charge all the works in Maine, in making his revised estimate stated that this could be omitted, and therefore the committee, as I have said many times, desiring to economize, omitted this improvement. It is a work that can be done next year as well as this.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, Mr. President, and there is no appropriation in this bill that cannot be omitted. That is very true; but here is a little appropriation that completes your work. Now what has been the theory of this committee on this bill all through? That you would not expend $5,000 upon a work where it would do no good; where the accretion and deposit of a coming year would be equivalent to what you would remove by that small sum, and I thought there was force in it; but when you come to an appropriation securing a harbor of refuge for all the commerce that goes along the Atlantic coast, and $15,000 will complete the work, I say the theory and the argument on which they based their report not only justify but demand that this item should be kept in the bill.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 7.

Mr. ALLISON. I dislike to ask for a further count for fear we should not have so many.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As one-seventh of the number, I give it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is not agreed to. The next amendment will be read.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 105, to reduce the appropriation "for the improvement of Cocheco River, New Hampshire," from $15,000 to $14,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 107, to increase the appropriation "for the improvement of the harbor at Burlington, Vermont," from $20,000 to $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 109, to reduce the appropriation "for the improvement of the harbor at Swanton, Vermont," from $10,000 to $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 110 and 111, in the following words:

For the construction of ice harbor at Chester, Pennsylvania, $6,000.

Mr. WALLACE. I hope the Senate will not agree to this amendment. In the absence of my colleague I am required to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that for the Schuylkill River about $28,000 is appropriated by this bill to aid the vast commerce of the city of Philadelphia. This ice harbor is indispensable for the protection of vessels in the river Delaware from drifting ice. There are rows of piers extending into the Delaware which are now being broken down and becoming dilapidated. It is necessary to repair them in order to preserve that protection from drifting ice in the winter season in the Delaware, and I trust that to that great commerce this amount of money, $34,000 in all, will not be hesitated to be given by the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. If my colleague on the committee deserts me on this appropriation, I do not know hardly what I shall do. We only had seven votes, I believe, on the last division in favor of an amendment of the committee. I suppose on this division we shall have only six. This is a very old improvement at Chester, and the engineer seemed to have some doubt originally as to whether the United States should maintain it. In his revised estimates he recommends the omission of this harbor, and following that rule we omitted it. I leave it to the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. FERRY. I was out of the Chamber and should like to know from the Senator from Pennsylvania—I do not see his colleague present—whether this is a necessary appropriation, and whether we should concur in the recommendation of the committee in the judgment of the Senator, aside from his obligation to the committee. I am speaking of his direct representation.

Mr. WALLACE. I can only state what the member of the House from the district represents, and what I have no doubt my colleague would represent in regard to this matter if he were here. If this harbor is to be preserved at all as a refuge for vessels from the drifting ice in the Delaware, then this appropriation is indispensable. It is necessary to repair the piers that constitute the harbor. They are rotting down. This amount of money is recommended by the engineer in his primary report, and is indispensable if the harbor is to be preserved. Chester is well known to be one of the largest ship-building places in the country; and when it is considered that the whole amount of money appropriated to the commerce that centers at Philadelphia by this bill is but $34,000 and the whole amount to the State of Pennsylvania less than $100,000, it seems to me the Senate ought not to grudge this small amount to that State.

Mr. ALLISON. I was about to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that in all these reports there seems to run the idea of a doubt as to whether the United States should maintain this pier at all or not, and that was an additional reason why we proposed to leave it out. Of course this sum can be usefully expended there by somebody. There seems to be some question as to whether the United States should incur the expense.

Mr. DAWES. I should merely like to add that the Representative of the district was here a few moments since and informed me that this was not to be used for the construction of this ice harbor, but for repair. He stated that it was all going to decay and would pass away unless this money was expended. I make this suggestion in addition to what the Senator from that State has already stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee to strike out lines 110 and 111.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 112 and 113, in the following words:

For the improvement of Passaic River, New Jersey, $10,000.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have been gratified to see that there were no local partialities manifested by the Senators in reference to this bill, but it is on a broad, catholic patriotism that everybody looks at it. [Laughter.] Looking at it in that light, I feel bound to object to this amendment. I notice that the committee have stricken out every possible appropriation for the State of New Jersey, although there are several most important works going on there, and they have not given that State one farthing. The facts regarding this appropriation are these: The Passaic River is a river upon which there is a good deal of commerce connected with the city of Newark, which has a population of about 130,000 people. That district pays a revenue to the United States only second to one other in the whole Union. The Government have already expended $90,000 on this work. The original estimate was $100,000. This $10,000 is to complete it. It is for dredging the river. I think my friend from Iowa yesterday said that he was almost ready to pay $4,000 out of his own pocket rather than to take the dredging-machines away from Green Bay and put them back there again. This work will all be done for $10,000, and you will not be taking the dredging-machines out and putting them back again. I know the Senate will not agree to this amendment.

Mr. President, I have voted uniformly against the amendments of the committee, and I want to state why. The Congress of the United States in both branches have determined that these were valuable works to the country; and things are now in such a condition that you can get a third more work done for the same money than when these improvements were undertaken. It is a profitable time for the Government to do this work which they have approved. The people want the employment, and it seems to me that it is just the time to do it. Then we know we have a very economical House, and they have recommended these works. I want the Senate to agree whenever they can with those recommendations. Besides, the Federal Government goes to the people consequently as a tax-gatherer to enforce the laws to collect revenue, and it is for the benefit of the country that the Federal Government should occasionally present itself to the people in acts of beneficence in improving their prosperity.

Therefore I have voted against all these amendments, for I think the work ought to go on at this time for the profit of the Government and for the good of the people.

Mr. ALLISON. I can only say with reference to this appropriation that the estimate of the engineer in charge is for $34,000. It is for dredging, as said by the Senator from New Jersey. Colonel Newton in his revised estimates omitted this appropriation, and the Committee on Appropriations followed the recommendation of the engineer. The Senate does not seem disposed to follow either the committee or the engineers in these appropriations. I can only say that these are the reasons which actuated the committee in omitting this appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment striking out lines 112 and 113.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 118, to increase the appropriation "for the construction of piers in Delaware Bay, near Lewes, Delaware," from $30,000 to $35,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 124 and 125, in the following words:

For the improvement of Elk River, Maryland, $5,000.

Mr. DENNIS. Mr. President, I ask that the appropriation may be retained in the bill. I have a personal knowledge of that work, and I know that it is all important. An appropriation was made last year, and another one is required this year, which I think will be all that will be necessary to complete the work. I take this occasion to say that Maryland has only four appropriations in this bill, $75,000 for Baltimore, $5,000 for Elk River, $5,000 for Wicomico River, and $5,000 for Chester River at Kent Island Narrows. Two of those appropriations have been stricken out by our committee, and two remain. This is a matter of necessity or I should not ask it. I trust that the Senate will disagree to this amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. The object of this appropriation is to dredge a channel eight feet deep at low water between Cedar Point and Elkton, in Maryland. The engineers recommend for that work $20,000, and the House has given them $5,000. If my friend from Maryland [Mr. DENNIS] thinks he can get a dredging-boat up there and all the apparatus for dredging and economically spend $5,000, and the Senate agree with him, then this appropriation ought to be made.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask that the Senate pass upon the next four items, amounting in the aggregate to $10,000 together. They all stand upon precisely the same footing. They are appropriations for the preservation of work that has been in progress for some years, and in one or two instances there is an unexpended balance, amounting to as much as was appropriated by this bill originally in the House.

While I am up I will take the occasion to say that as a member of the committee I have sustained the amendments reported from the committee until the sentiment of the Senate has been so unmistakably declared to be adverse to the principle upon which the committee framed the bill, that I think I am now at perfect liberty to secure for old Virginia the amount of these small appropriations which have been stricken out by the committee. I ask that the same measure may be meted to us which has been meted to other States, and that the four amendments from line 128 to line 135 inclusive, the items amounting in the aggregate to $10,000, may be non-concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote on the amendments will be taken together if there be no objection.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no objection to considering these amendments together. I think there is some force in what is said by the Senator from Virginia. The Senate seems to have abandoned the principles upon which this bill has been framed by the Committee on Appropriations. Therefore, perhaps, these appropriations have as much merit as a number that have been retained. I think the appropriation for Accotink Creek, however, ought to be omitted. The engineer seems to think it is unnecessary, or at least he does not ask that the appropriation be made for it. Four thousand dollars is the amount.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator will find on page 120 of the volume the report on Accotink. Appropriations have been made for the improvement of this stream. It is in the collection district of Alexandria, the nearest port of entry here below us. The amount required to complete the work according to the original estimate is $14,000, of which $5,000 has been expended. The amount appropriated by this bill is $4,000, which I understand from gentlemen who are perfectly conversant with it will furnish them as much navigation as is necessary. That is all I have to say.

Mr. ALLISON. Colonel Davis does not ask for it in his revised estimates.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa ask a separate vote upon this amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. I call for a separate vote on the appropriation for Accotink Creek.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 128 to 133 inclusive, in the following words:

For the improvement of the mouth of Occoquan River, Virginia, $2,400.
For the improvement of Aquia Creek, $3,000.
For the improvement of Nomoni Creek, Virginia, $1,000.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORWOOD. For the purpose of making haste on this bill, as we have seen the disposition of the Senate with regard to the amendments of the committee to the House bill, I move that the Senate non-concur in the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations to the House bill striking out different provisions of the House bill. I do not include the amendments where there is any decrease or any change of amounts, but only those amendments that strike out provisions of the House bill.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not understand the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia moves that the amendments of the committee reducing the appropriations be acted upon together.

Mr. NORWOOD. That is not exactly the form in which I wish the motion to be put. I move that we non-concur in the amendments which strike out entirely provisions of the House bill. There are other amendments that reduce the House bill, and there are others that increase the appropriations made by the House. I do not propose to touch those amendments. In nearly every instance the Senate has refused to concur in the amendments of the committee which strike out the provisions of the House bill altogether. I therefore, in order to test the Senate on this question, move that we do not concur in any of the amendments made by the committee to strike out provisions of the House bill.

Mr. WINDOM. The motion of the Senator from Georgia is a somewhat remarkable one, and yet I am not at all prepared to say that I desire now to oppose it. Two distinct principles of action are indicated in the bill as it came from the House and as reported from the Committee on Appropriations. The title of the bill of the House, I believe, is "an act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes." The words "and for other purposes" are peculiarly appropriate. Read by the light of subsequent provisions they mean an act to make smooth and easy the re-election of the present Congress. I think any one who will carefully examine the bill as it came from the House of Representatives will find that it is designed, or at least the effect of it, if not the design—for I will not attribute any improper motives to anybody—is to remove obstructions in the congressional route to Washington rather than to remove obstructions from the rivers and harbors for which the appropriations are made. Yet, Mr. President, I am not criticising the present House of Representatives for the system they have adopted in making these appropriations. I have for years contended that the appropriations in this bill were more political than for purposes of improvement. I think a reform very necessary.

The Committee on Appropriations have recommended these reductions, and I think the principle upon which that committee has acted is far wiser than that of the original bill. Yet, without finding the slightest fault with the action of the Senate or being in the slightest degree sensitive as regards this action, I see as plainly as the Senator from Georgia evidently does that the Senate disapproves of the principle adopted by the committee; and as the action of the Senate thus far has been so uniform I am rather inclined to think that we had better pass the bill just as it came from the House.

Mr. WHYTE. I certainly think that this would be an act highly improper, and I was going to say almost indecorous, on the part of the Senate, to our Committee on Appropriations, which has taken the trouble to go over this bill with great care, examine the details, and strike out where they thought the works were not works of national importance and increase the appropriation where the necessities of the public service seemed to require it. I do not think that the Senate ought in a lump to repudiate the action of that committee. It will be very hard for gentlemen hereafter to take the trouble to go over long and tedious bills of appropriation if they find that, when their work comes into the Senate, by a majority vote the whole of it is to be repudiated without even considering the reasons which actuated the committee in reducing or in striking out various items of appropriation.

There is a great deal in what the Senator from Minnesota has just said to the Senate. It is high time for the Senate and the House of Representatives to look at these river and harbor bills. It is high time to call a halt upon these appropriations. We must remember that up to 1859 the appropriations annually had never exceeded half a million dollars, and if I remember correctly only $335,000 were appropriated for rivers and harbors throughout this country in one year. In a time like this, when the cry is going up all over this land for economy and retrenchment, we find a bill upon our table appropriating $5,800,000 for rivers and harbors and creeks and fish-ponds throughout this land. I for one raise my voice in protest against this wholesale repudiation of the action of the committee.

Mr. FERRY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. With the permission of the Senator from Michigan, the Chair will remark that the motion of the Senator from Georgia requires unanimous consent, inasmuch as the items would be divisible at the request of any Senator.

Mr. CONKLING. What motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That all the amendments in which an entire appropriation is stricken out be taken together in one vote.

Mr. FERRY. I was a little surprised to hear—especially from a western Senator and one so identified with the interest of transportation and the interest of wise economy, who has distinguished himself by the part which he has taken in the furtherance of these great enterprises—the remarks that fell from his lips that this bill seemed to be one emanating more from political interest and local pressure than from regard for the public good. I do not give his words, but I give the idea which he suggested. I have not forgotten that the river and harbor bill has usually passed perhaps with more unanimity than any other important act of Congress. I do not forget either that it has recently passed the other branch of this Congress, which we regard as the one more directly representing the sentiments of the people, for its members officially stand nearer the people than the members of this body, who are supposed to represent States. In the judgment of the House of Representatives and in consideration of economy is sent us a bill proposing to appropriate five millions and upward, and that I think is something like from eight hundred thousand to a million dollars less than was appropriated by the act of 1875. The House, therefore, has not forgotten its duty in seeking to economize the expenditures of this year over last year. It has considered the general interest of the country in cheapening transportation by facilitating the commerce of the country, an important industrial force of the nation and one contributing largely to its prosperity. Certainly the House bill must be considered as an economical bill since it is $1,000,000 less than was passed last year; and, as I stated yesterday concerning my own State, the bill of to-day is something like 20 per cent. less than the act of last year. The committee of the Senate, adopting a principle which, in their judgment, they thought would carry them through, have appealed to this body for concurrence. The chairman stated this morning that the Senate follows neither the committee's principle nor the principle of the Engineer Department, for the reason, I may add, that they have adopted the principle suggested by the Senator from New York [Mr. KERNAN] on my right on yesterday, the principle of common sense, of business judgment; and, steering between the two extremes, I am pursuing that principle to-day.

As I understand the bill as reported from the committee, it is an increase of about $30,000 over the bill of the House, and I take it that a bill could not come from the present House of Representatives unless it was one of supposed economy. The House of Representatives submit to the Senate this bill, and it should be taken as a fair representative of the wish of the people, for they stand between us and the people. It is upon that theory I act. I have not voted for the rejection of every recommendation of the committee. I have in each case where I have not possessed the knowledge myself interrogated the Senator, as I did I think the Senator from Pennsylvania, who is a member of the committee, asking him to dissociate himself from the obligation of the committee and answer whether in his judgment as a Senator the appropriation is necessary for the harbor within his State. On his saying it was, my vote followed the statement; and so I shall be governed hereafter. I claim with my colleague to know what is best for the interest of Michigan; and in submitting that judgment to the Senate I take it that the Senate will accord such sufficient knowledge to the representatives of the State. I accord equal force to the representations of the representatives of the different States.

I am not disposed to recognize this bill as a political engine no more than any other legislation of the country may be political engineering. This is a political body. The other House is a political body. This Congress is the head of the political power of the United States. Through its agency we operate for the interests of the whole people. We are not a personality; we are but the instrument of the people. We are here representing their interest, and where their property and their life are at stake. They demand of us protection to vital interests through this river and harbor bill, in which the whole country east and west, north and south, is interested. If the appropriation for these harbors is not lavish, if in the aggregate it does not exceed last year's appropriation but falls below, are we not then on the side of economy? Are we not following out the indication of the people? Are we not conserving the best interests of the country? Are we not acting in the interest, not of that west, alluded to by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] which may be more politically inclined than other localities, but for the whole country? I cannot bandy comparisons with my friend on my left, [Mr. WINDOM;] but I take it in his travels in advancing the great object of transportation which is indissolubly linked to his name he has found the people almost a unit upon this question of cheap transportation and better harbors, and it is by facilitating commerce through the opening of ports and the clearing away of obstacles that cheap transportation is attained.

Mr. WINDOM. I would not trouble the Senate with another word were it not that I think the Senator from Michigan must have misapprehended my remarks. I do not wish to be placed in the position of opposing bills for internal improvement, for, as the Senator has very justly said, I am perhaps as liberal on this subject as any other Senator on this floor. I am always willing to vote for as large appropriations as the condition of the country will permit and as can be economically used at important points, and which will substantially benefit the commerce of the country; these three conditions should always exist together. It is because I am so earnestly in favor of improving the water-routes of the country that I do not like to see appropriations frittered away as they have been by the bill from the House of Representatives. If we had appropriated some $15,000,000 it is quite possible that very many of these places which the Senate committee have advised the Senate to omit would have been greatly benefited; but the House of Representatives, acting upon what my friend has been good enough to call "economy," and what I am willing to call an assumed economy, required the Secretary of War to reduce his estimates to one-third of the amount which he said was required for carrying on this work. In making that reduction very many cases were found in which one-third of the amount recommended could not be economically used this year. The great waste for many years in our river and harbor appropriations has been that we did not appropriate money enough to complete any given work. The contractors who undertook the work were compelled to contract for small jobs and small amounts, and consequently to supply themselves with what I think is called the "plank" necessary for that purpose. Not knowing who may get the next contract, they put into each contract the whole cost of getting ready for it. I say where a work will cost $30,000 to complete it, if you appropriate $10,000 or $5,000 a year you add a very large percentage to its ultimate cost.

The true policy is undoubtedly to ascertain what are the works of the most importance, and appropriate money enough each year to do something; not merely money enough to get somebody's vote from some congressional district, but money enough to complete some part of the work. But the principle, as I read it, of this bill, in a very large number of cases has been to appropriate just as little as would pass the bill and satisfy the local interests depending upon it.

While I am in favor of liberal river and harbor appropriations, my opposition to the House bill is based upon the fact that it is constructed upon a wrong principle. The Committee on Appropriations have endeavored to correct that mistake; not that they were opposed to many of these improvements, but because when the Engineer Department advises us to make much larger appropriations than those made by the House or to omit for this year, we have thought it prudent to omit.

I am not at all sure that the committee is right in this course. In fact since the bill has come into the Senate I am very much disposed to believe that it was wrong; because I always assume that the judgment of a majority of the Senate is very much nearer correct than the judgment of a single committee. The committee felt confident that they were acting on the right principle, and certainly they acted conscientiously in the matter. I think it is sufficient for us to assume now that we have been mistaken, and that to clear out the political obstructions in certain congressional districts is much more important than to remove the obstructions in the rivers and harbors of the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. WINDOM. I then say in conclusion to the Senator from Georgia that I shall make very slight objection to his motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair regards the remarks of the Senator from Maryland in the nature of an objection to the motion of the Senator from Georgia, which requires unanimous consent.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I rise for the purpose of saying that I could not vote for the proposition of the Senator from Georgia. The committee have reported certain amendments, some of them increasing the appropriations made in the House bill in certain respects and in other instances they have entirely stricken out the appropriations made by the House. If we adopt the amendments increasing the appropriations of the House and strike out the amendments of the committee reducing the appropriations of the House we shall destroy the bill in a certain sense and make a much larger appropriation than was made in the bill as it came from the House. That is very evident.

I take it for granted the committee understand something of what is proposed by the bill, and that they have not stricken out any appropriation made by the House without some valid reason for it. Hence as a general rule I have voted to sustain the action of the committee, because in my opinion it was in the interest of economy. I have no doubt that there is much more money appropriated by the bill as it came from the House than is absolutely necessary to meet the wants of the country. I would vote now to reduce every appropriation in the bill as it came from the House 25 per cent. I have no question but that we could get along with this reduction of the appropriations made by the House. The condition of affairs in the country is such at the present day that we ought to economize in every respect that we can.

I rose, however, for the purpose of stating my objections to the proposition of the Senator from Georgia, which, I understand from the Chair, is overthrown by a single objection that has been made. I would say that I think this is a better bill than that which we have had heretofore. I see no appropriation in this bill for the Falls of Saint Anthony. I think, therefore, that in this respect this bill is a much better bill, more carefully guarding the interests of the country, and I shall vote to sustain the amendments of the committee wherever I can in my judgment do so.

Mr. NORWOOD. As under the ruling of the Chair the remarks of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] were in the nature of an objection and would require these amendments to be acted upon separately, I withdraw the motion that I made. In doing so, I may say, in reply to what the Senator from Maryland said about the motion being rather discourteous, that it seems to me to be just about as discourteous to vote against these amendments in gross as it is to take them up and vote against them in detail; and the only object that I had in view was to save time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the next amendment.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 134 and 135, in the following words:

For the improvement of Accotink Creek, Virginia, $4,000.

Mr. WITHERS. I must say a word in behalf of Accotink. It is almost here in the city of Washington, just down the Potomac. The object is merely to enable the traffic to reach that village.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Has the board of public works anything to do with it?

Mr. WITHERS. I will state to my friend that the board of public works does not extend quite so far, and this place is on the other side of the river. The object of the appropriation is merely to enable vessels to go up to this village of Accotink. It is a small place, to be sure, but it is an important interest to the people there. It is true that no appropriation was asked by the engineer for it or recommended by the revised estimates; but if we adhere to that principle and omit appropriations in all cases that are not recommended in the revised estimates we shall have to strike out a good many items which have been put back by the vote of the Senate.

In general I concur with the view of the committee in framing this bill restricting appropriations to objects of national importance, but I recognize fully the right of the Senate to express its opinion on the subject, and as they have done so in unmistakable terms I bow to the superior wisdom of the body and only ask them that my own State may be made a beneficiary of the extended principle which they have announced by their votes on the various amendments. It is true that the engineer does not ask for an appropriation for Accotink. I see my friend [Mr. ALLISON] is holding himself in the leash, ready to read the report for me, and I can well anticipate him by stating that the engineer says no appeal has been made in behalf of the improvement by those actually interested in it and that no examination of the creek has been made during the year past. That is sufficiently explained. They have made no examination, because there has been no fund to defray the expenses. I contend that the assertion of the engineer in regard to the anxiety of the people is not sustained by the facts, because the appropriation has been asked, if not by the engineer, by the Representative of that district, who is presumed to know more about the wants of the people than the engineer can know, and the provision has been put in the House bill, a bill of which we hear so much as having been framed in the interest of economy. The Representative of the district desires it as the people desire it. It is not a new work. It is a work already commenced, and I ask that the Senate may give the appropriation which is asked.

Mr. ALLISON. Accotink Creek, I think, is a very short stream running into the Potomac, extending up in Virginia somewhere to the village of Accotink, a few miles from the mouth of the creek. If we are to be asked to improve all these little rivers in all the great States and little States, I think we must swell this bill to a very large size. The Senator from Virginia stated truly that the people in the neighborhood of this stream have not yet learned that the Government is anxious to distribute its bounty to them, as they have not asked, as the report says, for this improvement. That is all I have say with reference to the question. I leave it to the judgment of the Senate.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 138, to increase the appropriation "for the improvement of James River, Virginia," from $60,000 to $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 141, to increase the appropriation "for the improvement of Cape Fear River, North Carolina," from $100,000 to $200,000.

Mr. RANSOM. This amendment is proposed by the committee on the strongest report ever sent here by the Engineer Department in favor of any appropriation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 142, 143, and 144, in the following words:

For the improvement of the French Broad River between Brevard and the Buncombe County line, North Carolina, $15,000.

Mr. RANSOM. I hope the Senate will not agree to this amendment or the next one, for reasons already advanced. I will not detain the Senate, though I could make a speech of an hour showing that the principle that only large streams ought to be fostered will not do. This country is made of human beings, individual units, and it will not do to cut off the hands and fingers and all the little veins and small arteries by which the heart is fed. These are small places to some extent, but they have great merit in them. I will read the report of the Engineer Department if the Senate desires, but I do not care to detain the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from North Carolina will take time enough to tell us something about this river between Buncombe and Brevard.

Mr. RANSOM. I am very sorry that my friend from Iowa does not know as much about the county of Buncombe as I do. I will say that there is a very large district covered by this item. Although I live several miles from there I believe it is the finest part of this habitable globe. There are there the finest mountains, the finest streams, and the most minerals to be found anywhere in the same extent of country. Did the Senator from Iowa read the report of the engineer, in which he says that there is a prospect of mining gold and precious jewels in the counties which this river drains? Did he ever read the description of the streams there? Though this has been a district in the United States since the foundation of the Government, I believe this is the first solitary dollar ever voted by the Congress of the United States to it.

Mr. ALLISON. I did take some pains to examine into this "French Broad River, between Brevard and the Buncombe County line, North Carolina," and read also as much of the reports of the engineer as I could find on the subject; and I have here before me a special report upon this river made at the present session of Congress. Speaking of the French Broad River, Major McFarland states:

The entire river runs through a mountain region, with fertile though narrow valleys along its upper and lower sections. This mountain region abounds in undeveloped mineral wealth——

Mr. RANSOM. We want to develop it.

which in the future may require the improvement of this river and of some of its large branches. At present neither the amount nor the value of the products of the region under discussion would seem to justify any attempt at the improvement of its low-water navigation.

Mr. MERRIMON. He assigns a reason for that.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand, this French Broad River between these two points is a beautiful little mountain stream, having at low water about a foot and a half or two feet of water.

Mr. RANSOM. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but he has no idea of the French Broad—no conception of it.

Mr. ALLISON. It does not connect with any other water-course. I believe it is stated somewhere in this report that should in the great future railroads be built to the town of Asheville, or some other town the name of which I have forgotten, then there might be some utility in improving this river; and until that is done, I think the universal testimony of the engineers is that no money should be expended on this river.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President, we have not distinctly heard on this side of the Chamber what has been said in regard to this amendment. I should like to know by whom the report is made from which the Senator from Iowa read.

Mr. ALLISON. This is the report sent to the House of Representatives by the Secretary of War at the present session, and is a report made to the Secretary of War by Major McFarland, who is in charge of these improvements. He does not recommend the expenditure of any money on this river at this time.

Mr. PADDOCK. How long has he been in charge of this branch of the service?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know, but some time; two or three years perhaps.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I regret to see my friend from Iowa making such war on this small appropriation. If he knew the locality of this river and its character, I am sure he would not oppose it. Why, sir, I believe I can say that this is one of the most beautiful streams in the world. It is over two thousand feet above the level of the ocean. It is not a small stream, such as he has described. At low water it is from four to six feet deep, except upon occasional shoals. I do not ask the Senate to take my statement about that; it is so stated by the engineer who examined it. I beg to read an extract from his report:

The part of the river which has been examined is thirty-nine miles in length, varies in breadth from seventy-five feet to three hundred feet, and has an average depth of from four to six feet, except at the reefs and shoals. It has an average fall of fourteen inches per mile, and flows through a fertile valley which has a width of about one mile and a height above the sea-level of two thousand feet. It lies entirely in Transylvania County, which had in 1870, according to the census returns for that year, a total population of thirty-five hundred and thirty-six.

In that respect he is mistaken. It lies in Transylvania, Henderson, and Buncombe Counties, and along its banks are some of the richest iron deposits in this country. If this river could be made navigable, which could be done at very small expense, it would develop one of the most interesting sections of country in the Union. That it should be developed has been an anxious desire of the people of that section for years, and I venture to say that this appropriation is more meritorious than many embraced in this bill about which no word has been said. I hope the amendment will not be concurred in.

Mr. WINDOM. Before the Senator takes his seat I wish to ask him one question. Is not this river located in Buncombe?

Mr. MERRIMON. It passes through Buncombe; it has its rise in Transylvania, passes through Henderson and passes through Buncombe. Now I see the Senator's point, and I answer him promptly no, sir; there is no buncombe about it [laughter] except so far as Buncombe County embraces part of it. It is a substantial proposition and a meritorious one, and one that the Senator from Minnesota and all the Senators here will be glad to see if it shall be encouraged as it ought to be by the General Government. It is one of the most delightful summer countries in the world; and when you visit it, it will give you great pleasure to ride in a steamboat along this river and see the most beautiful valley on the continent. I trust the amendment will not be concurred in.

Mr. ALLISON. Only one word in reply to the Senator from North Carolina. I thought I could not be mistaken about the depth of this river. I have no doubt that what is said by the Senator is true as to portions of the river; that is, there are pools in this river undoubtedly from four to six feet; but the engineer, who has made an accurate estimate of the cost of improving it, states that it will require $125,000 to make a channel thirty inches. I read from this special report, page 6, where after giving an estimate of the cost he says:

Total for upper section, $125,000, for making a channel thirty inches deep at low water.

So that we are entering upon this improvement to cost $125,000 for the purpose of reaching a depth of water of two feet and a half.

Mr. MERRIMON. My friend is mistaken. The engineer says to do the work embraced in this bill will require about $19,000.

I want to make another remark. One reason assigned in the first report made by the engineer who suggested that it was not necessary then to make the expenditure was that the contemplated railroads had not reached Asheville, in the county of Buncombe. Two railroads will soon be completed to that point, and before this work can be done and steamboats can be operating upon the river the roads will have reached that point, and the obstacle that he then suggested will be out of the way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I think I must ask for a division on this appropriation. It seems to me this appropriation ought not to be made. I will test the sense of the Senate once more.

The question being put, the ayes were 13.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is a further count demanded?

Mr. ALLISON. I think I shall have the yeas and nays on this.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANSOM. I do not intend to detain the Senate. I should have said more if I had supposed there would be any difficulty in regard to this amendment. There are four reports in the last three years on this matter, and the Senator from Iowa, if he examines them, will see that this beautiful stream is supposed to be a part of the great water-line between the eastern and western waters, forming a connection with the Tennessee River; and this is connected with other appropriations in this bill for Tennessee. The improvement of this river will, besides, open up a mountain region of unsurpassed mineral wealth to this country; and even if the other part of that great water-line to which I have alluded should not be completed, this river will connect two parts of this country through the mountains where railroads will soon furnish facilities for transportation.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 14, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Conkling, Cragin, Eaton, Edmunds, Hamlin, Morrill, Oglesby, Sherman, Wallace, West, Windom, and Wright—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Barnum, Bayard, Bogy, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Dennis, Ferry, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Key, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Stevenson, and Withers—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Conover, Davis, Dawes, Dorsey, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Howe, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, Logan, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Morton, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sharon, Spencer, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Whyte—32.

So the amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 145 and 146, in the following words:

For the improvement of Pamlico River, North Carolina, $25,000.

Mr. MERRIMON. I can say to the Senate that that is a matter of great moment. Obstructions were put into the river some years ago, and vessels going to Washington, North Carolina, are bound to anchor out a mile or two from the town. The object of this appropriation is to remove those obstructions. It is very essential to commerce that the appropriation should be made.

Mr. ALLISON. What are the obstructions?

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not know exactly; but there are obstructions there.

Mr. RANSOM. I will tell the Senator from Iowa why they were. They were piled up there during the war. We have nothing to conceal about it. I feel that the Senator in his magnanimity and I know that the Senate will not let that be a cause why the river should be obstructed. There is a strong report of the engineer in this case, and I am sure that the Senator from Iowa will not dispute it.

Mr. ALLISON. After passing the French Broad, I do not think I shall make any very great objection to this appropriation.

Mr. RANSOM. I expected that.

Mr. ALLISON. It has quite as much merit as the French Broad, I think. These obstructions are of course lying in the river between the mouth of the river or Pamlico Sound and the little town of Washington which has about twenty-five hundred inhabitants.

Mr. MERRIMON. But has very considerable commerce.

Mr. RANSOM. It was burnt twice during the war.

Mr. ALLISON. Obstructions were put into the river during the war by driving piles.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Who put them in?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know. They were put in by the rebel forces, of course, and they were cut off three feet below the water, and those obstructions now run along for a considerable distance, and they must be taken out before navigation can be restored. I suppose the Senate desires to remove these obstructions, judging from the votes we have already had.

Mr. RANSOM. I think my friend from Vermont did not hear my remark. I stated very candidly, I have no concealment about it, that these obstructions were put in by the confederates during the war; and they are now in the way of the commerce of that river. As the engineer states, they are five miles below the town, which was twice burnt up during the war. The engineer states that the town has a large commerce, an immense lumber trade, and that the commerce of nearly the whole country is impeded by these obstructions. I ask it as due to North Carolina; but it is equally due to the States of my honorable friend from Vermont and from Iowa. Vessels from Boston, from Portland, from New York, from Baltimore, from Philadelphia, all go down there for their lumber, and your citizens are subjected to as much inconvenience as ours are by these obstructions. The engineers recommend the improvement, and we ask a smaller amount than they recommend.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do I understand the committee to give up this amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. The committee give up nothing. We have just had a vote on the French Broad. I do not know whether the Senator from Vermont was in when that vote was taken.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was the Buncombe amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, Buncombe.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was in on that. What I want to know is what the engineer on the last revision of retrenchment and reform recommends about this particular river?

Mr. ALLISON. I think the last report says nothing about it. This is not in the regular estimates. There is a special report from the engineer stating what it will cost to remove these obstructions and the character of the obstructions. There is no estimate for this.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And no recommendation?

Mr. ALLISON. And no recommendation for the appropriation of the money. There is a statement in a special report which I have before me giving the cost of this improvement.

Mr. RANSOM. I ask the Senator's pardon; there is a strong recommendation. There can be no stronger recommendation than the statement of the facts.

Mr. ALLISON. The facts are stated, but there is no recommendation for an appropriation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the document read. This is getting interesting.

Mr. ALLISON. It is quite a lengthy document.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it.

Mr. ALLISON. I will read the report:

An examination of the river was made under the orders of Colonel Craighill, and in his report dated December 31, 1872, an estimate was submitted for removing the artificial obstructions placed in the river during the war, for dredging the bar below the town, and for the construction of a dike. These obstructions are encountered about six miles below the town of Washington and nearly opposite Hill's Point. They consist of four rows of piles driven in pairs, so that the second row is about ten feet from the first, each pile being driven so as to divide the space of the preceding row. At an interval of one hundred and fifty yards the second pairs are driven in the same manner. These piles were cut off at three feet below low water, and present a formidable obstruction to navigation. A channel one hundred feet wide has been opened through them and is marked by buoys.

This narrow pass is not only dangerous at night and in foggy weather, but offers a serious obstacle to vessels beating up the river at any time. The bar commences nearly opposite the lower wharf. The worst point occurs about half a mile from the wharf. Five feet depth is found here at low water, and under the influence of the winds the depth is much less. On such occasions boats are compelled to load below the bar. From this point the water deepens very gradually; in fact the bar may be said, with short intervals, to extend seventy-four hundred feet, the depth in this distance ranging from six and one-half to seven feet, the deeper intervals being eight feet. The sudden expansion of the river, the meeting of the tidal and fluvial currents, and a current from a small bay and creek on the north side combine to form this bar. The expansion may be reduced and the effect of the creek and bay neutralized by a dike. No structure of the sort was recommended by Colonel Craighill, and I have omitted it from my estimate on account of the following considerations: A short dike of twenty-one hundred feet in length, near the northern shore, would but partially modify the forces which form the bar, and, on the other hand, a long (seventy-four-hundred-foot) dike near the channel would transfer the bar lower down, and would itself prove an obstruction unless marked by a beacon. Without further examination the position and effect of a dike cannot be definitely determined. Its construction, therefore, may be deferred until the effect of the dredging and of the removal of the obstructions can be observed.

The town of Washington, at the head of navigation, on the Pamlico River, has a population of two thousand and sixty. The steamers which ply between the points of the sound and Norfolk and Baltimore cannot proceed above Washington, but a small steamer ascends as far as Greenville at low water, and at high water as far as Tarborough, twenty-five miles from Washington. A branch railroad connects Tarborough with the Wilmington and Weldon Railroad.

Twice, during the war, Washington was nearly destroyed by fire, but it is now slowly recovering the population and trade which it had in 1861. A large and flourishing timber trade at that time was carried on between the town and northern ports, the lumber being composed chiefly of pitch-pine.

Mr. Elliot estimated the tonnage at 1,125 tons, which he regarded as less than the actual amount. Beaufort County, which is chiefly tributary to Washington and the trade of the Pamlico River, has a population of 13,011. According to the last census, the value of the farm products is $496,161. The land products, in bushels, are as follows: Wheat, 1,987; corn, 179,994; oats, 3,674; Irish potatoes, 3,893; sweet-potatoes, 102,625; and 1,987 bales of cotton, 3,245 pounds of tobacco, and 59,396 pounds of rice.

APPROXIMATE ESTIMATE.

33,000 cubic yards of dredging, at 50 cents	$16,500 00

Mr. RANSOM. The Senator from Iowa is mistaken in one thing. The engineer says:

This amount should be granted in one appropriation, in order that the work may be economically executed.

I was very certain there was a recommendation for the appropriation. It is next to the last line, on the ninth page of the document.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The extraordinary thing about this is that it does not appear to have been recommended in the regular estimates of the Department submitted to Congress at the beginning of the session; but this is a special report, made by Abert, "United States civil engineer," to General Humphreys, dated 14th of December, 1875, in which he says that the act of Congress approved March 3, 1875, provides for the survey or examination of Pamlico River, North Carolina, which duty was assigned to him; and then he describes what the obstructions are, and of course they are no less obstructions because the rebels put them in, and in due time, if the public necessity requires it, of course they have got to be taken out. All the injury that the rebels did to the country, large as it is, has got to be redressed and made good in the end undoubtedly. There is no point about that. But the thing that occurs to me is that in this particular summer, this particular, glorious summer of reformation and retrenchment, when you pinch off the toe-nails of every clerk in a Department in order to save a little something for the tax-payer, it is found necessary that these pinchings should be applied not only in this particular item—for this merely illustrates it—but to opening the commerce of our glorious country, when the retrenchers say there is no business to be done on the rivers; that the country has got into such a comatose condition that we must rake and scrape and pare everywhere, and take all the parings to open the rivers up to a commerce that does not exist, and means for an industry that has long since died out! There is a slight inconsistency about that which as one of the tax-payers of this country I cannot help observing.

If this estimate had been in the regular estimates and had been recommended by the head of the Department, of course it would have stood just like all these other estimates that we can get along without for this year of difficulty and trouble, and it might go in or go out upon an equality with the others. But all we have here is this report from Mr. Abert, a civil gentleman, hired I suppose by the month, that this amount, which it will cost, he says should be granted in one appropriation in order that the work may be economically executed. That, I dare say, is entirely true with reference to nine-tenths of each item of these appropriations. The economy of the work, if you say nothing about the Treasury and the tax-payer, would be greatly subserved by granting the whole sum necessary in one lump, even for the largest works, so that systematic, persistent, and continuous application could be made to the construction of these various works. There can be no doubt about that. That is all this civil engineer says, and he says what is almost an axiom in an economical point of view where applied to the work itself. You may say the same of taking the stumps out of your farm, if you happen to have one; but if you do not happen to have any money, although it would be very economical to take out the stumps, and take them all out at once, you might possibly let the cattle graze among the stumps another year until you get the money to take them out. That is about the state of the case here. General Humphreys, it appears, has transmitted to Congress the report of this Mr. Abert, who seems to have had a great deal of work in various parts of North Carolina.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is he a colonel of engineers?

Mr. EDMUNDS. He says that he is a "United States civil engineer" and, therefore, I take it he is not a colonel. I never knew a colonel to drop his title in making an official report. If there is such a rare bird as that, we ought to know him at once.

Mr. President, what I am saying is not directed to this particular item any more than to all these others. If we are really in earnest in saying that we do not intend to tax the people this year any more than they are taxed, and have a balance at the end, these matters of what are called public improvements, every one of them, could wait; and a small appropriation for the mere preservation of what has been done, so that nothing will be lost by waste and decay, would be the true economy. Probably this particular improvement is just as much called for as nine-tenths of the others; but it does lack what it is said many of the others possess, a regular estimate by the Secretary of War and a recommendation in his annual report that the public service for this year requires and justifies this expenditure; but that remark, as I say, does not apply to this particular item any more than to the others.

Mr. RANSOM. I return my thanks to the Senator from Vermont for what he last said in reference to this appropriation; and I must ask the Senate to indulge me for one moment while I say a word in reference to Colonel Abert. I happen to know this gentleman, and when I say that he has been employed by the Chief of the Corps of Engineers, General Humphreys, I need say but little more. But it gives me very great pleasure here in the Senate, so far as I can, to bear my testimony to the ability, the scientific attainments, and the fidelity of this gentleman. I can say that he is known among the Corps of Engineers as a gentleman of the very highest order of intellect and of character. The only reason why this report did not come in with the general report was that it was made at a later day.

I will make one remark more about this matter and end it. If through our inadvertence to take out these obstructions or to attend to a little harbor down in North Carolina, or South Carolina, or Maryland, or Massachusetts, or anywhere else, some disaster should occur to the commerce of this country, some small skiff, if you will, or some little schooner, some little sail-boat should go to wreck, and four or five lives be lost, I think we should be paying very dearly indeed for our economy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As my friend seems to have implied that I said something adverse to the character or position of Mr. Abert——

Mr. RANSOM. I was satisfied that the gentleman did not mean anything of that kind.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am well satisfied that I did not do so, because all I said was that he stated a self-evident truth when he said this amount should be granted in one appropriation to subserve the purposes of economical expenditure.

Mr. RANSOM. I am sorry that I was mistaken in supposing that my friend would not without knowledge make a reflection on any individual that would be calculated to wound his feelings. I can assure my friend from Vermont that anything and everything which he says here has too much weight with the country, would make too much impression on any individual, to let any slur go from him unanswered against the character of any man. I am very sorry that I misunderstood him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee to strike out lines 145 and 146.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 147 and 148, in the following words:

For the improvement of Clinch River, Tennessee, $12,000.

Mr. KEY. At last, in this bill we have reached the State of Tennessee. That State, as the Senate knows, is an interior State. It has no coast and no harbors; but we have some great rivers there that are equal to harbors, and we want them opened so that we may get to them. The river spoken of in this item and the two mentioned in the succeeding items drain Eastern Tennessee; rising in the western part of North Carolina and in Southwestern Virginia and running through Tennessee, they come together and make what is known as the Tennessee River. Steamers are now plowing the bosoms of these rivers. The Government has heretofore made appropriations to open the Upper Tennessee River above Chattanooga. It has well-nigh got through with that branch of the work. It has there its boats, its floating shop, all the apparatus necessary for cleaning out these rivers, and there is but an appropriation of $15,000 to that part of the river. That property can be usefully employed, for there the Government hires its own hands, does its own work; and I say that in no part of this country, in my opinion, has so much been accomplished at so cheap a rate as in Eastern Tennessee. These rivers are very important to the people of that section of the State and to the whole country. The country along them is exceedingly fertile, raising for the market a large amount of surplus products. Along these rivers are immense beds of ore and coal that only need some natural channel by which they may get to the markets of the world. Harbors they have not; railroads they cannot have; and the only way which those people can have to get their products and minerals to market is by opening up these natural channels. The appropriations are not large, but they are very important to the people of that section of the country. None in this bill is more useful or more necessary, and I hope the action of the House will be confirmed.

Mr. WITHERS. I will add one word to what has been so well said by the Senator from Tennessee, inasmuch as I have some local knowledge of this particular stream. It rises in Virginia and flows through Virginia for more than a hundred miles. It is the only artery by which the people of that section of the country can bear their products to market. They are from fifty to seventy miles distant from any railroad. The stream is a large, bold stream, that can easily be made navigable by the removal of some rocks that obstruct the navigation at various points: and I am sure that the same amount of money could scarcely be better expended in developing any artery than this particular river, the Clinch, and its branches. The country through which they flow is fertile in minerals and its agricultural productions are unsurpassed by those of any equal area within my knowledge.

They have never had a dime of appropriation made for improvements by the General Government, and I am sure that the amount of the appropriation which is asked for now for this stream will more than repay the country ten times over in five years if it be granted.

Mr. ALLISON. So far as the committee could make investigation they found no estimate for this appropriation. I think there is no estimate for this work nor has there been any survey by the board of engineers. I am very glad to know from the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Tennessee that this is a valuable improvement, and if it will have the effect to open up this great, beautiful, and broad river, that argument may have weight with the Senate.

Mr. KEY. The Government has property there now worth $100,000 that has been devoted to opening up the Tennessee River, and when the $15,000 appropriated by this bill for that are expended that property can be applied to their work without any new expenditure.

Mr. ALLISON. The only reason the committee struck this out was that they could find no data upon which to recommend it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to strike out lines 147 and 148.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WITHERS. I have to suggest a verbal amendment which was inadvertently omitted by the clerk in transcibing, as I am informed by the Representative of the district, and that was to insert "and Virginia" after "Tennessee;" so as to read:

For the improvement of Clinch River, Tennessee and Virginia, $12,000.

Mr. KEY. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be considered as agreed to, if there be no objection. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations will be read.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 149 and 150, in the following words:

For the improvement of the Hiawassee River, Tennessee, $10,000.

Mr. KEY. What I have said of the Clinch River applies to this, except that this river rises in North Carolina instead of Virginia. It is a very valuable river, and boats run on it already. Ten thousand dollars will help it very much.

Mr. ALLISON. I feel bound to place on record the information we were able to gather in reference to this river. The engineer in charge states that the commerce of the river is very limited. It was found that the cost of giving it a channel two feet in depth, the depth adapted for the tonnage, would be out of all proportion to the amount of benefit to be derived from it; and accordingly the estimate is based upon a depth of two feet at low water and a channel the width of forty feet. That is what it is proposed to do in this river to get a depth of water of two feet and a channel forty feet wide.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 151 and 152, in the following words:

For the improvement of the Powell River, Virginia and Tennessee, $10,000.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was in line 153, after the words "Cumberland River," to strike out "above" and insert "below;" in line 154, after "Tennessee," to strike out "from Nashville to the Kentucky line $25,000, and thence to the foot of Smith's Shoals $20,000; and for Smith's Shoals, $30,000," and insert "$35,000;" so as to make the clause read:

For the improvement of Cumberland River below the city of Nashville, Tennessee, $35,000.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, on the theory of the committee I am at a loss to know why they propose this amendment. They certainly will not deny that the river here provided for is one of importance and has heretofore received appropriations from the Government for its improvement. In the Book of Estimates the estimate for it is $250,000, and this appropriation agreed on by the Representatives of Tennessee and Kentucky bordering on the river is $75,000, apportioned as agreed upon by the House.

Now, if there is any one conversant with the facts who has suggested to the committee a change in that arrangement and a reason for it, I should be glad to know why they propose to change that which was agreed upon by the Representatives from both the States of Kentucky and Tennessee bordering upon this river—a lengthy river, navigable for many hundreds of miles above the city of Nashville and below. The Book of Estimates, I say, contains an estimate of $250,000 for the work above and below the city; but the Representatives agreed to take $75,000 and apportion it as here agreed by the House. I do not see any reason why the committee on their own theory should have changed it. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. The House bill proposes to expend in all $98,000 upon the Cumberland River above Nashville, Tennessee, and does not propose any expenditure on the Cumberland River below Nashville. The estimated cost of the proposed improvement above Nashville is $235,000, of which the engineer states that $100,000 might be economically expended during this year. The estimated cost of improving the Cumberland below Nashville, Tennessee, is $284,000, of which $100,000 might be appropriately expended during this year.

Mr. COOPER. One hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars, I think.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; that only makes the case stronger. Now the House have appropriated $100,000 in round numbers for the Upper Cumberland and nothing for the Lower Cumberland. The engineer in charge of this work, Major McFarland, in his revised estimates, states that the Upper Cumberland might be omitted altogether, and that $35,000 is the lowest sum that he can get along with on the Lower Cumberland below Nashville. The Committee on Appropriations adopted the suggestions of the engineer in charge of this work; and inasmuch as not one dollar has hitherto been expended upon the Upper Cumberland, we thought it more prudent and economical to follow the estimate of the engineer in charge and give $35,000 to the Lower Cumberland, and postpone the improvement above Nashville until next year.

I wish to call the special attention of the Senate to the fact that this bill provides nothing for the Cumberland below Nashville, and appropriates $100,000 for the Cumberland above Nashville, in the States of Tennessee and Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, the simple question then is whether the Senate will agree with the engineer in charge or with those who represent the people as to the expenditure of money agreed by the engineer to be necessary in order to improve the river. The Representatives along that river say that their people will be greatly benefited by this appropriation being expended on the Upper Cumberland. The engineer says you had better expend it on the Lower Cumberland. The engineers agree that to improve the river would require $300,000 or $400,000, and that $275,000 might be advantageously expended this year on the whole river. The Representatives along the river, both above and below, meet together and say, "Under your estimates we are entitled to $400,000, but Congress is unable to give us more than $98,000; now, give that to us above the city of Nashville; it is more advantageous to our people; it is less money than your own engineers say could be justly expended." Which will the Senate follow, your engineer in charge or the Representatives of the people along the line of that river? It seems to me that the people through their Representatives ought to be listened to.

Mr. STEVENSON. A portion of Kentucky is deeply interested in the improvement of the Upper Cumberland. Some of our Kentucky rivers flowing through a rich mineral and lumber region empty into the Cumberland, and their only means of access to market is by the Cumberland when properly improved to Nashville. It is true, as the honorable Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] who has charge of the bill says, that no appropriation for the improvement of the Upper Cumberland has been made, but it is equally true that the Chief Engineer, who made this report, says:

No appropriation has ever yet been made for this purpose; but the improvement appears to be one which must exercise an important influence upon the prosperity of the State of Tennessee, and especially upon its capital, and is one which deserves the attention of Congress. One hundred thousand dollars could be well expended during the coming year in this improvement.

In addition to what he so well says about Tennessee, a good deal might be added about the coal and lumber products of Kentucky. An appropriation was made for the Cumberland River, both above and below Nashville. The Representatives in the other House, as I am informed, met and agreed in writing as to the amounts in which the appropriation should be divided. By that agreement the amount to be appropriated to the Cumberland above Nashville was put into the House bill, which the Senate committee have stricken out, and I hope the Senate will not concur in the proposed amendment of the Senate committee in striking out the appropriation to the Cumberland above Nashville. That amendment is in open disregard of the known wishes of the Representatives in the House from several of the districts concerned, as expressed in their written agreement. I hope the amendment will be disagreed to and the appropriation in the House bill be restored.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert as lines 162, 163, 164, and 165 the following words:

For removal of Beaver and Sailor Bend rocks and for cleaning out snags and fallen trees in the Little Kanawha, West Virginia, $7,300.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does that mean? I should like to hear it explained.

Mr. ALLISON. The Little Kanawha is a small river in West Virginia on which it is stated there is considerable navigation, and the engineer informs us that by an expenditure of $7,300 a few rocks can be taken out of the stream and thereby enable a certain class of vessels to go up it some eighty miles. The committee thought on examination it was wise to give this small sum.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The only query in my mind about it is that I see "fallen trees" are also to be taken out, and I wanted to ask the committee whether they were to be taken out to the very source of the river, to its fountain springs, or in some of the lower parts of the stream. I suppose as the clause stands the object is to take them all out from the top spring to the bottom of the stream.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the terms of the appropriation would answer the Senator's question. The sum is $7,300. The Little Kanawha is a river of some importance to the State of West Virginia, upon which there are oil-works to a considerable extent, and a great many who have speculated in oil know something about it. Some seasons as much as 200,000 barrels of oil come down this stream. There are now, by individual enterprise, locks and dams constructed for about forty miles on this river. The engineers, by their examination, say that there are rocks at certain places in the river and certain trees have fallen in which obstruct navigation, and $7,300 will take them out, and that will add to the present lock-and-dam improvement about sixty-three miles of navigation. That is the whole of the case.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 169, to increase the appropriation for the improvement of the Chattahoochee and Flint Rivers, Georgia, from $20,000 to $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 170, 171, and 172, in the following words:

For continuing the work of dredging and removing obstructions to navigation in Cypress Bayou, Texas, $30,000.

Mr. MAXEY. It will be observed that this appropriation is for continuing the work of dredging Cypress Bayon. I would state to the Senate that the city of Jefferson, a place of twelve or fifteen thousand inhabitants, is at the head of that bayon in Eastern Texas, and that place is connected by water with the city of New Orleans. Down that stream comes quite a large commerce in cotton; last year, I believe, 40,000 or 50,000 bales. An appropriation of $50,000 was made by the United States to dredge out the Cypress Bayon between that point and where the bayou enters the Red River, above Shreveport. In addition to that, the people of Jefferson expended $20,000 for a dredge-boat, which was turned over to the Government to aid in that matter, and the State in like manner has expended a large amount of money. This is important, and I speak from personal knowledge, and ask that the amendment be non-concurred in.

Mr. ALLISON. I think I ought to say that the committee struck out this item for the reason that the engineers report that it is only a temporary work in its nature and character.

Mr. MAXEY. I know the character of the place perfectly well. I know that an improvement has been made there, and I know that it is important. From the member from that district, who lives there, I have lying on my table now a complete statement of the commerce of that place, which I know is large. I do not want to trouble the Senate by reading it. I will add that a railroad is now in the course of construction at the rate of three miles a day connecting the town in which I live with Jefferson, which will be done by the 1st of September; and in view of the rapid development of Texas this appropriation should be granted.

Mr. ALLISON. I only wish to state why the committee proposed to strike out this appropriation. The engineer states that the work is only temporary in its character, and then goes on to state, speaking of the decay of trade at this town of Jefferson:

But there are other causes existing that have had this effect, and among them is the completion of the Cairo and Fulton Railroad, which passes through Jefferson and has caused the trade of the country which had Jefferson for a shipping and receiving point to be diverted to other points north and south, so that to the removal of the raft alone Jefferson cannot attribute the decline of her trade.

Mr. MAXEY. Right there, if the Senator from Iowa will permit me, I will say that the additional road which I have spoken of is the transcontinental branch of the Texas Pacific that terminates at Jefferson.

Mr. ALLISON. The engineer continues:

These facts are stated in order that it be determined whether, in view of the cost of the plan of relief presented, the improvement be carried out.

It was a question for the committee whether or not this expenditure of $30,000 should be incurred in continuing this work when other causes seem to be operating upon the trade of Jefferson, and when the engineer in charge makes no estimate for this year. Of course if the Senate think otherwise they will vote accordingly.

Mr. MAXEY. The city of Jefferson itself has gone to an expense of over a million of dollars to secure those railroads, the most important one of which I have just now named, the Texas Pacific, and the East Line road is now under contract. Of course the result will be to bring more commerce there. That region is in one of the richest parts of the whole State of Texas. The appropriation is right properly passed by the House, and it ought to be granted.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 173 to 178, in the following words:

For the improvement at Sabine Pass, and for improvement of Blue-Buck Bar and Sabine Bay, and for deepening the channel over the bar at the mouth of the Sabine River, and for deepening of the channel over the bar at the mouth of Neches River, where these rivers enter Sabine Bay, $60,000.

Mr. MAXEY. On that appropriation made by the House I ask that the Senate amendment be non-concurred in, and I will especially call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that the estimate was not found in the book, so that, I presume, he was thereby misled; but I know that the estimate was made, and that the appropriation was according to the rule adopted by the House within the estimate. I have in my possession now an official estimate from the Chief of Engineers, General Humphreys, and I will read so much of it as explains his reason for not including it in the regular Book of Estimates originally:

By reference to my last annual report it will be observed that no estimate was submitted for continuing the work of improvement at Sabine Pass, Texas. The reason for this omission was that it was believed the work would have progressed so far under the last appropriation as to enable the officer in charge to determine whether an open cut through the bar would be permanent. This has not, however, been satisfactorily shown as yet; but in view of the growing importance of the interests concerned, it is not deemed advisable to await further developments, and I have therefore to submit an estimate for continuing the improvement now in progress, for a channel of twelve feet depth, during the next fiscal year, of $83,000.

Again, it will be observed that this is for continuing an improvement already in progress. The amount proposed was $83,000. The amount appropriated is $60,000. I will add that the Sabine River is the dividing line between the State of Louisiana and the State of Texas, and there are hundreds of thousands of acres of the finest white-pine lands along the Sabine, the only place in Texas where white pine is found, and the commerce of the country demands that that white pine shall be got out. Men connected with shipping say that the best spars and the best masts that can be obtained, since the pine forests in Maine have been so much depleted, can be found on the Sabine River in the State of Texas. Twelve feet of water there will give an outlet to enable it to go to the commerce of the world.

In addition to that we have as fine cypress there as anywhere in the world. Seventy million shingles were shipped down that river last year. They have four, five, or six steamboats on it, besides sloops and schooners. Twelve thousand bales of cotton were sent down that river last year.

In view of all these things and the fact that it is a continuance of a work which is essential to the development of that portion of the country, I ask that the amendment be non-concurred in and that the bill as passed by the House be sustained.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out from line 179 to 181, in the following words:

For deepening the channel over the bar at the mouth of the Trinity River where it enters Galveston Bay, $12 500.

Mr. MAXEY. It will be observed that there is not a dollar asked toward the improvement of Trinity River. Trinity River is navigable for some five hundred miles, carrying thousands of bales of cotton to commerce. The river empties into Galveston Bay about forty miles from the city of Galveston. The bar is formed where the river debouches into the bay; and all that we ask is this $12,500 to remove that bar in order that the commerce of the Trinity River, which covers nearly thirty counties, can get full ingress and egress. The appropriation is small; but it is for the simple removal of a bar which has formed across the mouth of the river where it enters the bay.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 182 and 183, in the following words:

For the improvement of Pass Cavallo, inlet to Matagorda Bay, Texas, $40,000.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, there is a line of steamships already in full operation between the city of New Orleans and Powder Horn, which is the port of entry of Indianola. In order to get to Powder Horn these vessels have to pass up this Pass Cavallo. It will be borne in mind by those who have kept up with the history of the country that last fall we had a terrible cyclone in Texas that devastated almost that entire coast country. The city of Indianola, which is the commercial point of which Powder Horn is the port of entry, was swept away. There is leading now from the city of Indianola in the direction of San Antonio a railroad, which has been carried a distance of about eighty miles from San Antonio, which will connect the city of San Antonio, the largest and most flourishing city in Western Texas, with salt water and with the commerce of the world.

This Pass Cavallo, or bar at the mouth separating the Gulf from the port of entry at Powder Horn, was largely accumulated by reason of the cyclone that we suffered from last fall. The people of that section were prostrated; so much so that in the city of Boston—and I thank God that the hearts of the northern people do open out toward southern men sometimes—the people of Boston sent their money down there to help us out. We cannot remove the obstruction; we have not got the money. This opens up to commerce a magnificent portion of the country, perfectly well known to my colleague who lives in that portion of the State, and I assert here as a Senator from that State that I regard this appropriation as necessary, and I ask my colleague if that statement is not correct.

Mr. HAMILTON. In addition to what my colleague has said, the port of Indianola, in the way of entrance to which stands Pass Cavallo, is the outlet for a large and growing section of country. Railroads are now extending out to the westward in addition to the facilities hitherto enjoyed in that country for its commerce. Last September a gale swept over that coast, and while it damaged the town very greatly it improved the navigation of the bar, opened a channel several feet deeper than it had been for many years before; but it is not straight. It requires an additional sum now to clear out all the obstructions; and although there is no estimate made for this work by the engineer during the last year, only during the last Congress surveys were made all along that coast and a system of improvements recommended which was designed to be tested at Galveston first, because all these bars are similar. There is a good deal of quicksand, and the bars are shifting, the channel is shifting; and the Government has entered upon a system of experiments at Galveston, which the engineers think will be entirely successful. That work is now in progress, and it withstood the tempest of last fall very thoroughly. The intention was, as soon as that was completed, to apply the same system to Pass Cavallo and to the bar which furnishes an inlet to the towns of Rockport and Corpus Christi, both very important places on the coast, and not one solitary dollar has ever been appropriated by the Government for the improvement of either one of these places. They have almost been lost sight of. They lie a long way off, and there are so many very important points demanding the attention of the engineers of the Government that somehow or other these outside places have not had the attention they really deserve.

The sum is inconsiderable, and inasmuch as it is the first money appropriated for these places, I hope the Senator from Iowa will not persist in objecting. I hope the amendment of the committee will not be concurred in in regard to both Pass Cavallo Bar and the other point.

Mr. MAXEY. I am under many obligations to my colleague for making the statements that he has submitted. Now, while it may appear to some gentlemen that it is singular we should ask for these various things, it should be borne in mind that we have twelve hundred miles of coast; it should be borne in mind that we have increased our population since the census of 1870 more than double; it should be borne in mind that last year we sent 600,000 bales of cotton to market; it should be borne in mind that the interests of the United States demand that there should be free means of ingress and egress to the commerce of this great and growing State. I most earnestly ask the Senate to non-concur in this amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. The two amendments from line 182 to 183 and line 184 to 186, as suggested by the Senator on my right from Texas, [Mr. HAMILTON,] may as well be considered together. The committee struck these items out of the bill for the reason that they are experimental in their character. There is no stone at either of these points, and therefore the only possible way of making an improvement is the adoption of the experiments now going on at Galveston. As I remember these locations, they are in the extreme southeast corner of Texas.

Mr. HAMILTON. The first one, Pass Cavallo, is about the center of the coast of Texas. The other is a little farther west.

Mr. ALLISON. If these improvements are entered upon they must go on according to the experiments now being made at Galveston. If these experiments at Galveston should prove unsuccessful, then every dollar of money we appropriate here will be money thrown away. I ask Senators to bear in mind that we have left in this bill $300,000 for the harbor of Galveston. We have permitted these engineers to go on and make these experiments, and given them ample money and opportunity to make the experiments at Galveston, and I do not think it is prudent for us to have them enter upon the same experiments at two other points in the State of Texas. These experiments are made with basket jetties filled with sand; and, as was said by the Senator from Texas, [Mr. HAMILTON,] they did withstand the storms of last winter, but they have only had one test. Is it wise for us to commence this experiment again at Pass Cavallo?

Mr. MAXEY. I will state to the Senator that the test made was such as has not been put upon any public work for fifty years. The test, the cyclone of last fall, was a very severe one, and it stood it boldly and rode it out.

Mr. ALLISON. The experiment may be successful; but here are two appropriations, one of $40,000 and one of $10,000, without any estimate of any engineer for the improvement, without any recommendation so far as I know on the subject.

Mr. MAXEY. I have the estimates here.

Mr. ALLISON. But not this year. And why? Because this is experimental. Now the Senate puts in every little river, every little harbor, and every little streamlet in the United States against the suggestions of the committee, when we have read over and over again here reports showing that improvements in this bill are unnecessary, unimportant, and a waste of money; and now we propose to add $50,000 for experimental basket jetties at two ports upon the Gulf of Mexico, and call it economy!

Mr. President, I do not believe this money ought to be appropriated at this time. I believe it may turn out to be an absolute waste of money; and therefore the committee adheres to its recommendation in favor of striking out this $50,000; and I trust the Senate will concur.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, this is no untried experiment. I stated to the Senator that when that cyclone swept over the coast of Texas last fall, such a one as no public work has been subjected to for fifty years, the work at Galveston Island withstood that and rode it out boldly. I say more than that, the system of jetties, so far as they have been carried on—and you have only to look at the mouth of the Mississippi River, you have only to look at Galveston—is proving to be one of the most magnificent experiments ever made by the Engineer Corps, and I say if successful it will save the United States Government millions of dollars.

I stated that I intended to appeal to the mercy of the Senator, or rather to his kindly heart, for he has one. These people had all they had on earth swept from them by the cyclone last fall; their commerce was stricken down for the time being; and yet the line of steamships was kept up by its owner; the work on the railroad was continued; and it is necessary, as my colleague has well told you, for an outlet to a great, growing, and prosperous country back of it; and they have no other means. Now I ask if the request I have made is unreasonable? It is right and should be passed, and I ask that it shall be.

Mr. ALLISON. I think I shall ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 10, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Conkling, Howe, Oglesby, Saulsbury, Wallace, West, Windom, and Wright—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Barnum, Bayard, Bogy, Caperton, Christiancy, Cockrell, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Ferry, Gordon, Hamilton, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Key, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Spencer, Stevenson, and Withers—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Eaton, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, Logan, McCreery, McMillan, Morrill, Morton, Paddock, Sargent, Sharon, Sherman, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Whyte—31.

So the amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 184 to 186, in the following words:

For the improvement of Aransas Pass and approaches to Rockport and Corpus Christi Harbors, Texas, $10,000.

Mr. HAMILTON. I thought the Senator from Iowa put this item with the preceding amendment which has just been voted upon.

Mr. ALLISON. They ought to stand together. I do not make any point on this amendment, the other having been rejected.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORWOOD. In lines 187 and 188 I offer a verbal amendment so as to make the clause more intelligible. I send the amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out lines 187 and 188, in the following words:

For the improvement of the Coosa River, Georgia, $40,000.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For the improvement of the Coosa River from Rome, Georgia, to the bridge of the Selma, Rome and Dalton Railroad Company, in Alabama, $40,000.

Mr. NORWOOD. That is merely to designate more particularly where the work is to be done.

Mr. SPENCER. This amendment ought to be adopted. I was going to offer the same amendment myself. I think the Senator in charge of the bill will accept it.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no objection to the amendment. We supposed the engineer would expend this money between the points named in the amendment. Therefore under the circumstances there is no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to this amendment? If there is none, the amendment will be considered as agreed to. The Clerk will report the next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 189, after the word "Arkansas," to insert "and Louisiana;" and to strike out "eight" and insert "fifteen;" so as to read:

For the improvement of the Ouachita River, Arkansas and Louisiana, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 191 and 192, in the following words:

For the improvement of the Tombigbee River, Alabama, $13,950.

Mr. SPENCER. I hope that this amendment will not be adopted. I feel called upon to ask the Senator in charge of the bill why we should strike out so important a river as the Tombigbee? Appropriations have been made for it for several years. The stream drains a large portion of the State of Mississippi and several hundred miles of the State of Alabama. It is one of the important water-courses of this country. I am thoroughly astonished that the committee should have stricken out this appropriation. I hope the Senate will not concur with the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. I am rather astonished myself, Mr. President, that we should have made this amendment in view of the votes that we have had upon all the amendments of the committee thus far. I will state for the information of the Senator from Alabama that we made this amendment on the statement of the engineer in charge that no engineering or commercial need for appropriations for the Tombigbee and Pascagoula Rivers existed. Upon that statement we thought we would strike it out. We are evidently wrong.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator cannot be very well acquainted with the resources of the States of Alabama and Mississippi and the geography of the country if he does not know that the Tombigbee River is a very important stream. I hope the Senate will not concur in the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPT ACT.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Iowa gives me leave to ask the Senate to hear a report from a conference committee. I submit the report.

The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference of the Senate and House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill of the Senate No. 332, to amend the act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1867, and for other other purposes," approved June 22, 1874, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to the two Houses, respectively, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and concur therein with an amendment, as follows:

Strike out all of the amendment of the House after the word "that" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Section 5108 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 5108. At any time after the expiration of six months from the adjudication of bankruptcy, or, if no debts have been proved against the bankrupt, or if no assets have come to the hands of the assignee, at any time after expiration of sixty days and before the final disposition of the cause, the bankrupt may apply to the court for a discharge from his debts. This section shall apply in all cases heretofore or hereafter commenced."

And that the House concur in the same.

A. G. THURMAN,
GEO. G. WRIGHT,
GEO. F. EDMUNDS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
WM. P. LYNDE,
SCOTT LORD,
WM. P. FRYE,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment of the committee is in line 194, to increase the appropriation "for the improvement of the harbor at Cedar Keys, Florida," from $10,000 to $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 196, to increase the appropriation "for the improvement of the Lower Willamette and Columbia Rivers from Portland, Oregon, to the sea" from $15,000 to $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 199, to increase the appropriation "for the improvement of the Upper Willamette River, Oregon," from $15,000 to $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 202 and 203, in the following words:

For breakwater at Wilmington, California, $30,000.

Mr. BOOTH. I do not wish to be so eccentric as not to say anything in regard to this amendment. I will state frankly that I have approved of the theory of the committee; but if the theory is not to be adopted, I should like to know why this item should be made an exception. I will say in regard to this amendment, and in regard to the appropriation for Monterey Harbor, which has also been stricken out by the committee, that California has a coast line of about fifteen hundred miles. The only two good harbors are at San Francisco and San Diego. The breakwater at Wilmington has been in progress for a great many years, and I believe the appropriation has not heretofore been omitted. If there is any very good reason for omitting it this year I shall not press my opposition to the amendment. In regard to Monterey, I will state that that is a port of considerable importance on account of its railway connection with one of the best wheat-growing districts in the State. It is in a fair way to become the best harbor in all respects except the harbors at San Francisco and San Diego. I understand the appropriation to be simply for a breakwater, and if it can be made a good harbor, very much of the wheat in that portion of the State which is now compelled to go by the railway system of the State will be able to find transportation by vessels from the coast. If there is any good reason for striking out these appropriations I shall not insist on retaining them; but as the theory of the committee has been entirely broken down, I ask to have these two items retained.

Mr. ALLISON. The committee understand that this is the beginning of a new work for a breakwater at Wilmington. We have hitherto expended a considerable sum of money in extending the piers out from the harbor. The work will be expensive. I am told that very near this point there is a very good harbor without cost to the Government; I have forgotten the name of it. The colleague of the Senator [Mr. SARGENT] was entirely willing that this item should be stricken out. He regarded it as an unnecessary expenditure of money. Upon his recommendation the committee omitted it. I think the Senator will find that there is no necessity for this appropriation.

Mr. BOOTH. There is certainly no good harbor near Wilmington.

Mr. FERRY. I am very glad that the golden opportunity is offered to gain us the support of the "golden slope." We have not happily had the support of my friend from California on my right, because he has concurred with the committee, and I trust that if now we stand by him he will stand by us.

Mr. BOOTH. I do not think the Senator from Michigan wants to make any bargain at all. If the general theory of the committee had been sustained I should not have said one word, for I candidly have not given the attention to this subject that the committee have. I was willing to adopt their judgment; but if their theory is to go all to pieces, I should like to save a little from the wreck.

Mr. FERRY. Upon that principle I suppose the Senator will be sustained. The Senate has declared in regard to a part of this bill that it would not follow the mean line of policy adopted by the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not parliamentary language. I call my friend to order.

Mr. FERRY. I do not use it in an offensive sense. There are two meanings to the word "mean," I will inform the Senator from Vermont. There are two different kinds of meanness.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is a means to an end.

Mr. FERRY. And justifiable means as well. It was only in that sense I was sustaining the Senator from California, and especially in the absence of his colleague coming to his support in opposing this amendment. It is upon that basis that I have acted. Wherever a Senator from a State has declared an appropriation to be necessary I have been willing to support it, and I shall support it cheerfully in this case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have tried as hard as I could to stand by the committee, because I believed that with their better means of examination and scrutiny and with a view to that great retrenchment and reform that has been so much preached, they could tell better what to strike out than we could. I have voted with them every time; but I find that a majority of the Senate is of opinion that retrenchment and reform, as that song has been sung, is a mere humbug, intended for "the ears of the groundlings;" and that whatever in and of itself is right and proper and useful for the public advantage ought to be put into this bill. I am satisfied now from the statement of the Senator from California that this thing is a useful and proper thing in and of itself; and as that is the basis of his proposition I shall vote for it.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 209, after "San Joaquin River," to strike out "below Stockton, California, to be applied below Stockton," and insert "California;" so as to read:

For the improvement of San Joaquin River, California, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 212 and 213, in the following words:

For the improvement of Monterey Harbor, California, $12,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope this amendment will be concurred in. This is a small harbor at Monterey. I do not see the Senator from California [Mr. BOOTH] present.

Mr. KEY. The Senator from California left the Chamber for a moment.

Mr. ALLISON. The engineers have made a careful estimate of its cost and have presented, I think, three different modes of improvement, the lowest being $7,000,000 and the highest $12,000,000. To begin this work the House have appropriated $12,000. The committee thought it was rather too small a sum to begin a work costing either $7,000,000 or $12,000,000.

Mr. KEY. The Senator from California is absent from the Chamber for a moment. I think the amendment ought not to be disposed of until he returns.

Mr. WEST. In the present temper of the Senate I think he can trust it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate cannot wait on the Senator from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the next amendment.

Mr. BOOTH. I understand that when I was out of the Chamber a moment ago the amendment which I really was anxious to have non-concurred in was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the fact.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the committee to strike out the appropriation of $12,000 for the improvement of Monterey Harbor, California.

Mr. BOOTH. I wish that amendment non-concurred in under the circumstances. I spoke of it before, and really it is of much more importance than Wilmington, and is the place in regard to which I principally addressed my remarks.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no doubt it is a very important place, but fearing the voice of the Senator from Iowa was not quite loud enough to be heard in this corner of the Chamber, I desire to repeat what he said a little while ago, that the careful estimates of the engineer show that the improvements will cost only from $7,000,000 to $12,000,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean to say that some of the estimates are careful and others are not?

Mr. WINDOM. I mean that all are careful.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator said "the careful estimates."

Mr. WINDOM. The House proposed to appropriate $12,000. It seems to me that unless very great progress can be made this year, certainly the Senate ought to vote the item out. It would not be a very valuable commencement of a twelve-million-dollar work to expend $12,000 this year, and certainly it will be in the line of economy, since the facts are known, for us to strike it out and not begin now.

Mr. CONKLING. But "tall oaks from little acorns grow."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment striking out.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 218 and 219, in the following words:

For the improvement of the harbor at Little Sodus Bay, New York, $5,000.

Mr. CONKLING. I voted with the committee every time until we reached Monterey; I weakened a little on Monterey, I confess.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We had a battle there once.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope, inasmuch as the committee has been disagreed with in nearly all other cases, the chairman of the committee will bear me out in saying that this is an instance in which the reasons for preserving the House bill are very much stronger than in many of the other cases where it has been adopted by the Senate. I think my friend from Iowa will sustain me in the same observation, when I make it, which I shall do, about some of the earlier items in the bill. I think the whole committee will agree that the items in the State of New York which have been stricken out are, for more cogent and pressing reasons, important, and come nearer the view of the committee than a large part of the amendments which have been disagreed to. I ask the Senator from Iowa whether I am not right in this statement?

Mr. ALLISON. For Little Sodus Bay we had an estimate of $17,000. The committee on reading the report thought the whole sum ought to be appropriated at one time. Therefore, in view of the economy that we propose, we thought we could not appropriate $17,000 now, and hence omitted the appropriation entirely. It is a meritorious improvement. I will say to the Senator from New York that this is also one of those little harbors of refuge that we have heard something about in the debate.

Mr. CONKLING. It is a harbor of refuge on Lake Ontario. It is a necessary harbor. It is a harbor in which improvements have been partially made, and they are waiting and suffering for continuance. As my colleague [Mr. KERNAN] reminds me, it is the terminus of a railroad, the Southern Railroad, and there is considerable traffic there. I could say other things about it; but I cannot think that in view of the judgment of the Senate they will select any one State to be excepted from a rule applicable to the other States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the committee to strike out the appropriation.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 221, to increase the appropriation "for the improvement of the Schuylkill River, Pennsylvania," from $18,000 to $28,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question upon the amendment, and declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. WALLACE. I hope not.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the Senate must have voted under a misapprehension. The amendment increases the appropriation made by the House.

Mr. CONKLING. Then it will certainly carry.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was a misapprehension!

Mr. WALLACE. Owing to the increased terminal facilities on the Lower Schuylkill near Philadelphia, a very largely increased amount of shipping has been thrown into that part of the Schuylkill River. It is necessary to increase the depth of water in order to accommodate the large amount of grain and oil shipped from the lower part of the city of Philadelphia so as to enter the Delaware and go thence to the sea. The engineer recommended an appropriation of, I believe, $50,000. The committee have increased the appropriation made by the House from $18,000 to $28,000. It is indispensable that this appropriation at least be made in order that the great commerce at that port be accommodated. It is one of the most important improvements that can be added to the commerce of the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. CONKLING. Evidently the question on the amendment was taken under a misapprehension.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment striking out "$18,000" and inserting "$28,000" for the improvement of the Schuylkill River. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not quite ready. I am in favor of this amendment, although I voted under a misapprehension against it just now. I have been along the Schuylkill lately below the Fairmount dam, and I have observed that it really needs improvement. It is covered with coal-oil and a great many things of that kind that ought to be cleared out; and the Delaware, a comparatively unimportant river just up there, does not seem to be large enough to hold the shipping. I am satisfied, therefore, that there cannot be any doubt that the Lower Schuylkill, to say nothing of the upper, the committee ought to have provided for, as they did for the Little Kanawha, &c., and the falling trees ought to be provided for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER again put the question and declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. WALLACE. Divide, Mr. President.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire, is it understood by a majority of the Senate that the amendment of the committee in this case is to increase an appropriation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has stated that fact some two or three times.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I cannot understand why the committee is not sustained in this case. It seems to me that if the Senate understand it there can be no question.

Mr. COCKRELL. I doubt not that the committee ought to be sustained on principle. The distinguished Senator from New York voted, I believe, to sustain every proposition coming from the committee increasing the appropriations made by the House. I believe I voted against every one of them and I have voted against this one. I am not astonished at the distinguished Senator from New York stating that we voted under a misapprehension, because I believe it has been the rule of the Senate to increase every appropriation.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, if the honorable Senator wishes to decorate me, I should like him to be a little more accurate. I have not voted to increase every appropriation; far from it. I have voted on this bill to stand by the committee in every case until we reached Monterey. That case struck me very much as a word struck the old lady who listened to a sermon. She said she was not very much moved until the preacher came to that beautiful word, "Mesopotamia." When we reached Monterey I deserted the committee, but until that time I stood by them in all their amendments to this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. A division has been called for.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have had debate since then.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 222, 223, and 224, in the following words:

For the improvement of the Delaware River between Trenton and White Hill, New Jersey, $7,500.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to. I understand that that is a work of dredging which has been going on there for some years. I have looked at the report. Some $25,000 has been expended. My colleague, who is just now absent from the Chamber, has looked into the case.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 225 and 226, in the following words:

For the improvement of the harbor at Bridgeport, Connecticut, $15,000.

Mr. EATON. I have a word to say in regard to this amendment. I think the committee will bear me witness that I have been willing to stand by them in striking out appropriations for all the States. It is not the temper of the Senate to do it, however, and I desire to see this improvement given to my own State. Bridgeport is a town of twenty-five or thirty thousand inhabitants, of very considerable foreign trade, and the terminus of two railroads. Really this appropriation is necessary for the harbor there.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator from Connecticut a question?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator says it is a town of very considerable foreign trade. May I ask what was the total amount of duties received on foreign merchandise at that port during the last fiscal year?

Mr. EATON. I am not able to inform the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did it amount to $3,000,000, or so?

Mr. EATON. Not more than a million and a half, in my judgment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why, not more than that?

Mr. EATON. Not more than a million and a half; probably not quite so much as that; but it is a smart town, deserving of the appropriation, if any town is deserving of an appropriation of this character. That is all I have to say. I desire that the Senate shall stand by its own action in regard to Bridgeport.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 231 and 232, in the following words:

For the improvement of the harbor at Saugatuck, Michigan, $3,000.

Mr. FERRY. I believe this is the first time I have asked the Senate to-day to non-concur in an amendment for Michigan. It takes the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] by surprise, but it is a fact. I will state that I had introduced an amendment increasing this appropriation to $5,000, and had it referred to the committee; but the action was a sort of boomerang one. It seems they have stricken out the whole item. I trust the Senate will non-concur in the amendment of the committee and restore the $3,000. It is necessary. The Engineer Department have reported that this should be given so as to keep off the demolition of the improvements already made. I trust the Senate will non-concur.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 233, after the word "harbor" to insert "and river;" and in line 234 to strike out "twelve" and insert "twenty;" so as to make the clause read:

For the improvement of the harbor and river at Saint Joseph's, Michigan, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 240, to reduce the appropriation "for the improvement of the harbor at Port Washington, Wisconsin," from $12,500 to $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 243, to increase the appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Oswego, New York, from $70,000 to $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 244 and 245, in the following words:

For the improvement of the harbor at Waddington, New York, $5,000.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire of the Senator from Iowa is there no estimate or recommendation for that?

Mr. ALLISON. There is no estimate. There have been several appropriations made for Waddington, and the engineer's reports show that the work has been practically completed. They say that no further estimate is made.

Mr. CONKLING. Did the Senator say that the engineer reports that the work is practically completed?

Mr. ALLISON. Practically completed, as I remember.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator is right about that——

Mr. ALLISON. I will read the report:

The original estimate for this harbor was $17,000, which would have completed all the work then intended; it was deemed best, however, to make some further improvements, and up to the close of the fiscal year $25,000 has been appropriated, of which $19,983.17 has been expended. No further appropriation will be required for the harbor.

I merely state this for the information of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 250, to increase the appropriation "for the improvement of Hudson River, New York," from $25,000 to $66,000.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not exactly understand the clause to which this amendment is moved. The clause reads:

For the improvement of Hudson River, New York.

New Jersey has some interest in the Hudson River. The State of New York, by its highest court, had the manhood and the integrity to declare that the boundary was the center of the river and that New Jersey had equal rights in that river. It was so held by a unanimous decision, although New Yorkers had prior to that time somewhat questioned it. I notice on the seventeenth page, where it speaks of the Hudson River, the bill says:

For dredging Hudson River in front of Jersey City, $25,000.

That is stricken out by our committee and "for the improvement of Hudson River, New York," $25,000 is increased to $66,000. I should like to know whether this $66,000 is intended to include the $25,000 which is afterward stricken out; and if it is, I should like this clause amended to say "for the improvement of the Hudson River between New York and New Jersey."

Mr. ALLISON. I will say in reply to the Senator that it is intended to include all the appropriations for the Hudson River in this line; and the paragraph read by the Senator from New Jersey was stricken out because we supposed it was included in the $66,000. I think the amendment suggested by the Senator from New Jersey ought to be inserted.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Suppose you insert then the words "and New Jersey" after "New York;" so as to read:

For the improvement of Hudson River, New York and New Jersey, $66,000.

Mr. ALLISON. Or you might strike out "New York."

Mr. CONKLING. That is the better thing to do. It would not do to put it the other way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the suggestion to strike out "New York" after "Hudson River?"

Mr. CONKLING. I do not object to that, but I should object to the other words, for I think the result might be to misapply the appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The modification will be considered as made. The question is on the amendment of the committee increasing the appropriation from $25,000 to $66,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 259 and 260, in the following words:

For the improvement of Mackey's Ferry, North Carolina, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 262, to reduce the appropriation "for the improvement of the Yazoo River, Mississippi," from $22,000 to $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 263 and 264, in the following words:

For the improvement of Pascagoula Bay, Mississippi, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER. I do not see the Senator from Mississippi here, and I know he feels a great interest in this. I know that Pascagoula Bay is a very important point and needs the appropriation. It is but a short distance from Mobile, in my State, and I am conversant with it. I hope the Senate will not agree to this amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me to read from the report of the engineers, he will concur in striking this out.

Mr. SPENCER. I do not think I shall.

Mr. ALLISON. I will read it at a venture.

An appropriation of $30,000 is recommended for this work, its expenditure being made contingent on the State of Mississippi securing from the owners of Noyes Canal a release of all claims the latter might have against the United States were the latter to proceed with works of improvement without such release. Without this precaution the United States would place itself in the position of trespasser on the rights of an individual, secured by State charter, and become responsible for damage in a sum which, owing to the indeterminate value of the right, (the question of further increase of value from presumed increase of commerce being a factor,) might amount to double or treble the value of the work.

They recommend $30,000 to be appropriated upon the condition stated. The committee were not prepared for the condition, and therefore struck out the appropriation.

Mr. SPENCER. Every public officer is supposed to do his duty, and he will not become a trespasser. I do not think there is any danger of that. I have no doubt but that the State of Mississippi will be glad to yield its rights to the Government if they will go on with the improvement. I know its importance and that many people in the State of Mississippi take great interest in it. I hope the Senate will not concur in the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. This Noyes Canal is a private corporation, and we ought hardly to enter on this improvement without the consent of its owners.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the objection of the committee to this appropriation?

Mr. SPENCER. Thirty thousand dollars is recommended by the Engineer Corps. I do not think there is any reason for the objection. I cannot conceive of any.

Mr. ALLISON. I just read from the engineer's report, showing that $30,000 is recommended upon condition that some private parties release their rights to a canal which must be improved if this work goes on.

Mr. COCKRELL. Can it not be done without the acquisition of the canal?

Mr. ALLISON. I understand not.

Mr. SPENCER. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that he move an amendment, "Provided the State of Mississippi release its rights" or that the corporation release its rights, as recommended by the engineer.

Mr. COCKRELL. Just have that inserted in.

Mr. SPENCER. It will not take long to prepare it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama offer an amendment?

Mr. SPENCER. I do offer that amendment, "Provided that the corporation named releases its rights." I do not know the name of it; I have not got the book with me.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let it be passed over until the Senator prepares his amendment, and we can go on with the rest of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to that suggestion? The Chair hears none, and the next amendment will be reported.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 265, after the word "White," to strike out "and Saint Francis Rivers" and insert "River at Buffalo Shoals;" and at the end of the clause to strike out "of which there shall be expended $10,000 upon White River and the remainder upon Saint Francis River;" so as to make the clause read:

For the improvement of White River at Buffalo Shoals, Arkansas, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 270 and 271, in the following words:

For the improvement of the Perquimons River, North Carolina, $3,000.

Mr. RANSOM. I hope that amendment will not be concurred in. I did not resist the amendment in reference to Mackey's Ferry. I wonder if the Senator from Iowa has read the report in reference to Perquimons River.

Mr. ALLISON. Perquimons River is a little stream that rises in the Dismal Swamp and runs into Albemarle Sound.

Mr. RANSOM. It is larger than all the rivers in Iowa put together except the Mississippi.

Mr. ALLISON. Is it indeed? It may be wider, but it is very much shorter. The map discloses that it is only forty-five miles long, and rises in a swamp, and is very shallow, and enters into Albemarle Sound. We thought this a very small appropriation for so big a river, I would say to my friend.

Mr. RANSOM. It is a very small appropriation for so large a river. Let me tell the Senator from Iowa one thing which he has not found out, by way of general information, that the State of North Carolina has more river shore, navigable river water, than any other State in this Union.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLISON. I must suggest now from the committee another amendment. That river should be spelled with an "a;" it should be Perquimans.

Mr. RANSOM. Yes, sir. The mistake was made by the committee and not by the geographies or our people.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What authority has the Senator from Iowa for changing the name?

Mr. ALLISON. I examined into that subject very carefully, as I have most of these amendments. It is Colton's map of North Carolina that spells it with an "a."

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out from line 274 to line 278, in the following words:

For the improvement of the Rockcastle River, Kentucky, $2,000; and, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, to be expended on Cumberland and Rockcastle Rivers above Nashville, Tennessee, $23,000.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope that item will not be stricken out. Rockcastle River was surveyed under an appropriation made by Congress in 1874. It is a river in Southeastern Kentucky which flows through a rich coal and lumber region in the State. It is a narrow river, flowing in a southeasterly course from the narrows and empties into the Cumberland. The high conglomerate cliffs set well back, forming a narrow valley composed of bottom and sloping ground, covered with a dense growth of timber where not in cultivation. On the bold prominences on either side stand immense lofty piles of rock, with their spires, recesses, and projections drawn in bold relief by nature, resembling the towers on castles in the old fatherland. From these rocky projections it takes its name of Rockcastle River.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it the old red sandstone or the new?

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not know whether it is the old or new. The engineer, Mr. McCalla, describes it as a conglomerate sandstone in his report. This river empties into the Cumberland in a little over eight miles from the narrows. A survey was ordered and made by R. C. McCalla. He recommended an appropriation of $5,000 with which to remove the large bowlders which in the lapse of ages have fallen down from the high precipitous heights on either side, dotting occasionally the narrow valley from points near the base of the cliffs to the margin of the river, and at different points more or less obstructing the channel.

The money asked for in this small appropriation is required to blast those bowlders which now obstruct even in high water lumber crafts and coal barges. Were these obstructions removed and the Cumberland River above Nashville improved, immense quantities of coal and lumber would find a market in access to Nashville. The sum of $2,000 is small; its appropriation might, I am informed, be of great convenience to the people living near this river who have no other means of access to market. The other item of $23,000 is subject to the approval of the engineer.

The engineer, Mr. McCalla, in 1874, in his report states:

Estimate for removing obstructions in Rockcastle River from the narrows to the mouth:

3,230 cubic yards blasting of stone bowlders, at $1 per cubic yard	$3,230 00
Clearing timber off banks and superintendence	1,770 00
	5,000 00

The committee has only given $2,000, and this the Senate committee struck out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are to clear the banks as well as the river, I understand?

Mr. STEVENSON. No, the banks are already cleared; but very immense rocks have fallen from the immense rocky prominences on the banks of the river and obstructed it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where the river has fallen in?

Mr. STEVENSON. No, the bowlders have fallen into the river, and at points almost obstruct at certain points its passage, but the water percolates through the mass of stone. Below the narrows a large number of these rocks can be removed, and I hope this appropriation will remain in the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. This is a little river about eight and a half miles long, and the object, I understand, of this appropriation is to knock the tops off some rocks that are lying in the river. It seems to me that it is a very worthy appropriation.

Mr. RANSOM. I hope nothing will be said about small rivers in North Carolina hereafter.

Mr. STEVENSON. My friend from Iowa is extremely facetious, but unfortunately very deficient in his geography. He is greatly mistaken when he says that Rockcastle River is only eight and a half miles long.

Mr. ALLISON. I mean from the narrows to the mouth, where this improvement is.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; but the river is sixty or seventy miles long, and flows through one of the richest coal regions in Kentucky.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And, as General Cass said about our country, capable of indefinite expansion.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; and this is a very little appropriation of $2,000, which would be of untold benefit to the country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am satisfied the Senator is right.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 281 and 282, in the following words:

For the improvement of the Ocmulgee River, Georgia, $25,000.

Mr. NORWOOD. I hope the Senate will not concur in this amendment. The Ocmulgee River is one of the most important to commerce in the State of Georgia, and we have many large rivers there. It is about four hundred miles long and navigable for that extent. Steamboats have been running upon it and doing business there ever since steamboats have been built. There are rocks that impede the navigation and there are some sand-bars. This river runs through about twenty counties, and the productions of over thirty counties are conveyed on its bosom. Nearly 100,000 bags of cotton are raised by the counties that contribute to the commerce of this river. It runs into the Altamaha, which itself enters into the sea at Darien, which is one of the largest timber ports in the United States. I am sure no appropriation has ever been made for the benefit of this river, and it is important that these obstructions should be removed. It is very frequently the case that steamboats are snagged and sunk upon this river. Fifty thousand dollars expended upon it would obviate that difficulty and contribute largely to the commerce of the river. I beg, therefore, that the Senate will not concur in this amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I only desire to say that the estimated cost of improving this river is from $600,000 to a million dollars. Five hundred and seventy-three thousand dollars is one estimate and another is a million of dollars. The appropriation here is $25,000. It seems to me hardly worth while to enter on the improvement of this river at this time.

Mr. NORWOOD. Who made those estimates?

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Frobel.

Mr. NORWOOD. I have the statement of Mr. Frobel here before me. The honorable Senator is certainly mistaken about the improvement that I am speaking of and for which this appropriation is made. Here is Mr. Frobel's estimate; it is $64,740 from Macon down to the sea-coast.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly, but this is for the improvement of the Ocmulgee River.

Mr. NORWOOD. We do not propose to run up to the head of that river. We are not going to improve the river from its beginning to its mouth, but between Macon and the seaboard; and if the Senator from Iowa will allow an amendment to that clause, I will put in "between Macon and the mouth of the river," or "between Macon and Darien."

Mr. ALLISON. I certainly have no objection to an amendment of that kind.

Mr. NORWOOD. Very well; I will move to amend the clause by inserting, after the word "river," the words "between Macon and the seaboard;" so as to make the clause read:

For the improvement of Ocmulgee River between Macon and the seaboard, $25,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the committee to strike out the clause as amended.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 283 and 284, in the following words:

For the improvement of the port of Darien, Georgia, $5,000.

Mr. NORWOOD. In reference to this amendment I have a word or two to say. As I said a moment ago, the port of Darien probably ships more timber than any other port along the Atlantic coast. I think the estimate is that the total amount of timber and lumber that is shipped from the various ports of the United States is $2,104,000 in value in round numbers, and of this amount Georgia alone ships five hundred and eighty-three thousand dollars' worth of timber and lumber, and the larger part of this goes through the port of Darien. There is a small obstruction in the water, on account of which vessels drawing a large draught cannot get up to the town of Darien, and this appropriation, only $5,000, is asked to remove that obstruction. It is important to the commerce of the place, and it is a town that I believe has never had a dollar appropriated for it by the Government. I hope the Senate will not concur in the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out from line 285 to line 287, in the following words:

For the improvement of New River from the lead mines in Wythe County, Virginia, to the mouth of Greenbrier River, West Virginia, $25,000.

Mr. WITHERS. As my friend from North Carolina said a while ago, we now come to an improvement which is one possessing real merit. This appropriation which is asked for New River——

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is why you call it New River, I suppose, because it has real merit?

Mr. WITHERS. It was named before I knew anything about the stream, and I cannot answer the question. Why it should have been so named I cannot imagine, unless it presented the novel spectacle of an immense stream running on the top of a mountain. Its course is through the whole State of Virginia, rising in North Carolina, and it is really the Great Kanawha, rising in the State of North Carolina and running almost on the top of the Alleghany Mountains, a very large, bold stream, constituting the Kanawha after its junction with the Greenbrier. There are many very large and valuable establishments—mineral works for iron, lead, zinc, and other ores—along the borders of this stream and immediately accessible to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask are "the other ores" boat-oars? [Laughter.]

Mr. WITHERS. No; the object is now to open an establishment of that kind, and if this amendment be adopted I have no doubt boat-oars would also be found on that stream. The stream is one of great magnitude, and while I am aware that the engineers in making the surveys and estimates indicate a very large sum as necessary to make the full and complete improvement of this river, yet the amount appropriated, though apparently so small, and possibly in the opinion of some Senators totally inadequate to subserve any good purpose, I am sure will be found, if the Senate will listen to me a moment, to be useful, so that the money will not be thrown away.

The Virginia and Tennessee Railroad crosses this stream at a point called Central Depot, some thirty or forty miles below the Wythe lead mines, which is the proposed commencement of this work. There are lead mines there which have been worked for nearly a century. Large quantities of zinc ore are being transmitted now from that point to Trenton, New Jersey, for smelting, and a very large number of iron-furnaces can be found along the whole course of that stream. They now have to haul the product of their mines over rough, mountainous roads a considerable distance to the railroad. At the particular point which I indicate, if this river was improved, it could be brought by water navigation to the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad. At the junction of the Greenbrier is the crossing of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad. The same conditions prevail there as at the locality which I have previously described—a rough mountain country, rich in ores and minerals of various kinds. Those works are now cut off from market for the want of a proper mode of transportation. This $25,000, if spent at either one or the other of these places, would open up a large area of country which is now entirely cut off, and enable the citizens of those localities to get their products to the railroad either at one point or the other.

I therefore hope that it will be the pleasure of the Senate to disagree to this amendment of the committee and to leave the appropriation as it passed the House.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to have the Secretary read what I have marked in the engineer's report as to this river.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

It was necessary to proceed by rail to Wytheville, and then over a mountain road about twenty-five miles to Independence, in Grayson County. From this point I visited the river, drove along the banks as far as practicable and crossed and recrossed it at several points. A cursory examination was made of the copper mines at Ore Knob and the mineral deposits at some other points.

Returning to Wytheville I visited the lead and zinc mines of Captain Raper, situated on New River, about fourteen miles from Wytheville. The following general description of the river will give an idea of its character:

Two tributary streams, which rise in the mountains of North Carolina, unite on the border of Virginia to form New River. The north fork rises at the base of the Blue Ridge, Ashe County, and the south fork at the foot of Stone Mountain, Watauga County, and they unite about five miles above the mouth of Wilson Creek, in Grayson County, Virginia. From Wilson Creek to the lead mines the distance is estimated at forty miles, and from the mines to Max Meadows, the shipping point of the Atlantic, Mississippi and Ohio Railroad, (formerly known as the Lynchburg and Tennessee Railroad,) the distance is ten miles by the turnpike, but by way of the river the distance to the railroad bridge is thirty miles. This portion of the river has been surveyed under the orders of Colonel Craighill.

The section of the river between the source and the lead mines flows among ridges of the Appalachian chain and intersects in its course fertile valleys and hill-slopes covered with forests of fine timber. Near its course may be observed precipitous cliffs of granite and limestone. Between the terminal points of the survey the river flows rapidly over a rocky bed, composed of the upturned strata of granite, gneiss, mica, micaceous schist, slate, sandstone, limestone, and ferruginous rocks in recurring series, and inclined at every angle from zero to ninety degrees. Portions of the strata may be observed beneath the water, or appearing above the surface, scattered in irregular masses along its course. These obstructions, taken in connection with the rapid descent of the stream, constitute insuperable objections to the improvement of the natural channel by lateral dams and rock excavation. I saw nothing, however, to justify the conclusion that the river could not be improved by means of locks and dams, and small sections of canals. To determine this question a careful instrumental survey will be necessary.

Mr. WITHERS. All I have to say in reply to that is, while the remarks of the engineer are strictly true as applicable to the portion of the river to which that survey referred, it is entirely above the point where this appropriation proposes that the money shall be expended. The road on which he traveled to Independence, in Grayson County, is a long way above the Wytheville lead mines. It is that portion of the river to which the engineer's attention seems to have been especially directed.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I wish to ask my friend how he proposes to expend $25,000 in this river so that it will be beneficial to its commerce after it is expended.

Mr. WITHERS. I undertook to explain how I supposed it could be done when I had the honor of addressing the Senate on the subject a few minutes ago. While I admitted the entire inadequacy of this appropriation to secure any general improvement of the New River sufficiently to be valuable, I think I did indicate how it was possible that the amount might be expended with very great benefit to the section of country lying a few miles contiguous to either of the railroads which cross this stream, thereby affording the mineral products of the region a safe and cheap method of transportation to the railway, when they can be sent out to market. I think to that extent the amount which is proposed to be appropriated by this bill is ample to secure the benefit which I have described.

Mr. SHERMAN. Unless we really intend to load down this bill as we have other river and harbor bills, so as to make it ridiculous, I appeal to the Senator from Virginia and all other Senators not to press items of this kind. This New River is a famous river in Virginia as a mountain stream, fierce in its floods, sweeping away dams like brushwood, running through a beautiful mountain country. I have crossed the river two or three times.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does it not need improvement so much the more for navigation?

Mr. SHERMAN. Twenty-five thousand dollars or two millions could not make a navigable canal of the bed of New River. All the work of man cannot prevent the freshets of those mountain torrents sweeping away the work in a single season. I have seen the river; it is a great mountain stream full of grand bowlders, running at a declivity, I should say, of forty or fifty feet to the mile.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not equal to many a railroad bridge.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we ought to stop somewhere. This is the mountain stream that we go down by the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad. I do not say an engineer cannot build a canal along there, but it would not last.

Mr. WITHERS. At the point where this stream is crossed by the Chesapeake and Ohio road——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia has exhausted his time and over.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that he proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. WITHERS. I think I might have an opportunity of correcting a misapprehension of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will be allowed to proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WITHERS. The description given by the Senator from Ohio is literally true at that point at which the Chesapeake and Ohio road crosses New River, and I will admit that $25,000 might just as well be thrown into the stream at that point as to attempt to improve the river there. But the river is of a very different character at other points which I have indicated, where it is susceptible of improvement, where the fall is a very moderate one, not exceeding a few feet in the mile, and where the removal of some obstructions and bowlders and probably the blasting out of a few ledges of rock would give a navigation of twelve or fifteen miles either way for this amount, and enable the people in that section of country and the mineral products of that region to be brought to the railroad, whence they may get an outlet to market. I tell you that now the products of that section of country through which this river passes have to be hauled by the hundreds and thousands of tons by the mountain roads in wagons to the railroad for transportation. There are tons of zinc-ore, lead, iron, and pyrites going daily over these mountains now by teams. The expenditure of this money would give them water transportation to the railroad, and thereby cheapen the cost to which they would be subjected and very much increase the production of these minerals.

Mr. CAPERTON. Mr. President, the New River of which the Senator from Ohio speaks between these points, the mouth of Greenbrier and what is called the Central bridge, is a river that is susceptible of very great improvement at very moderate expense. There is tolerable batteau navigation now, but a small expenditure of money would not only improve that navigation, but, in all probability, would put it in a condition to be navigated by a very small passenger steamboat. It is very important, inasmuch as it connects the western people with the people on the northern part of this river. It is very important in affording an outlet to the great county of Buncombe, in North Carolina, of which we have heard. It is an expenditure which will be very valuable, because it passes through an exceedingly rich mineral country and can be made exceedingly productive by a small amount of improvement.

Mr. WHYTE. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa a single question. It occurs to me that it is pretty near time for us to unload in regard to the items that are being restored and the amendments that are put on in the Senate. The bill as it came from the House, I understood, appropriated five millions and eight hundred and odd thousand dollars. The Senate Committee struck out a number of the appropriations, but added amounts elsewhere increasing the appropriations in the bill some $36,000, so that the bill as reported by the committee appropriated about $5,900,000. Now I want to ask the Senator from Iowa if all these appropriations which were stricken out by the committee are restored in the Senate how great then will the appropriations be in the bill?

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Maryland that the committee have added to this bill $981,900 and subtracted from it $945,586; all that we have struck out, with the exception of a few thousand dollars, thus far in the bill has been re-inserted.

Mr. WHYTE. So that $6,700,000 will be the appropriation; a larger sum than was ever appropriated by any Congress before, I believe.

Mr. EDMUNDS and others. O, no.

Mr. DENNIS. Last year's bill was larger.

Mr. ALLISON. We voted last year $6,662,000.

Mr. WHYTE. But this is $6,700,000.

Mr. ALLISON. It is more than last year. In reference to this river it will be seen that the engineer says he has not made an accurate survey of it, and he recommends that the first thing to be done is to make an accurate survey. It may be that it can be improved as suggested by the Senator from Virginia; but the Senator cannot show a suggestion from any engineer as to how it shall be done, nor can he show a suggestion made by an engineer that it can be improved even between the points named in this bill at any reasonable cost.

Mr. CAPERTON. The gentleman will allow me to say that the survey of which he speaks, as I understand, was made in reference to the river within these points. The survey made in 1872, and on account of which there was an appropriation, was a survey confined within the limits contemplated by this bill. So that estimate has no reference whatever to this portion of the river.

Mr. WITHERS. I would also call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the fact that the portion of the report of the engineer that he has caused to be read at the Clerk's table in regard to how it can be improved is at a point where it is much more difficult to improve than it is between the points indicated in the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. As I understand this report of S. T. Abert, civil engineer, he speaks of the whole river:

Examination of New River, from the lead mines, in Wythe County, to the "mouth of Wilson," in Grayson County, Virginia.

Mr. WITHERS. From the lead mines to Independence, which is going up the river.

Mr. ALLISON. Then he describes the whole river, and says an accurate survey should be made. If there has been any survey made of this portion of the river lying between the mouth of the Greenbrier and these lead mines, and a report showing that it is susceptible of improvement, then I may yield my objection.

Mr. WITHERS. There has been such a survey, and such a report has been printed. It is a special report. The survey was made in 1874.

Mr. ALLISON. I have not been able to find it.

Mr. WITHERS. An appropriation was based upon that survey.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment striking out the item.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 288, 289, 290, and 291, in the following words:

For the improvement of the Mattapony River, Virginia, $10,000.
For the improvement of the Pamunkey River, Virginia, $6,000.

Mr. WITHERS. I wish to call attention to the reports of the engineers in the case of the Mattapony and Pamunkey Rivers. The reports of the engineers show the importance of this work; they show the value of the products which would be liberated by the construction of this improvement; and I think one or two phrases of them will suffice to give the opinion of the engineers upon the subject. For example:

The expenditure of the moderate sums estimated will afford such avenues to market as cannot be surpassed by any other region in the country.

The estimates are for the two streams, the moderate estimate which the engineer speaks of for the Mattapony River $34,000, and for the Pamunkey $17,500, of which the House bill proposes to appropriate $10,000 to one stream and $6,000 to the other, making an aggregate of $16,000. I hope the Senate will restore these two provisions of the bill.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 293, to increase the appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Norfolk, Virginia, from $13,000 to $39,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to my friend from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] that here is a chance to unload now.

Mr. RANSOM. I hope the Senate will sustain this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 295 and 296, in the following words:

For the improvement of the Warrior and Tombigbee River, Alabama, $15,000.

Mr. SPENCER. I hope this amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is the river that runs up, and it ought to be improved.

Mr. SPENCER. No; it runs down. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it a good deal run down? [Laughter.]

Mr. CONKLING. Do not run down this river, whichever way it runs. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPENCER. There are many thousands of bales of cotton transported on this river every year. The navigation is very dangerous, and it ought to be improved. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to. I appeal to the generosity of the Senate.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I think that river must run up as well as down, for I find there is another place in which there is money appropriated for the same river.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Because it runs both ways.

Mr. SPENCER. I will explain to the Senator from Michigan that the Tombigbee and Warrior form a junction near Demopolis, Alabama, and the previous appropriation was for the main river below Demopolis. This appropriation is for the Warrior and Tombigbee above Demopolis.

Mr. ALLISON. Where is this intended for?

Mr. SPENCER. Above Demopolis. If the Senator has no objection we will insert in line 286 "above Demopolis" after "Alabama." I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER. Now I hope the amendment as amended will be voted down.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the vote is taken I desire to call attention to the character of this improvement and what the engineer says with reference to it. The engineer in charge of this portion of the public improvements says:

The permanent improvement of the river at any reasonable expense was regarded as impracticable.

This improvement would not be worth undertaking unless it should provide for the passage of such steamers as now ply on the Tennessee and Alabama Rivers, and this would require such an increase of dimensions of canal and locks in the part already surveyed that the expense, supposing the scheme might then be found practicable, would be enormously increased, and when to this is added the cost of permanently improving the Tombigbee River for the same class of boats from Fulton to Demopolis, a distance of three hundred and twenty miles, it is apparent that the cost would be too great to justify any further serious consideration of the project until the increase of the population and products of the country to be benefited by its execution shall have furnished some reasonable economic ground for doing so.

Mr. SPENCER. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me I will state that he is reading the report of the engineers in reference to the Tombigbee River above Columbus, Mississippi. There is steamboat navigation, and has been since steamboats have been in existence, to Columbus, Mississippi, on the Tombigbee River; and to Tuscaloosa on the Warrior River. Steamboats ply there, and every winter thousands and tens of thousands of bales of cotton are taken to market.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly at certain times.

Mr. SPENCER. And that portion he reads from applies to the improvement above.

Mr. ALLISON. Above Demopolis? That is what is inserted here.

Mr. SPENCER. Above Columbus, Mississippi, between Columbus, Mississippi, and Fulton, Mississippi.

Mr. ALLISON. I will read:

But they contemplated only such an improvement of the river as would fit it for high-water navigation from Demopolis, Alabama, at the head of low-water navigation, two hundred and fifty miles above Mobile, and two hundred miles above the mouth of the Tombigbee, to Columbus, Mississippi, at the head of high-water navigation, one hundred and seventy miles above Demopolis.

He speaks of the character of this permanent improvement and says it cannot be made at any reasonable cost.

Mr. SPENCER. Boats daily visit Columbus, Mississippi, and Tuscaloosa, Alabama, on the Warrior and Tombigbee Rivers, for seven or eight months in the year; and this small appropriation, $15,000, is for the purpose of taking out the snags in the river. I think it would be a great outrage if this amendment of the committee were adopted.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 297 and 298, in the following words:

For the improvement of the Choctawhatchie River, Florida and Alabama, $5,000.

Mr. SPENCER. I am utterly and absolutely astonished that such an important stream as the Choctawhatchie River, in Alabama and Florida, should be reported to be stricken out by the committee when the small sum of only $5,000 is proposed. I hope the Senate will not consent to any such outrage being perpetrated on the southern country.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I should regard that appropriation more favorably, I think, if it was made to improve the name of the river instead of the river itself. [Laughter.]

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 299 and 300, in the following words:

For the improvement of the Apalachicola River, Florida, $5,000.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I hope this amendment will not be agreed to. This river is a very important river, and the appropriation is a very small one. The work has been on hand for some time; a snag-boat has been purchased for the purpose, and the work has been going on for some years. We propose to continue it if we can get this appropriation.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 301 and 302, in the following words:

For removing obstructions and deepening channel at the Pass of Brazos Santiago, Texas, $10,000.

Mr. MAXEY. I hope the Senate will non-concur in that amendment. It will be remembered by many of the Senators here that the port of Brazos Santiago was the important port during the Mexican war; it was the great depot of supplies for Taylor's entire army. Circumstances might make it important again. The bar at that island cuts off that port. I know myself that during the Mexican war the steamer Harney was sunk just inside that bar and the mast of that steamer was used as a guide for vessels getting in there. It is also the port for Point Isabel, and Point Isabel is connected by rail with the city of Brownsville, opposite Matamoras. This appropriation is designed for the removal of that sand-bar and those obstructions which got there during the Mexican war. While the State of Texas is receiving some appropriations this year, I beg to say that from the date of its admission into the Union, the 3d of March, 1845, down to a year ago the entire appropriations for the State of Texas for rivers and harbors amounted to but $75,000. That was the whole sum. Hence, as no appropriations have been made, the necessity for making appropriations for the removal of these obstructions. I hope the amendment will not be concurred in.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 305 and 306, in the following words:

For the improvement of the French Broad River, in Tennessee, $15,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Have we not had the "French Broad" already once?

Mr. ALLISON. This is another portion of the river.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is this the dry portion or the wet portion?

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. The other was for the improvement of the French Broad from Brevard to Buncombe County, North Carolina. This is for the French Broad in Tennessee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If this is not for Buncombe, I am for it.

Mr. KEY. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that this is really a meritorious appropriation. This part of the French Broad River is in Tennessee, a great many miles from Buncombe County. It is a part of the river on which there is a great deal of trade, and I think the appropriation eminently proper.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion.

The motion was not agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out from line 307 to line 310, in the following words:

For the improvement of the Missouri River at the point where it is cutting into the Kansas shore above Saint Joseph, Missouri, for the protection of the city of Saint Joseph, $10,000.

Mr. BOGY. I hope the Senate will not adopt this amendment. The improvement proposed is of very great importance. I will not detain the Senate. I hope the appropriation will be retained as it came from the House. The appropriation is in pursuance of a survey made by the engineers, and is recommended by the engineers. I have the recommendation in my hand.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was to insert as lines 311 and 312 the following:

For the improvement of the Missouri River above the mouth of the Yellowstone, $35,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where is that? I should like to have that explained.

Mr. INGALLS. So should I.

Mr. BOGY. I hope that this amendment will be adopted. The navigation of the Missouri River above the Yellowstone has become of very great importance. I am not prepared now to state the number of boats that are navigating that portion of the river; but the number is large. The Government has great need of that river. There are many boats now engaged in Government employ transporting munitions of war, provisions for the Army, Indian supplies, and many other matters. The country is settling with great rapidity. I do know of my own personal knowledge that that portion of the river really needs very great improvement; and the $35,000, although not sufficient to make the work complete, will go a great way to make the river navigable by the removal of large bowlders that are scattered along the bed of the river. There is a sufficiency of water at all seasons of the year, but the navigation is somewhat interrupted, not by rapids and cascades, but by large rocks and bowlders that intercept the channel at different points, which could be removed with great ease. Of course this is away beyond my State; it is in the Territory of Montana; but I am somewhat acquainted with the river and I know that this improvement is very much needed. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will be adopted. It is urged by the Delegate from that Territory, and I think it is necessary that it should be made.

Mr. ALLISON. The committee inserted this recommendation for the reason chiefly that the Government itself has a large interest in transportation on the Upper Missouri. It was very strongly recommended by the Chief of Engineers, General Humphreys, whose letter I have in my hand, in which he states that this improvement would be greatly to the advantage of the Government, as by it the cost of transportation of Army supplies will be materially reduced. There are several papers connected with this case, a special recommendation from the Chief of Engineers that $75,000 be appropriated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Are there any settlements above the mouth of the Yellowstone on the Missouri?

Mr. ALLISON. Several.

Mr. BOGY. Montana is settling with great rapidity.

Mr. ALLISON. This is certainly a very important appropriation to the Government itself. It is the first appropriation of the character for the Upper Missouri, and I shall be very glad to have the concurrence of my good friend near me, [Mr. INGALLS,] who has voted against me, I believe, during the entire time we have considered this bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Having lived on the shores of the Missouri River for nearly twenty years I can sincerely say that I know of no stream on the habitable globe that stands more in need of improvement. It is a little too thick for a beverage and a little too thin for cultivation. The distance above the mouth of the Yellowstone is something like a thousand miles. There is not an acre of surveyed land in that distance; there is not a habitation of civilized man. During six months of the year the stream is entirely closed by ice, and for three months of the remainder there is not water enough in it to float an ordinary flat-boat.

Mr. BOGY. I am astonished at the statement made by the Senator from Kansas, and it cannot be sustained by what I know to be the fact. There is an abundance of water there, and the river is never closed beyond three months. It is not closed two weeks longer than it is at the point where the gentleman resides.

Mr. INGALLS. I live two thousand or twenty-five hundred miles by the river below the mouth of the Yellowstone; and for three or four months in the year, even at that point, where it is swollen by numerous affluents and tributaries, aside from the period when the river is not closed by ice, it is not navigable for an ordinary scow.

Mr. BOGY. The navigation of the Missouri, it is a notorious fact, is generally better higher up than it is below. The Senator astonishes me.

Mr. INGALLS. I am therefore amazed—as I believe is the favorite and popular term upon the discussion of this bill—that the committee should recommend an appropriation of this magnitude that can certainly be of no conceivable use to any interest upon this continent, either private or governmental.

Mr. ALLISON. I only want to correct one statement made by my friend. The climate at Fort Benton above the Yellowstone is milder than it is where the Senator from Kansas or myself lives, and the river is not frozen up as long at Fort Benton as it is at Sioux City, fifteen hundred or two thousand miles below.

Mr. INGALLS. The meteorological records of that region will show the river is closed at that point from November to April in eight years out of ten.

Mr. WINDOM. I share with the Senator from Missouri in the astonishment which he has expressed at the remarks just made by the Senator from Kansas, and I confess that I am unable to understand them unless it be that he has been in his early youth too near the muddy waters of the Missouri. It seems to me that those muddy waters are so strangely mixed with fact and misrepresentation of fact that there must be a good deal of mud in them.

Now, to state that there is no business on the Upper Missouri is to contradict the known facts which are reported daily in the papers of that whole region. We know, too, that there is no place in the new portions of the country where the Government itself is more interested in the improvement than there. We have these recommendations from the Department urging the appropriation because of its necessity in the transportation of Government freights, and I myself know that large amounts of Government freights are transported up the Missouri River and around to Fort Benton. We have a fort there. We yesterday passed a bill authorizing the construction of two more forts in that neighborhood, and I know, furthermore, that a very large portion of the trade of Montana will come over that route, and that a very considerable portion of it does go that way now; and to state that there is no trade there is certainly to make a most remarkable statement in view of the facts.

Mr. President, we have passed a great many appropriations here to-day that were valuable and some that were not so much so; but to stop at this moment and refuse to appropriate for what is really a national work it seems to me would be adding a fitting climax to the action of the Senate thus far on this bill.

Mr. INGALLS. There are not ten boats a year leaving Saint Louis for the Upper Missouri River. When the Senator talks about commerce, I certainly ought to be able to speak with some degree of intelligence on that subject, and the only conceivable interest that I can conceive that any corporation should have in this would be the Northern Pacific Railroad that runs through the State of Minnesota, and might possibly desire to have a continuation from Bismarck up to the Territory of Montana to some point on the Upper Missouri.

Mr. WINDOM. I am informed that there are forty boats on the Upper Missouri River.

Mr. BOGY. Certainly there are.

Mr. WINDOM. I think the Senator from Kansas would do well to look into the commercial statistics of that region of country.

Mr. BOGY. I cannot permit the remarks made by the Senator from Kansas to go; but I am inclined to think that he has been speaking in a jocular way. To state here that there are not ten boats leaving Saint Louis a year to go to the mouth of the Yellowstone is a most singular statement. There are sometimes ten boats a week that start to go up the Missouri River. They go up from the month of May until September or October, and they get there because there is an abundance of water at one season of the year for large boats and at another season for smaller boats; but it is a fact, which I assert here, that from the mouth of the Yellowstone to Fort Benton there is a larger volume of water than there is between the Yellowstone and Sioux City. The reason why the navigation is interrupted is not owing to a want of water, but owing to the fact that there are large rocks in the channel of the river; and it is another fact that the severe winter season in that country is not longer or as long as it is lower down. Where you approach the western shore of the continent, although it is east of the mountains, yet the western winds affect the climate of Montana, and it is not as cold in Montana as it is in the little city of Nebraska City.

Mr. PADDOCK, (at five o'clock p. m.) I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 318 and 319, in the following words:

For the improvement of the Wicomico River, Maryland, $5,000.

Mr. DENNIS. I ask to be heard on that question, and to state to the Senate some facts in relation the Wicomico River. It is on the Eastern Shore of Maryland, a place that is not very well known to the Senate or to the country. I will read you some statistics from the report of the Chief of Engineers.

Capital engaged on merchandise, $325,000; annual sales of merchandise, $1,200,000; shipments of lumber, board-measure, 15,000,000 feet; shipments of cord-wood, 5,000 cords; shipments of railroad ties, 6,000; shipments of grain, 60,000 bushels; sales of fertilizers, 300 tons; sales of oyster shells for lime, 35,000 bushels; number of vessels trading from this town, 20; aggregate tonnage, 1,050 tons; sales of berries and fruits, $40,000; sales of garden-truck and vegetables, $13,000.

I had intended when this bill was before our committee to furnish statistics which were of importance to the whole country. I had carefully prepared from the Coast Survey the coast line of all the States of this Union, together with the water-courses, and I will give it to the Senate.

Maryland has thirteen hundred and thirty-six miles of coast line. We have only in this bill the sum of $90,000, $75,000 of that amount is appropriated for the improvement of Baltimore Harbor. It would be a work of supererogation to state to the Senate the great advantages of that harbor. It is the terminus of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, the great outlet from the valley of the Ohio and the Upper Mississippi. Its value cannot be overestimated. Our committee have made no deduction from that appropriation. There are but $15,000 appropriated in addition to that for the State, and most of that sum is for tributaries which go toward furnishing the market of Baltimore almost entirely. I have enumerated to you the amount of provisions shipped from this little town of Salisbury, Maryland, with its twenty-five hundred inhabitants, thousands and thousands of shipments. Five thousand dollars, I think, will be enough to finish and complete that harbor, with a very small appropriation to keep it up afterward. I only ask that the Senate may not agree to the amendment proposed by the committee; and I am assured by the committee themselves that if they had thoroughly understood the case they would not have objected to this appropriation.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 320 and 321, in the following words:

For the improvement of Big Sandy River, Kentucky and West Virginia, $25,000.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For removing bowlders and snags in Big Sandy River, Kentucky and West Virginia, including Louisa Fork, Virginia, $15,000.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope the pending amendment will not be concurred in. I am told that the Senate committee in reducing the appropriation from $25,000 to $15,000 acted under a misapprehension of the existing state of facts. I am informed that this reduction was made on an estimate made in 1874 stating that $15,000 would answer; but since that a most memorable freshet has occurred in that section of Kentucky, and it will require $25,000 now to remove the obstructions and snags out of that river. I learn further that an appropriation of $25,000 would not be as much now, in consequence of that freshet, as $15,000 would have been when the estimate was made two years ago. Such is the information furnished me upon the subject. The Big Sandy River is a boundary line between two States and has a good deal of inland trade. It is twenty-six miles long from Catlettsburgh, on the Ohio River, to Louisa, in Lawrence County, where it forks. The Louisa Fork to Piketon, in Pike County, Kentucky, is eighty-six miles above Louisa, or one hundred and twelve from Catlettsburgh; while Warfield, on Terry Fork, is thirty-five miles above Louisa and sixty-one miles from Catlettsburgh. Aside from the coal and salt, the exports brought down this river are very considerable, and by a table made on the 1st of July, 1870, exceeded $1,200,000. I doubt not they have greatly increased since.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the Senator would read the tables.

Mr. STEVENSON. I will with pleasure. The articles exported are singled out with their values:

Articles exported.

	Value.
Saw-logs, sawed lumber, and fencing-posts	$550,000
Staves and spoke-timber	80,000
Tan-bark	75,000
Keg-timber	8,000
Hoop-poles	25,000
Barges and small craft	45,000
Fruit	40,000

	Value.
Feathers, bees-wax, ginseng, tallow, hides, poultry, eggs, butter, flax-seed, rags, and produce of country stores	$165,000
Wheat and corn	50,000
Potatoes	6,000
Live stock	175,000
	1,219,000

Not including coal or lumber.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator has mentioned sawed logs and other lumber.

Mr. STEVENSON. The amount of the items which I read was $1,219,000, and in addition to that the finest coal in the world is to be found along the forks of this river, in quality unsurpassed in any part of the western country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How would it do to make the appropriation payable out of the gold found on the banks? I think the Senator said there was gold there.

Mr. STEVENSON. No, sir, I said not one word about gold. They have salt, iron, and coal. The State of Kentucky has made large appropriations to this river, and its trade and commerce will in the future be very profitable. I am sure that the committee would not have reduced this appropriation if they had known of the necessity of increased appropriation caused by the freshet since the estimate was made. I hope the original appropriation of $25,000 will be restored.

Mr. ALLISON. The committee had not heard of the freshet of which the Senator from Kentucky speaks, and therefore they relied upon the estimate of the engineer made before the freshet occurred. There has been a careful survey of the Big Sandy River made and a suggestion that it be improved by a system of dams and locks from the mouth of the Big Sandy up to a certain point.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there room for them?

Mr. ALLISON. I presume there is room for dams on the Big Sandy. Now the engineer reports that fourteen thousand and some hundred dollars can be economically expended in getting out a few bowlders and snags; but we were pressed very strongly (and I think the Senate can appreciate what that means) to include in this appropriation Louisa Fork, which is a branch of the Big Sandy and which runs up in Virginia somewhere, which has a lumbering interest on it and they float out logs. I believe the water is about a foot and a half in depth at low water in Louisa Fork.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator has spoken of a "lumbering interest." Does he not mean a slumbering interest?

Mr. ALLISON. No; there is really a saw-mill or two on this Louisa Fork, and they get out lumber there. Therefore we concluded to insert the Louisa Fork and allow this whole appropriation of $15,000 to be expended upon these two rivers in the discretion of the engineer who might have charge of the work. I think $15,000 will serve the purpose required by the Senator from Kentucky, and I hope he will not insist on an increased appropriation.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do insist upon it, and I repeat what I said just now, that the report to which the Senator from Iowa refers was made two years ago. I have that report now before me. In it the assistant engineer, James E. Bell, reports that for removal of obstructions the smallest sum he can get along with is $15,000; and I say since that a most memorable freshet has occurred during the last year, which rendered this appropriation of $25,000 necessary.

The Senator from Iowa says the Senate committee had no information of this freshet since the estimate in 1874. So I supposed. But the House committee did have, and I hope the appropriation will be restored. The Senator from Iowa seems to know little about either the Big Sandy River or the country through which it passes. Steamboat navigation often exists to Louisa or even farther on both forks of the river during the winter and spring months, and a finer mineral region, consisting of coal and iron, besides the finest lumber, can scarcely be found. Our State geologist, Professor N. S. Shaler, says:

> The salt-wells of this valley seem destined to play an important part in its industry. The supply of lime is practically inexhaustible, and they are sure of fuel from the lower grades of coal at about the actual cost of mining.

In a very short period, if this river shall be improved and dammed, immense quantities of both coal and iron will find markets through the access of this river and its two forks. This river is the only outlet for an immensely productive country, inexhaustibly rich in both agricultural and mineral wealth, and all we ask is aid for the removal of existing obstacles to the transportation of these articles to market. I hope the appropriation of $25,000 will be restored, and the amendment of the Senate committee disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that it is time to adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, no; this is too important a bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 338 and 339, in the following words:

> For the improvement of Au Sable River, Michigan, $2,500.

Mr. FERRY. I hope the Senate will non-concur.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I hope the amendment will not be concurred in.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was in line 340, after the word "river," to insert "including Saginaw Harbor;" and in line 341, after the word "Michigan," to strike out "eleven" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

> For the improvement of the Saginaw River, including Saginaw Harbor, Michigan, $25,000.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator from Michigan object to that?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. No, sir.

Mr. FERRY. I hope the amendment will be concurred in. This is for the river and the harbor at the entrance to the river. I am something like the Senator from New York: I am disposed now to concur with the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 344, in the appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, to strike out "twenty-six" and insert "thirty-two."

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. This amendment increases the appropriation for the Milwaukee River from $26,000 to $32,000.

Several SENATORS. That is enough; we understand it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 351 and 352, in the following words:

> For the improvement of the harbor at Monroe, Michigan, $7,000.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I hope that amendment will not be concurred in, and I will briefly state the reasons. This is a place with which I am very familiar myself, having lived there thirty-eight years of my life. It is a canal connecting the lake with the river, and this appropriation is made simply to keep the work from going to destruction, to keep up the wooden revetments on each side of the canal.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was in line 356, to reduce the appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Thunder Bay, Michigan, from $15,000 to $4,764.

Mr. FERRY. I want to state one fact that I think will be sufficient to convince the Senate that the paragraph ought to stand as the House passed it. The State of Michigan chartered a company to build this harbor. They expended, I think, nearly $100,000, and long before the expiration of the time the act was repealed because there was so much clamor made on the part of those interested in commerce against the tax imposed. Now the Government has taken it in hand, after the citizens had expended $100,000. It is asked now that the Government in taking it in hand should expend $15,000, and it is to protect the work already done.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has the Government taken it in hand?

Mr. FERRY. The Government is proposing to take it in hand by the paragraph sent us by the House and even by the amendment proposed by the Senate committee. The amount the Senate committee have put in is simply for a particular purpose. It does not cover the object of protecting this harbor. That is just what is wanted, $15,000.

Mr. ALLISON. This harbor was examined by an engineer. It now has twelve feet of water and is in good condition. The engineer tells us that to secure another foot in depth will require an expenditure of $4,764, and the committee thought they would compromise with these people at Thunder Bay and give them another foot of water.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the use of the other foot?

Mr. ALLISON. It will allow a vessel drawing thirteen feet of water to enter the harbor instead of one drawing twelve, which is all the advantage I know of, and there are very few of that character of vessels that will probably require to enter this harbor.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator knows very well from his familiarity with the Western streams that the sand works rapidly at these bars, and it is necessary to keep that depth of water. I think the number of clearances there was about five hundred last year and the amount of property nearly $3,000,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What collection district is it in?

Mr. FERRY. In the Huron district.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 358 and 359, in the following words:

> For the improvement of the harbor at McCargoe's Cove, Michigan, $15,000.

Mr. FERRY. I should like to have the Senator from Iowa state what he knows in regard to this, and give us the facts in regard to this case.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state in reply to the question of the Senator from Michigan that no estimate was made for this. I looked carefully at Colton's latest map and could not find this place, and then I looked at some gazeteer with a view to finding this place and I could not find it, and there being no estimate for it we proposed to strike it out.

Mr. FERRY. Is there any recommendation from the Engineer Department?

Mr. ALLISON. There is no recommendation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 360 and 361 in the following words:

> For the improvement of the harbor at Ashtabula, Ohio, $10,000.

Mr. THURMAN. I invite the attention of the Senate in all seriousness to that proposition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How far from the lake is Ashtabula?

Mr. THURMAN. The port of Ashtabula is on the lake. If the Senator will go there some time he will find a very nice harbor, at which two railroads terminate and where an amount of business is done that I think will surprise him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What collection district is it in?

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know the number of the district.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I mean the customs district?

Mr. THURMAN. I cannot answer as to that. I know something of this harbor. I visited it and spent half a day at this improvement last summer. But I do not speak as from my own knowledge. What does the engineer say?

Amount required for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, $20,000.

That is in the general report of the engineer-in-chief. Then in the special report of the local engineer, he says in reference to this harbor:

When this work is done, there will remain to be built one hundred and forty feet of west pier to complete the five hundred feet extension projected and approved, and the completion of the channel, by blasting and dredging, to a width of one hundred feet and depth of fourteen. An appropriation of $25,000 was made by act of March 3, 1875, and contract for work in the channel has been made with Messrs. Case & Jennings.

The pier-extension will then remain to complete the improvement at this harbor. For this I estimate $20,000 to be required, which would be best granted in one appropriation.

Amount required for entire and permanent completion of improvement, $20,000.
Amount that can be profitably expended during the next fiscal year, $20,000.

The House appropriate only $10,000. It would have been much better I think, from my own personal observation, if they had appropriated the whole $20,000. There is real danger that if the pier on the west side is not completed, which would complete the whole work, the injury resulting from its non-completion may be more than the cost of completing the whole work. I do sincerely trust that this, which is as meritorious appropriation as there is in this bill, will be retained, and the amendment of the committee disagreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator why on his information, then, he does not move to amend this paragraph by making this $10,000 $20,000, which it seems is necessary should be appropriated; otherwise this $10,000 will be lost.

Mr. THURMAN. No, I do not say that; but really the appropriation ought to be the full $20,000, for it is an appropriation to complete the work. The work is a splendid work. I speak of my own personal knowledge and from conversation with the engineer on the very ground. It needs about $20,000 to complete it, and it ought to be completed really in one appropriation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the Senator would move to amend the paragraph, then. It is in the interest of reform and economy.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not like to move to increase beyond what the committee has done.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator need have no delicacy about that. The Senate has taken its own judgment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment striking out the paragraph.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 362 and 363, in the following words:

For the improvement of the harbor at Port Clinton, Ohio, $5,000.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask the attention of the Senate to that little amendment. The engineer reports:

The amount required for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, $20,000.

That is the report of the engineer-in-chief. The local engineer reports in respect to that—

The sum of $20,000, which can be advantageously expended during the next fiscal year, is recommended.

And he goes on to give—I will not take the time of the Senate in reading it—a statement of the business done at this comparatively small port, as I grant it is, but an extremely useful one and one whose business is increasing all the time. I hope there will be no objection to granting this small sum, one-fourth of what he recommends.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 364 and 365, in the following words:

For the improvement of Fairport Harbor, Ohio, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. This is called Grand River Harbor in the reports. In the printed report which was sent to us there is no recommendation for an appropriation for that harbor; it was supposed to be unnecessary; but on the 10th of February the Chief of Engineers made this special report:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, D. C., February 10, 1876.

SIR: I beg leave to submit a copy of a communication from Lieutenant-Colonel C. E. Blunt, Corps of Engineers, in charge of the improvements at Grand River Harbor, Ohio, explaining the necessity of an increase of the estimate submitted for this work for the next fiscal year arising from the bad condition of the old pier built in 1828, and asking for $8,000 to put the work in good condition.

As this is a necessary expenditure, I would ask that Colonel Blunt's proposition be recommended to the favorable consideration of Congress.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Brigadier-General and Chief of Engineers.

Hon. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

Colonel Blunt's letter is as follows:

GRAND RIVER HARBOR, OHIO.

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
Buffalo, New York, November 30, 1875.

GENERAL: In my annual report on Grand River Harbor I have not requested any additional appropriation for next year, supposing at the time that the balance remaining of the last one after extending the west pier would be sufficient to do the work of repairs at the south end or old portion of that pier, built in 1828.

A recent examination, however, made with a view to the commencement of work at this section, shows not only a much worse condition of the old work than was supposed, but a recent invasion of sand into the west side of the channel adjoining, which is steadily encroaching upon and narrowing it.

The sum of $3,000 will not therefore be sufficient to put this part of the work and channel in good condition, and having made careful estimate I find that $8,000 in addition will be required for that purpose, which fact I therefore respectfully report.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. E. BLUNT,
Lieutenant-Colonel of Engineers.

Brigadier-General A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any recommendation from the Secretary of War?

Mr. THURMAN. There is. The Secretary of War communicates this.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear what he says.

Mr. THURMAN. I have his letter here.

The Secretary of War has the honor to transmit to the House of Representatives copy of a statement of Lieutenant-Colonel C. E. Blunt, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, explaining the necessity for the increase of the estimate submitted for the improvements at Grand River Harbor, Ohio, and to request favorable consideration of the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What Secretary does that?

Mr. THURMAN. General Belknap.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What date?

Mr. THURMAN. February 12, 1876. You have the authority then of the Secretary of War, General Humphreys, the Chief of Engineers, and Colonel Blunt, the engineer in charge. I hope the amendment of our committee will not be agreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert as lines 366 and 367 the following:

For repair of piers at mouth of Black River, Ohio, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 369, to increase the appropriation for the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers from $190,000 to $350,000.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That is a very heavy increase of appropriation. I should like an explanation.

Mr. ALLISON. It is a great national work and the engineer in charge says that $350,000 is the lowest possible sum with which he can carry on the work.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 371 and 372, in the following words:

For the improvement of the harbor at Norwalk, Connecticut, $7,000.

Mr. BARNUM. I do not think the committee understood the situation of this matter when they agreed on this amendment. The machinery is there and the work is going on, and $7,000 is the amount estimated to complete it. I hope the Senate will not concur in the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLISON. I think I shall take the liberty of suggesting an adjournment. It is now half past five, and it does not seem possible to reach a conclusion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will not do that. There is more money in the Treasury to-day than there will be to-morrow. Now is the time to pass this bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I think we are very greatly demoralized; I fear I am getting so myself. I actually voted for a five-thousand-dollar appropriation for Wicomico River, in Maryland.

Mr. ALLISON. I will submit a motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 14, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. SIDNEY CORBETT, D. D., rector St. Mark's parish, Minneapolis, Minnesota.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTON.

Mr. SAVAGE. I rise to a question of privilege. In the debate yesterday, on concurrence in the report of the committee of conference on the silver bill, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] in reading from the act of 1869, read the clause—

The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin, or its equivalent, of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States—

There the gentleman stopped. Afterward, in the course of the debate, obtaining the floor by the courtesy of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] I called attention to the fact that the gentleman from Ohio had stopped in the middle of a sentence and I read the rest of the clause, which is as follows:

Except in case where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold or silver.

stating at the time that the gentleman had omitted that part of the sentence. Either with or without the gentleman's consent—I do not know which—the reporters have put in the gentleman's remarks the whole sentence, making it appear as if he had read the whole sentence, while I took exception to his only reading a portion of it, and thus placing me in the false position of calling attention to a fact which does not exist, if the report in the RECORD be correct. I desire, therefore, that I may not appear in a false position, that this correction go into the RECORD in order to show that the gentleman did stop in the middle of the sentence and that the additional clause has been added to his remarks since.

ELIZA JANE BLUMER.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill granting a pension to Eliza Jane Blumer, and to ask for its passage at this time.

The bill (H. R. No. 11) entitled "An act granting a pension to Eliza Jane Blumer was returned yesterday by the President without his approval, the reason given for the return of the bill being that there was a clerical error in it. The soldier on whose account the pension was granted was described in the bill as a private of Company A, Forty-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers. The records in the War Office show that he was a private of Company B; and because he was described as a private of Company A instead of Company B, the President returned the bill without his approval. In the bill which I send to the desk, the correction is made, and I ask that it be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Eliza Jane Blumer, widow of Henry A. Blumer, a private of Company B, Forty-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, to take effect on and after the date of the said Henry A. Blumer's death, as shown by evidence on file in the Pension Office.

Mr. RUSK. I understood that that bill with the President's message was referred yesterday to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill which was returned by the President without his approval, on account of a clerical error, was referred to that committee. The Chair understands that the bill sent up by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MUTCHLER] is a new bill.

Mr. MUTCHLER. It is precisely the same bill, except that the soldier is correctly described as having been a member of Company B, instead of Company A.

Mr. RUSK. I shall have to object to it anyhow, as it dates back.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POPPLETON. I rise to a question of the highest privilege. I desire to call up the resolutions reported by the Committee of Elections in the contested-election case of Abbott vs. Frost.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I suggest that the objection of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. RUSK] comes too late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not. The gentleman had a right to object when the bill was read.

Mr. POPPLETON. I will yield for a moment to the gentleman from Delaware, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

WRECK OF THE MONITOR TECUMSEH.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Delaware, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred a joint resolution in relation to the wreck of the United States monitor Tecumseh, respectfully report that the steam monitor Tecumseh was sunk by a torpedo in Mobile Bay during the late war in forty-five feet of water, with all on board; that the location of said wreck is accurately ascertained and marked by a large buoy, with twenty-five feet of water above her turret, so that said wreck does not form an obstruction to navigation; that on August 7, 1873, the said wreck, together with the wreck of the confederate transport King, was sold by William A. Richardson, Secretary of the Treasury, to James E. Slaughter (under the provisions of the joint resolution of June 21, 1870) for the sum of $50. Now, in the opinion of your committee, no more noble tomb than the hull of this monitor can be found for the brave and patriotic men who lost their lives in defense of their country, and that the sale of said wreck with no provision for the proper removal of their remains is shocking to the feelings of every right-minded man; and to prevent the consummation of so great an outrage as the scattering and destruction of the remains of the noble men so gloriously entombed, we report a joint resolution and recommend its passage as a substitute for the joint resolution referred to your committee.

Whereas the wreck of the monitor Tecumseh was sold to Joseph E. Slaughter under the provisions of the joint resolution of June 21, 1870; and whereas it is understood that the purchaser of said wreck proposes to break up and raise the same without regard to the bodies of the one hundred and fifty officers and sailors of the United States Navy who went down with said vessel: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and hereby is, directed to prevent the breaking up or destruction of said wreck unless the said bodies be carefully removed under the inspection of an officer appointed by him; and should the purchaser or his assigns decline to so remove the bodies, the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to tender the amount paid for said wreck, with lawful interest on the same, to said purchaser or his assigns, and to take possession of said wreck.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 148) in relation to the wreck of the United States monitor Tecumseh was read a first and second time.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the gentlemen a question. As I understand it, this sale to which the report refers of the wreck of this vessel was under an act of Congress. Is not that so?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Delaware. It was under authority of a joint resolution of Congress.

Mr. HALE. So that if there is any fault in the matter it is not in the Department, but in Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Delaware. The sale was authorized under a joint resolution of Congress for the sale of abandoned property.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Delaware, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIGHT. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports of a private nature, but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POPPLETON] calls up a question of the highest privilege.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Is not the unfinished business the regular order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not on Friday morning. The rule requires that the morning hour on Friday shall be given to the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

Mr. POPPLETON. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRATT.]

LOUIS ROSENBAUM.

Mr. PRATT, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Claims, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 341) for the relief of Louis Rosenbaum, with the Senate amendment thereto, and with the recommendation that the amendment of the Senate be concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

In line 11, after the word "authorize," insert the "Secretary of the Treasury shall be satisfied that said check has not been paid and, further, that;" so that it will read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Louis Rosenbaum the sum of $1,424.37 in lieu of check numbered A 270[illegible]8, on the assistant treasurer of the United States at New York, dated the 5th day of January, 1874, payable to the order of said Louis Rosenbaum, and signed by M. P. Small, brevet brigadier-general and commissary of subsistence; which said check, it is claimed, has been lost, and was never received by the said Louis Rosenbaum: Provided, That before the payment hereinbefore authorized, the Secretary of the Treasury shall be satisfied that said check has not been paid, and, further, that the said Louis Rosenbaum shall execute a bond of indemnity to the United States, with sufficient sureties, against the claim of the payee in said draft, or the claim of any person or persons in possession of or claiming the same; and also to fully indemnify the United States against all loss and damages in the premises.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. PRATT moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

E. D. FRANZ.

Mr. PRATT also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 339) for the relief of E. D. Franz, with a Senate amendment thereto, and with the recommendation that the amendment be concurred in.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 13 of the bill, after the word "authorize," insert "the Secretary of the Treasury shall be satisfied that said check has not been paid, and further that;" so that it will read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to E. D. Franz the sum of $2,019.82, in lieu of check numbered 2510, drawn on the United States assistant treasurer at San Francisco, California, payable to the order of one Daniel Hazard, and indorsed by said Hazard to L. and H. Huning and by said L. and H. Huning to the said E. D. Franz, said check being signed by J. J. Dana, major and quartermaster United States Army; which said check, it is claimed, was lost on being sent by said L. and H. Huning to the said E. D. Franz, and was never received by said E. D. Franz: Provided, That before the payment hereinbefore authorized, the Secretary of the Treasury shall be satisfied that said check has not been paid, and further that the said E. D. Franz shall execute a bond of indemnity to the United States with sufficient sureties against the claim of the payee in said draft or the claim of any person in possession of or claiming the same, and also to fully indemnify the United States against all loss and damages in the premises.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. PRATT moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SAMUEL J. CRAWFORD.

Mr. PRATT also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 644, a bill (H. R. No. 3889) for the relief of Samuel J. Crawford; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

MINOR CHILDREN OF JOHN C. ROBINSON.

Mr. KNOTT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3890) for the relief of the minor children of John C. Robinson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN A. BRIDGELAND.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent to submit a report at this time. The Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, to whom was submitted by a resolution of the House an inquiry in relation to certain matters bearing upon the official conduct of John A. Bridgeland while supervisor of internal revenue in Texas, have instructed me to present the report and the accompanying evidence and to ask that the same be printed, laid upon the table, and the committee discharged from the further consideration of the same.

Their being no objection, the report was received, and with the accompanying testimony ordered to be printed and laid on the table

DANIEL WORMER.

Mr. EDEN. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill No. 1808, which has been returned from the Senate with an amendment. It is a bill for the relief of Daniel Wormer, of Albany, New York.

There being no objection, the bill and amendment were taken from the Speaker's table.

The amendment of the Senate was in lines 4 and 5 of the bill, to strike out "$3,500" and insert in lieu "$2,000."

Mr. EDEN. The amendment of the Senate reduces the amount given by the bill as it passed the House. I move that the amendment of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD IN DAKOTA TERRITORY.

Mr. KIDDER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3891) to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Fort Abraham Lincoln to the Little Missouri River, in the Territory of Dakota; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must now insist upon the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POPPLETON] has called up the report of the Committee of Elections in the contested-election case of Abbott vs. Frost, from the fourth congressional district of Massachusetts.

Mr. HURLBUT. I desire to raise the question of consideration upon that case. This is private-bill day, and there are a great many bills on the Private Calendar which can be passed if the House can reach them. I therefore will call for a vote upon the question whether the House will now take up this election case or will proceed to the consideration of private bills.

Mr. POPPLETON. The right of a member to his seat is a question of the highest privilege. It seems to me that it can be hardly proper to raise the question of consideration in such a case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to think that the question of consideration may be raised in this case. If the majority of the House are opposed to taking up the matter, it is within their power to refuse to proceed with its consideration. The question before the House is: Will the House proceed at this time to consider the report of the Committee of Elections in the contested-election case of Abbott vs. Frost? The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

When any motion or proposition is made the question, Will the House now consider it? shall not be put unless it is demanded by some member or is deemed necessary by the Speaker. * * * And it is competent for a member to raise the question of consideration upon a report even though a question of privilege is involved in the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now read the resolutions reported from the Committee of Elections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Rufus S. Frost was not elected, and is not entitled, to a seat in the House of Representatives in the Forty-fourth Congress from the fourth congressional district of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That Josiah G. Abbott was elected, and is entitled, to a seat in the House of Representatives in the Forty-fourth Congress from the fourth congressional district of Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question before the House is, Will the House proceed at this time to the consideration of the resolutions just read by the Clerk?

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—ayes 82, noes 65.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. LANE and others called for tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would inquire of the Chair when the morning hour will begin?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour would begin at once but for the interposition of this business.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not this election case a question of the highest privilege?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does not do away with the morning hour at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is the regular business, however.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour will begin as soon as this business is disposed of if the House shall choose to take up this report of the Committee of Elections. The question now is upon ordering tellers upon the question of consideration.

The question was taken; and tellers were ordered, there being 30 in the affirmative; more than one-fifth of a quorum.

Mr. POPPLETON and Mr. HURLBUT were appointed tellers.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. With the permission of the House, I desire to state that the minority of the Committee of Elections have not the least objection to the instant consideration of this case. If any of them shall vote against taking up the report at this time, it will be simply for the purpose of proceeding with the business on the Private Calendar. We do not desire to delay the consideration of this case.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 82, noes 72.

So the House decided to proceed with the consideration of the contested-election case of Abbott vs. Frost.

Mr. POPPLETON. I will now yield one hour to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BAKER,] and give notice that at the expiration of that hour I will call the previous question.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. With the understanding that it shall not be taken out of my time, I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS,] who desires to get action upon a disability bill.

GEORGE WATSON CARR.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent at this time to introduce for immediate action a bill to remove the legal and political disabilities of George Watson CARR, a citizen of the State of Virginia.

Mr. HURLBUT. I would suggest to the gentleman that he leave out of the bill and the title the words "legal and." The Senate invariably strike out those words when they are in such bills as this.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I accept the gentleman's suggestion, and will modify the bill and title accordingly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there a petition accompanying this bill?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. There is.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 3892) to remove the political disabilities of George Watson Carr, a citizen of the State of Virginia, was received, read three several times, and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate was ready to proceed with the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap and to receive the managers on the part of the House, and that the Senate Chamber was prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 779) to provide for the sale of the reservation of the confederated Otoe and Missouria Indians in the States of Kansas and Nebraska, asked a conference with the House upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. INGALLS, Mr. PADDOCK, and Mr. RANSOM.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 2118) to provide for the construction of military posts on the Yellowstone and Muscleshell Rivers.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the resolution of the House of Representatives to amend the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 3411) for the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) for the issue of silver coin.

ELECTION CONTEST—ABBOTT VS. FROST.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the resolutions reported by the Committee of Elections in the case of Josiah G. Abbott vs. Rufus S. Frost, from the fourth congressional district of Massachusetts.

Mr. POPPLETON obtained the floor and yielded to Mr. BAKER, of Indiana.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I do not speak to-day with any serious expectation of inducing any gentleman on the democratic side of the Chamber to vote for the republican member. I beg them, however, to pause and at least examine the case fairly and dispassionately. Under the spur of party zeal, I trust they will not blindly follow their party friends composing the majority of the Committee of Elections. I am so thoroughly convinced of the public wrong and private injustice which they ask the House to consummate that

I cannot consent to allow this case to pass in silence. If here and now the cause of justice must give place to partisan considerations, I believe there is a higher forum before which the decision of this House will be carried for review. There I cannot doubt a decision will be rendered which will satisfy the blindest partisan that the honest electors of the fourth congressional district of Massachusetts entertain the belief that they have the right to choose their own Representative in Congress. I believe such a change will be made at the next election in the representation of this ancient Commonwealth as will satisfy the dominant party in the House that if there is one thing more than another which the intelligent and patriotic voters of that State and of the whole country are determined to resent it is the wrong done them under form of law in electing here to represent them men whom they repudiated at the polls.

I beg the majority to recollect that they were sent here as an experiment. The people are watching their acts with jealous scrutiny to see whether in the past sixteen years of retirement from "their country's service for their country's good" they have forgotten their old ways of crookedness and maladministration. The people are watching to see whether they have learned anything new; to see, in a word, whether being washed up into public life by the tidal wave of 1874 they come up as they went down in 1860, festering all over with corruption and reckless of the perpetuity and welfare of the nation. The thoughtful men of the country demand that the party that controls the destinies of the Republic shall stand abreast the progressive movements of the day; that it shall recognize the revolution accomplished by the war and the recent constitutional amendments, and that it shall be pure, peaceable, and just in its administration of public affairs. The people demand of the party in possession of the Government large performance in every needed legislative reform. The party of large promise and small performance must step down and out. Such has been the democratic party. The people expect and have a right to demand that, rising above considerations of mere partisan advantage, the party in power in this House will decide the great questions relating to its organization and membership on the principles of right and justice. If such elevated views govern in the decision of the case under discussion, the report of the majority will not be adopted as the judgment of the House.

There are only two questions involved in this contest upon which I deem it important to speak. On the other questions the minority of the committee reached by mutual concessions conclusions which harmonize with the views of the majority. The first question to which I shall address some observations relates to the decision of the democratic majority of the committee, Mr. THOMPSON excepted, to reject the entire vote in ward 4 in the city of Chelsea. The next question relates to the decision of the whole of the democratic majority of the committee to strike off 300 votes alleged to have been cast by employés of the Charlestown navy-yard.

THE VOTE IN WARD 4, CHELSEA.

The ground of contest is as follows:

Sixth. That the votes and check-list and the result of the counting of the votes in ward 4 in said city of Chelsea at said election were not returned forthwith by the warden of said ward to the clerk of said city of Chelsea by any constable in attendance at said election or by any ward officer, as required by law, and in fact were not returned to said clerk until the morning following the election.

The statute regulating the return of the ballots, check-list, and the result of the counting is found in sections 40 and 41 of chapter 376, acts of 1874.

SEC. 40. In all elections in cities, whether the same be for United States, State, county, city, or ward officer, it shall be the duty of the warden or other presiding officers to cause all ballots which shall have been given in by the qualified voters of the ward in which such election has been held, and after the same shall have been sorted, counted, declared, and recorded, to be secured in an envelope, in open ward meeting, and sealed with a seal provided for the purpose; and the warden, clerk, and a majority of the inspectors of the ward shall indorse upon the envelope for what officers and in what ward the ballots have been received, the date of the election, and their certificate that all the ballots given in by the voters of the ward, and none others, are contained in said envelope.

SEC. 41. The warden or other presiding officer shall forthwith transmit the ballots, sealed, as aforesaid, to the city clerk, by the constable in attendance at said election or by one of the ward officers other than the clerk; and the clerk shall retain the custody of the seal, and deliver the same, together with the records of the ward and other documents, to his successor in office.

This statute must be construed as directory. The rule is thus well stated by the distinguished author of American Law of Elections, in section 88:

In general, where a statute requires an official act to be done by a given day for a public purpose it must be construed as merely directory in regard to the time. Accordingly it is uniformly held that a statute requiring an officer or board to certify the result of an election or in any way to make known the result, or to issue a commission on or before a given day or within a given number of days after the election, is directory, and not mandatory. Such acts are valid though performed after the expiration of the time. (Ex parte Heath et al., 3 Hill, 42.)

This doctrine has been uniformly maintained by the courts, and nothing is better settled. (People vs. Allen, 6 Wendell, 486, and cases there cited; Colt vs. Eves, 12 Connecticut, 243–253, and cases there cited.)

This principle has been uniformly applied in deciding cases of contested elections by the House. Unless the statute expressly declares that the act shall be invalid provided it is not done within a given time, or unless the delay is so great as to render doubtful the result, a failure to certify the result of the election forthwith will not affect the validity of the returns. In Brockenbrough vs. Cabell, 1 Bartlett, page 84, decided by a democratic House in 1846, this principle was distinctly ruled. The committee says:

The law of Florida requires that the return of votes given for Representative in Congress shall be returned to the secretary of state within thirty days next after the election. Your committee deem the provisions of the law only as directory, and are of the opinion that the votes returned after the thirty days should be counted as well as those returned within that time. A different construction might lead to bad results and tend to defeat the will of the people; a different construction would permit a corrupt officer to defeat the voice of a majority by his refusing to make his return; it would subject the will of that majority to be defeated by the accidental loss of returns. What is the will of the majority legally expressed at the polls has been the rule of the committee, and such the settled rule of the House in a great number of cases.

These principles clearly cover this case and settle the invalidity of the ground of objection to this poll. It is not alleged in the notice of contest that there was any fraudulent conduct or conspiracy on the part of the officers conducting the election to withhold improperly the ballots, check-list, and return of the count. The contest is grounded on the single fact that they were not returned forthwith by the constable in attendance at the election, and that as a legal consequence their delivery on the next morning was too late to satisfy the law. It was therefore insisted that the return from this ward must be rejected. The authorities all show that this principle is unfounded, and hence the majority of the committee is compelled to abandon the issue presented in the notice of contest. They place their decision not on the legal consequence of the failure to make the return forthwith, but on the ground that the ballots, check-list, and return were, while so withheld, fraudulently tampered with. They use this language:

Your committee find from the evidence in the case serious reasons for suspecting that actual fraud was committed in favor of the returned member in this ward.

The majority of the committee, being seized upon by a "suspicion of fraud," leap to the conclusion that five hundred and seventy-five republican voters ought to be disfranchised, not because fraud is alleged or proved, but because in the purity and simplicity of their hearts they "suspect actual fraud" was committed! And the only earthly reason apparent for this suspicion seems to be because Mr. Frost's neighbors preferred him to his democratic competitor. The majority seem to have decided this case on suspicion and not on averment and proof. And thus the party claiming to believe in the right of the people to choose their own representatives give fresh evidence that with them profession and practice are strangers to each other. But is it possible that outside of the committee who signed the report a lawyer can be found on the floor of the House who believes that under the issue tendered any question of fraud arises? No rule of law will permit the contestant to shift his ground of contest and for the first time in his testimony attack the honesty of the officers holding the election by attempting to show that the ballots, check-list, and returns were held back to be tampered with. No such issue is presented in the pleadings, and it would overturn the most ancient and salutary rule of law to permit it. The rule is as elementary as it is uniform that the proofs must be confined to the point in issue and must be relevant to it. There is neither reason, law, nor precedent to justify a departure from this rule. While this House may make a different precedent it cannot give to it the weight of either law or reason.

THE CASE MADE IN THE TESTIMONY.

But when we examine the testimony the charge of fraud is utterly unsustained. The testimony clearly shows that the counting and sealing up the ballots, check-list, and returns were not completed until about a quarter of twelve o'clock at night; That the ballots and check-list, duly sealed up and certified, were delivered to a police officer having the power and authority of a constable to take to the office of the city clerk; that when he reached the office of the city clerk he found it closed; that he then delivered the sealed package containing the ballots and check-list to the captain of the night-watch of the city of Chelsea, who also possessed under the law the authority of a constable, who retained it till the next morning; that the officer to whom the package was delivered by the warden who presided at the election procured it in the morning from the captain of the night-watch, and about seven o'clock in the morning he delivered it to the city clerk; that the seals of the package were unbroken and the package intact. The package had been from the time it left the warden's hands constantly in the hands of an officer vested with the power and authority of a constable. The sworn return of the counting was delivered as required by law to the clerk of the election board. He was the rightful custodian of it. He had it in his possession until about seven o'clock of the morning of the 4th of November, 1874. He could not gain access on the night of election to the office of the city clerk. The ballots, check-list, and the sworn return were in evidence before the committee, and they exactly agree. There was nothing on the face of the return to raise a suspicion that it had been tampered with after it left the hands of the officers holding the election. This fact establishes the conclusion that the ballots and check-list had not been tampered with after they left the custody of the election board. In fact there is not one scintilla of proof in the record that shows that there had been any attempt to tamper with the ballots, check-list, or return after they left the ward-room. There is nothing in the record calculated to raise a suspicion of tampering in an unperverted mind.

The only place, then, where any wrong could have been done was at the ward-room by the sworn officers holding the election, the majority of whom were democrats. The contestant did not have the face to impute the grave crime to the officers holding the election in ward 4, Chelsea, of tampering with the ballots and falsifying the returns. Still it seems to have been as easy for the majority of the committee to help him out on this as it was on his defective notice.

The testimony relied on to stamp the gentlemen holding this election with the commission of a grave crime is given by one Augustus Andrews and one Dexter A. Tompkins. This man Andrews says that at twenty minutes or quarter before ten o'clock in the evening he went to the ward-room of ward 4, Chelsea, where the election had been held; that when he went in there he saw six or eight men present, one or two of whom were police officers; that some of those present were inside of the rails; a few outside; that they were doing nothing, unless one or two were writing; that he asked them if they could give him their figures; that one of them going to another desk gave him the figures—the vote for both Frost and Abbott in that ward; that he asked them if they had forwarded their return, and they said, "Yes," they had just sent them down; that he did not see any ballots or check-list there; that he immediately drove back to the city marshal's office, in Chelsea, and asked a police officer if he had received the figures of the votes of ward 4; that he said he had, and gave them to him; and they corresponded with those given to him just previously at the ward room of ward 4. This is the evidence which raises the suspicion in the mind of the majority that actual fraud was committed by the election board.

I venture to say that it will not excite any serious suspicion in the mind of a candid inquirer for truth. Suppose it is true that he saw six or eight men at the ward-room, and that two only were engaged in writing, and that he saw no ballots and check-list; and suppose, on inquiry, some person, he cannot tell whom, told him the number of votes, and said they had just sent the returns down—and what of all that? Does it prove the commission of a crime upon the officers of the election? But this man is either mistaken in what occurred, or was ignorant of the law fixing the place where the returns were to be sent, or else is testifying falsely. He says he got the returns from the returning board first, and was told they had just sent down their returns. He says that he then immediately drove to the city marshal's office, and asked a police officer there if he had received the figures, and he said he had and gave them to him, and they corresponded with those which he had obtained at the ward-room. If he had got the figures, as he swears, from the officers holding the election, why go to the city marshal's office? Why in any event go to the city marshal's office, for the law required the returns to be sent to the city clerk's office, and not to that of the city marshal? If he doubted the man he talked with at the ward-room, why did he not go to the place to which he knew the returns must be sent? Why inquire of a police officer at a place where there was no means of ascertaining what the vote was if he had just been at the ward-room? This man's evidence, if true, is utterly valueless; but his story bears the indication of being grounded much more upon fancy than fact.

The only other testimony relied on to prove the suspected fraud is that of Tompkins. This man is a music-teacher and a member of the general court. He claims that on the night of November 4, 1874, at the counting-room of a livery-stable he heard one McMichael say that he went to Chelsea on the night of the election and directed or told the ward officers of ward 4, Chelsea, to retain their returns until they heard from ward 2, Boston. Such frivolous hearsay is invoked as evidence. It is absolutely valueless even if was not contradicted. McMichael, however, contradicts it flatly, and explains what he said so clearly as to leave no doubt that this stable tale-bearer misunderstood what passed between McMichael and another person with whom he was talking. There is one other item of hearsay, and only one which is relied on. That is the statement of the clerk Norris; that an inspector of election told him, while they were at work counting, that somebody sent word to keep back the return till ward 2, Boston, had sent in its returns; that no notice was taken of it; that they worked as hard as they could to complete the returns.

I have now gone over and given the substance of all the evidence, hearsay and other, relating to the election in ward 4, Chelsea. It is absolutely valueless to impeach the sworn returns. To reject this poll will be in my judgment a flagrant outrage on the dearest rights of the people.

The next question relates to the striking off of 300 votes alleged to have been cast by employés of the Charlestown navy-yard. The contestant claims that these men were bribed "by giving them employment in the navy-yard at Charlestown." In his brief, page 20, he states his claim thus:

> It is claimed by the contestant that a large number of votes were secured for the returned member by giving voters employment in this navy-yard. The exact number of votes thus secured it is impossible to ascertain.

The statute of Massachusetts provides that "if any person shall pay, give, or bestow, or directly or indirectly promise any gift or reward to secure the vote or ballot of any person for any officer to be voted for at any national, State, or municipal election," he shall be deemed guilty of bribery, and upon conviction be punished by fine or imprisonment, or both, at the discretion of the court.

This statute does not materially change the rule of the common law. Being a penal statute it must be strictly construed. The statute neither disqualifies the voter to vote nor the person voted for to hold the office. The supreme court of Pennsylvania in the case of The Commonwealth vs. Shaver (3 Watts and Serg., 338) decided that—

> The trial and conviction of a sheriff of the offense of bribing a voter previously to his election to the office does not constitutionally disqualify him from exercising the duties thereof.

The only notice of contest raising this question is as follows:

> That many votes were cast and counted at said election for you [the returned member] in said fourth congressional district by persons who were induced to cast said votes by paying, giving, and bestowing upon such voters gifts and rewards, and by promising to pay, give, and bestow to and upon such voters gifts and rewards.

This notice is insufficient to raise any issue or admit of any proof under it. The act of Congress to prescribe the mode of obtaining evidence in cases of contested elections provides, among other things, that the contestant shall, "within thirty days after said election, give notice in writing to the member whose seat he intends to contest; and in such notice shall specify particularly the grounds on which he relies in such contest." It is needless to go into the discussions which have arisen as to what is the true meaning of the words "shall specify particularly the grounds of contest on which he relies." It is manifest that it was not intended as an idle formality. The framers of the law evidently meant to require the averments in the notice of contest to be as certain and definite as the facts of the case would permit. The notice ought to be sufficiently specific as to the time, place, and nature of the charge to put the returned member on notice and enable him to prepare his defense and thus prevent any surprise. The law is thus accurately stated in American Law of Elections, section 344:

> It seems settled by the decisions of the House of Representatives that a notice is good under the law if it specify the number of illegal votes polled, for whom polled, when and where polled, without specifying the names of the illegal voters. (Wright vs. Fuller, 1 Bartlett, page 152; Vallandigham vs. Campbell, 1 Bartlett, page 243; Ottero vs. Gallegos, 1 Bartlett, page 177.)

The notice in this case does not specify the number of votes which are claimed to have been procured by giving employment to the voters. It simply alleges "that many votes were cast and counted" which were thus procured.

> Such an allegation may mean five, or ten, or twenty, or five hundred; it is uncertain and not particular. This point was expressly ruled in the case of Lelar, sheriff of Philadelphia, in 1846. The courts say they will require of the party complaining of illegal votes to state the number; for instance, thus twenty voted under age; fifteen voted who were unnaturalized foreigners; ten voted who were non-residents, &c. This particularity the courts require, because otherwise they would be converted into a mere election board for the purpose of counting disputed ballots. They do not, as this House does not, require the names of the illegal voters to be given. (Wright vs. Fuller, 1 Bartlett, page 181.)

Can any reputable lawyer be found who will contend that the averment that "many fraudulent votes were cast" raises any specific issue? As well contend that a declaration by A alleging that B owed him "many dollars," or in replevin that he wrongfully detained "many cattle," would be sufficient. Such an allegation would be treated by any respectable court in this country as nugatory. To hold it a sufficiently "particular statement" is to nullify the statute and to run against the current of all the authorities. But possibly the great end to be accomplished in unseating a republican and seating a democrat justifies the means. We can only bow in silent wonder at such evidences of reform and fair dealing.

Again, the notice only alleges—

> That many such votes were cast and counted in the fourth congressional district.

This district is composed of seven wards of the city of Boston, the whole of the city of Chelsea, and the two towns of Winthrop and Revere. There are not less than thirteen voting-precincts in it. The only notice is that somewhere in this district many votes were procured to be cast and counted by giving employment to voters in the navy-yard. But where? In Boston? If so, where, in what ward or wards? In Chelsea? At what voting-place? In Revere or Winthrop? The notice gives us no information. The whole question is reduced to this: Does a notice of contest "specify particularly the grounds of contest" when it simply alleges "that many illegal votes were cast in the district?" To so hold would abrogate the statute and do away with the necessity of any notice of contest at all. It gives no more specific notice than it would to serve a paper stating simply the fact of an intended contest. How can the returned member prepare for the trial of the question whether illegal votes have been cast or not? If it is answered that he knows whether he has corrupted any voters or not, the sufficient reply is that such an argument would do away with all pleading. The law gives the contestee the right to a specific statement of the grounds of contest. He is entitled to this information for his defense.

But it has been suggested that this objection has been waived. There is no system of laws with which I have any acquaintance whereby going to trial on a declaration bad in substance the defendant is held to have waived the objection. Neither by the common law nor by statute is the failure to object to the sufficiency of such a declaration before going to trial held to be a waiver. The objection can be taken at any stage of the trial of the cause. I submit that we are bound to apply this principle of law to this case.

There are other considerations which show that the doctrine of waiver can have no just application to this objection to the notice. The returned member cannot waive the rights of the people in this contest. His failure to object in limine to the sufficiency of the notice cannot abridge the people's right to have this case decided by the established rules of law. The certificate of election issued to Mr. Frost entitles the fourth congressional district to have him remain as their Representative until his prima facie right is overcome by averment and proof as required by the statute. How can the sitting member by any act of omission defeat the people's right to have the question settled in accordance with the law and fact?

This question affects not only the people of the district but of the whole country; and for us to shirk the responsibility of deciding it according to the law on the theory that a member can waive the public right involved is an unworthy evasion of duty. I recognize the value and importance of the doctrine of waiver in cases where it is fairly applicable. Where parties representing only their own private interests do any act amounting to a waiver, or where they do an act which, if they were allowed to recall it, would operate as a fraud upon their adversary, a court may well act upon and enforce the waiver. Here no wrong or injury can be claimed to result from Mr. Frost's pressing this objection, and hence no question of waiver can arise. The House, with due regard to public interests, cannot permit a contestant to disregard a plain requirement of law, one essential to the speedy and correct disposition of election contests. How can a limit be put upon the scope of the inquiry in any other manner than by requiring a specific statement of the grounds of contest? Must the committee and the House be left with no knowledge of the issues to be tried except such as they may gain from reading a mass of incongruous and conflicting testimony? Such a practice would prove intolerable. With the application of a reasonable rule on this subject this class of cases has become sufficiently numerous and laborious. We owe obligations to the whole body of the people which forbid our tolerating a practice which would consume our time in settling questions which are not brought before us as the law requires. To adhere to the law can work no injustice. To depart from it cannot otherwise than prove dangerous.

In conclusion on this point I want to say that there is no provision of law providing when, where, or in what manner objection can be taken to the sufficiency of the notice. It cannot be made until the case is brought before the House for the consideration of the questions pertaining to the contest. This is the first and only place where such objection can be made or considered. I submit that the House cannot escape the duty of deciding the question whether the above specification of contest is legally sufficient. To hold it sufficient would override the statute, reverse the precedents of the House, run counter to the uniform current of judicial authority, and practically relieve a contestant from the necessity of giving any notice whatever. I beg gentlemen to consider whether an act of such flagrant disregard of all law and precedent is just or prudent at this time?

PROOFS OF ALLEGED NAVY-YARD FRAUDS.

I come now to the alleged bribing of voters by giving them employment in the navy-yard. This is an old and, with the democratic party, a familiar subject. Their profligate and shameless prostitution of the navy-yards of the country to partisan purposes during their control of the Government is a record which presents a foul blot upon the page of our history. So debauched had this service become during the time of Buchanan, the last bachelor President the people of this country propose to have, that the President, the Secretary of the Navy, many democratic members of Congress, and other high officials used the patronage of the navy-yards as a means of controlling elections and enriching favorites. Corruption and venality grew rank through the whole service. The corruptions, frauds, and peculations of the democratic party—of some of the loudest of the democratic reformers of to-day—in the Navy Department polluted the very fountain of government, and they were equally shameless in all the other Departments.

You had but to strip the mask of democracy from their faces and you beheld the bloated and hideous features of a corruptionist. You had but to strip the mask of patriotism from their faces and you beheld the ghastly visages of traitors plotting here on this sacred spot, in the capital of the nation, to overthrow and dismember the Republic. The same men are now the patriots and reformers of to-day—the men who, like the Pharisees, thank God they are not like the radicals. Their conversion to the cause of patriotism and reform looks much like a death-bed repentance. It looks much as though they wanted to be esteemed genuine reformers in order to again revel on the spoils of office. This eager yearning to unearth corruption through secret committees of the House is new-born. It is a well-known historical fact that when Congress proposed to investigate and expose the frauds, corruptions, and peculations of Andrew Jackson's administration, he took the high ground that the executive being an equal co-ordinate Department of the Government, the Congress could not constitutionally investigate his administration. He also planted himself upon that other constitutional guarantee found in the bill of rights, that no man accused of crime shall be compelled to furnish evidence to convict himself. And in this defiance of the power of the House the democratic reformers of that day sustained him, and thus practically defeated all investigation. And so, during the whole history of this corrupt and profligate party while in possession of the Executive Departments of the Government, it has opposed investigation into its own corruptions and frauds. The country will estimate at their true worth both the motive and character of the secret, ex parte, inquisitorial investigations conducted by this same party at this time.

I propose further on to adduce some well-authenticated facts to prove the truth of my charge of corruption in the navy-yards in the days of democratic supremacy. Before proceeding to do so, I wish to make a few additional observations in reference to the alleged bribing of voters in the navy-yard by giving them employment. It is not my purpose to go into any minute analysis of the mass of testimony on this subject. I submit that a careful reading of it will show that the exigencies of the public service fully justified the increase of force; and that a considerable portion of it could have been longer retained with advantage to the Government. It will also show that when the reduction took place it was not for the want of profitable employment, but for the want of money to carry on the work. With but one or two exceptions the witnesses concur in stating that the men were steadily and usefully employed. These exceptional witnesses, and particularly Splaine, are so thoroughly contradicted and overthrown by the uniform statement of many others, that no candid mind can hesitate in disregarding their testimony. The testimony shows that much the largest portion of the employés in the navy-yard came from other congressional districts. The force there employed is shown to have been residents of five or six districts in the State of Massachusetts.

The only ground upon which the charge of bribery rests is that Mr. Frost and his political friends gave recommendations to a number of voters asking the proper officers in the navy-yard to give those parties labor. The testimony shows that persons who were not voters were employed as well as those who were. No questions were asked and no conditions imposed on such as sought employment. It is clearly shown that no inducement, no suggestion was held out by Mr. Frost or any other person for him to affect or influence any one in giving his vote. If any single man in the navy-yard had been influenced, or even a suggestion made to him as to his vote, this could have been easily shown. The force which it is claimed had been bribed by being given employment had all been discharged, and they were no longer under any necessity of covering up the corruption if any existed. The law required that the contestant should prove that the voters had been bribed, corrupted. I denounce the new-made law that a recommendation for employment made by a candidate for office shortly before election amounts to bribery, to corruption of the voter. I denounce as unworthy of this House the infamous doctrine that a candidate for Congress is to be branded as a briber of voters simply by proof that he has signed letters recommending laborers to employment in the public service. It is an imputation on the honor of American manhood to apply to them the doctrine that every voter who procures a candidate for office to recommend him for employment is thereby impliedly bribed and corrupted. This is the doctrine which this House must hold to unseat Mr. Frost. And I undertake to say that the very men who are sitting in judgment on his case have a hundred times done the same thing. O! consistency, rare jewel; but thou art not found consorting with democratic reformers.

Gentlemen need not talk about there being any direct proofs of corrupting voters. There is not one word of it; I defy its production. Even the basest and vilest of the gang who were subsidized to swear for Abbott could not name a man who had been employed under any agreement made with Mr. Frost or his friends that in consideration of such employment he would vote the republican ticket. But, says the majority, it is to be inferred from the fact that a large number of men were employed shortly before election on Mr. Frost's recommendation. Then the committee, inferring from these facts that the voter thus employed was bribed, infer without a shadow of proof two other facts: First, that he voted; second, that he voted for Mr. Frost. Is not this a monstrous proposition? Why I say that no rule of law would justify the striking off a vote, even on direct and positive proof of bribery, without proof that the man thus bribed had voted. Now, I want to say, after the most careful scrutiny, there is no evidence to show that a man recommended for employment by Mr. Frost voted at the election in 1874.

I want to go further, and affirm that the only shadow of proof touching on this point is this, that on the check-list of those voting are found names similar to the names of those recommended. That is all the proof there is, and it is no proof at all. The fact that Mr. Frost recommended a John Smith for employment is no evidence that he is the same John Smith who voted in one of the wards of Boston. There are four men now in this city named John H. Baker; but I submit, with deference to the majority, that these four are not one and the same person. These same check-lists show that there are often two, and sometimes more, men in a large ward of a city having the same name.

Now, gentlemen, I respectfully state that you cannot show a single scintilla of further proof that the men recommended by Mr. Frost voted. I further affirm that you cannot even by hanging your case on that presumption take the list of names of the increased force in the navy-yard and comparing it with the check-list find enough names alike on both lists to count Mr. Frost out. So far as proof is concerned you might as well strike off a thousand as three hundred. Be candid now, gentlemen, and give us the names of the three hundred voters whom you disfranchise. You cannot do it. You strike blindly simply because you have the power to make your blow effective.

The increased force placed on the rolls of this navy-yard between October 1 and 31, 1874, was just five hundred and eighty-six. These came from five or six congressional districts. I beg to be informed how the majority ascertained that just three hundred, no more, no less, came from Mr. Frost's district, and only two hundred and eighty-six came from all the others. I want gentlemen to inform us how they obtained this information. It is not in proof in this case, and yet, most surprising conclusion, the majority reports it as an established fact.

We believe the law is undoubted that the contestant is bound to show that in consequence of this increased force being employed he lost votes which he otherwise would have received, or that Mr. Frost received votes which he otherwise would not have received. This he has not done nor even attempted to do. A certain number of men, legal residents and qualified voters of the fourth congressional district, were employed in the navy-yard between the 1st of September and the day of the election. The qualifications of an elector of a member of Congress in this State are that he be a male citizen twenty-one years of age; that he shall have resided in the State one year and within the city or town and congressional district in which he claims to vote six months next preceding the election; that he shall have paid a poll-tax assessed upon him within two years next preceding the election, and that where his right to vote was not acquired before May 18, 1857, he shall be able to write his name and read the Constitution in the English language. Besides this, the navy-yard is not located within the fourth congressional district. Hence it was manifestly impossible to have colonized any man in the district for voting purposes. No man could be a voter at the election in 1874 unless he possessed the qualifications requisite before he was employed in the navy-yard. No man employed in the navy-yard voted who was not a legally qualified elector. They having all the legal qualifications of voters cannot be deprived of their right to vote.

But if we concede that bribery would disqualify such an elector, must not the proof of bribery be conclusive? And yet there is not a scintilla of legal evidence to support the charge and justify the branding a large body of men with crime. It is not even shown how these men voted or that they voted at all. It is clear that they were lawful voters, and that no influence, inducement, or dictation was used upon any voter. It is not shown that a single one of them voted contrary to his free and uninfluenced convictions. I challenge the proof to show that a single man of this increased force in the navy-yard was bribed by Mr. Frost or any one on his behalf to vote for him. You ask the House to infer that every man of this increased force was bribed because they were recommended and employed by republicans; that they voted and that they cast their votes for the returned member. No rule of law will justify the indulgence of such presumption to disfranchise electors otherwise duly qualified. I submit that both the law and the evidence in the case will be disregarded by the unseating of Mr. Frost; and I beg gentlemen to pause before consummating this great public wrong and private injustice. Doubtless appeals to the lofty consideration of right and justice will fall upon unwilling ears and prove unavailing. However that may be, it seemed to me that duty demanded thus much at my hands.

FRAUDS IN RELATION TO THE AGENCY FOR PURCHASING COAL FOR THE NAVY.

I cannot, however, leave this case without a brief historical review of the management of the Navy and navy-yards by the democratic party during the administration of James Buchanan. The facts are found in a report of the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, No. 621, of the first session of the Thirty-sixth Congress. This report discloses the grossest corruption in the appointment of one Dr. Hunter as agent to purchase coal for the Navy. In May, 1858, some of the applicants for appointment of coal agent met each other and also Hon. J. Glancy Jones, then a member of Congress, at Washington. It was agreed that Dr. Hunter should be appointed, and the emoluments of the office should be farmed out between Hunter, John F. Smith, and Hon. J. Lawrence Getz, since a democratic member of Congress. This corrupt arrangement the committee find was known to the President, and he interposed no objection, but acquiesced in it. It was thus corruptly arranged to reward democratic politicians for partisan service.

The duties of this agency were performed in a manner equally as profligate as its procurement was corrupt. Dr. Hunter never purchased any coal, did not know its market value, and took no pains to ascertain it. The only duty he performed was to sign formal papers and draw his salary. He resided at Reading, Pennsylvania, and intrusted the purchasing of coal to Tyler, Stone & Co., Philadelphia, dealers in coal, who furnished the same to the Government at $3.85 per ton, when the value of the same quality of coal in that market was only $3.50 per ton. Dr. Hunter regularly signed formal papers falsely certifying that a specific quantity of coal of the best quality had been duly inspected and weighed by him and shipped on board a named vessel. These papers were sent to the proper Bureau in the Navy Department, and all parties there knew or ought to have known that these certificates were false. In the six months from the 1st of July, 1858, to the 31st of December, 1858, Tyler, Stone & Co., partisan friends of President Buchanan, claimed to have furnished and were paid for about forty thousand tons of coal at $3.85. The direct fraud upon the Government on this amount of coal was over $14,000, while Dr. Hunter received for his laborious services in signing false certificates during this period the sum of $7,452.92, which he divided with one of his partners, John F. Smith; and thus the money plundered from the Treasury was placed where it would do the most good. Swindling, thy name is democratic honesty.

LIVE-OAK TIMBER.

The Government was swindled on a larger scale and with a more shameless disregard of law, if possible, in the purchases of live-oak timber for the Navy. Mr. W. C. N. Swift was the lucky man this time. He had been an old-line whig, came over to the democratic party, and speedily fell into the ways of your genuine democratic reformer of the present day. Mr. George Plitt, of Philadelphia, was an active and intimate friend of President Buchanan and was treasurer of the democratic State central committee of Pennsylvania. Mr. Swift placed in the hands of Mr. Plitt $16,000, of which $10,000 was contributed by Mr. Swift and the balance he procured from his immediate friends. This money was to be used as a corruption fund in the presidential election of 1856. Pending the presidential election of 1856, Plitt introduced Swift to Mr. Buchanan and used all his influence to place him in the very best relations with him. When success was achieved, of course so able a corruptionist as Mr. Swift could not be overlooked by a reform democratic administration. He was not overlooked. The whole power and influence of the Government was turned in his favor. He furnished all the live-oak timber for naval construction.

Without going into details, and without speaking of the wrong done to other parties who having taken contracts found them suddenly canceled without excuse and awarded to Swift, it is sufficient to say that Swift and his friend Plitt, with whom Swift divided the plunder, grew rich out of these frauds upon the Government. The Government was swindled in the price paid, being much higher than others would have furnished it for, and nearly one hundred thousand dollars' worth of timber which had been rejected as unfit for use by the naval inspectors was finally taken off his hands. All these frauds were connived at by the Secretary of the Navy, and must have been known by the President.

CONTRACTS FOR MACHINERY.

In June, 1858, an act was passed authorizing the building of seven sloops of war. The Secretary of the Navy was empowered to advertise for proposals for their construction, and he was required to let the contracts to the lowest responsible bidder. He had no legal discretion, and the President had no right to interfere in the matter. In July, 1858, the Secretary invited sealed proposals for the steam-machinery, &c., of these sloops. For the steam-machinery, &c., of the large sloop at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, one thousand horse-power, the Novelty Iron-Works, New York, put in a bid at $98,500, and Woodruff & Beach, Hartford, Connecticut, put in a bid at $125,000. The latter firm, party friends of the Administration, were awarded the contract at a loss to the Government of $26,500. The loss to the Government from accepting bids contrary to law and on grounds of partisan expediency, on the item of steam-machinery alone for these seven sloops was $71,500. The contract for the steam-machinery for the large sloop built at Philadelphia was awarded to Merrick & Sons, of that city, at the price of $102,000 over the Novelty Iron Works, New York, whose bid was $98,000. This was done at the express suggestion of the President, in order to bribe Merrick & Sons, who were old-line whigs, to secure the vote of the four hundred and fifty laborers in their employ. This interference by the President was in violation of law, and was as corrupt and shameless as it would have been for him to have dictated to a judge of his own appointment a decision which he should make. The crime was far more infamous than the grave offense committed by Belknap. But Buchanan was a democratic reformer of the Tilden stripe, and Belknap was not.

I have time to refer to only one further specimen of democratic honesty and reform in connection with the Navy. That is the corrupt use of the navy-yards as mere political machines to carry elections. The report to which I have referred shows that in the summer and fall of 1858 the force in eight navy-yards was increased from 6,697, May 1, 1858, to 10,038 November 1, 1858. The only occasion for this great increase was to carry elections for the democratic party. In the Brooklyn navy-yard the number of laborers May 1, 1858, was 1,379, and November 1, 1858, it had been increased to 2,488—an increase of 1,109 men. In the Philadelphia navy-yard the number of men employed May 1, 1858, was 1,064, and between the 16th and 31st of October the number had been increased to 1,722—an increase of 658 men. In the navy-yard at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, the number of men May 1, 1858, was 544, and October 1 to 15 it had swollen to 900—an increase of 356 men, enough to control the election in so small a State and one so nearly equally divided politically. In the navy-yard at Boston May 1, 1858, there were 966 laborers employed, and on November 1, 1858, there were 1,576—an increase of 610 men. The increase of force in the navy-yard in Washington during this period was about 100 men. At the navy-yard at Norfolk, Virginia, there were employed June 30, 1858, 1,223 men, and October 31, 1858, 1,936 men—an increase of 713.

The selection of the men in these navy-yards was placed by the Secretary of the Navy under the control of the democratic Congressmen who lived in their vicinity. The correspondence of democratic members of Congress printed in the report shows that they quarreled among themselves as to their respective claims to have control of this patronage; and that Secretary Toucey undertook to settle their differences by directing "that the masters should select from the different districts adjacent to the yard, in equal proportions, upon the recommendation of members, the workmen employed in the shops." This was probably as fair a division as could be made.

Doubtless the Secretary knew that when setting up the primaries, bullying honest voters, stuffing the ballot-boxes, and falsifying the returns were the objects in view he could not find abler or more skillful admirals in this department of naval warfare than the democratic Congressmen thus commissioned. One of them was that noble reformer, Hon. John Kelly, a big Indian of Tammany, I believe, whose sudden conversion to Mr. Tilden's support shows the estimate yet placed upon the virtues he developed under a former democratic administration. When Kelly, Morrissey, and reformers of that class propose to secure for Tilden 50,000 majority in New York, the long service which they have had under that great and good democratic reformer, Tweed, and Tweed's late bosom friend, Samuel J. Tilden, doubtless warrants them in the belief that they can redeem their promise. If they should succeed and return the fell brood of corruptionists who vampire-like sucked the life-blood of the nation in former days to the control of the national Government, every decent man in the land will have occasion to exclaim with Schurz: "Humbug, thy name is democratic reform!"

I cannot better close this brief review of the conduct of naval affairs by the last democractic administration than in the guarded words of the report:

> This system, added to the abuses previously existing, has reduced the navy-yard to a mere political machine, where idleness, theft, insubordination, fraud, and gross neglect of duty prevailed to an alarming degree.

Mr. POPPLETON. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. POPPLETON. I now yield fifteen minutes of the hour to which I am entitled to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. FROST,] the contestee.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, the House has been informed by the gentleman who has preceeded me that both the democratic and republican members of the committee agree that I was elected by 58 majority unless the vote of ward 4, Chelsea, is thrown out, or 300 votes deducted from my majority on account of the voters employed in the navy-yard. I propose to read to the House two short documents from democratic officials regarding the vote of ward 4, Chelsea. The first is from the warden, the presiding officer at elections, and he a democrat:

BOSTON, June 27, 1876.

MY DEAR SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your esteemed favor of the 15th instant, and in reply I am pleased to give you the facts in regard to the vote of ward 4, Chelsea, and my connection therewith.

I was first elected warden at the fall election in 1873, and, having been twice re-elected, continue to hold the office. At each of the three elections I received nearly the unanimous vote of both political parties. I have never before held a political office, having steadily refused to accept any and all that have been tendered me. I accepted this at the request of many citizens and thinking that perhaps it was my duty to bear a portion of the burden incident to our republican form of government.

I am engaged in mercantile business, and a close application to the same precludes any possibility of political aspirations.

My political sentiments, however, are now, and ever have been, in sympathy with democracy, and at every election, State and national, (with one exception, when I cast no vote,) I have voted the straight democratic ticket. At the election in 1874, when Judge Abbott and yourself were rival candidates for Congress—with all due respect for your many qualifications to ably fill the office—I then, as ever, cast a straight democratic ballot, voting for Judge Abbott, who was our regular nominee.

As regards the congressional vote in ward 4, Chelsea, in 1874, there can be no doubt of the accuracy of the ballot as returned to the city clerk. It was carefully counted by honest men, and as carefully and honestly recorded, and I am confident that there is not one of the five ward officers but who will say under oath that the vote as returned to the city clerk was exactly the same as made up in open ward meeting and there announced on the evening of election.

The delay in the transmission of the ballots, returns, &c., to the city clerk was occasioned by the polling of a heavy vote, an unusually large portion of which were badly "scratched." Especially was this the case with the names for State representatives and for some offices of minor importance.

As the count was about closed, a slight discrepancy was discovered on one of the State offices, and a recount of those ballots was ordered, which delayed our returns fully an hour or more. The documents were then signed and sealed and put into the hands of the officer of the law in attendance and one of the officers of the ward for transmission to the city clerk.

The officer subsequently reported to me that they proceeded immediately to the City Hall, and on arriving there found the hall closed. They then took the documents to the city marshal's office at once, and left them in charge of the marshal over night, delivering them to the city clerk at an early hour the following morning.

This may not have been in accordance with the strict letter of the law, but that by this delay any infringement of the law was intended or any tampering with the ballot was premeditated or accomplished I here most emphatically deny.

If the ballot, &c., were not returned according to law, and if this point is of itself sufficient evidence to throw out the entire vote, that of course ends the matter. If, however, evidence may be received to prove the vote as recorded accurate and honest, it can readily be obtained.

I have in my possession all the papers on which the original count was kept and made up by the inspectors, clerk, and myself, and can prove the same to be the original papers by the several ward officers, whose writing and figures are upon the same.

These papers show in detail the several counts through the day, and, as they agree with the returns as recorded with the city clerk and have never for one moment been out of my possession, I know beyond a possibility of question that the vote was not changed or altered, but as recorded with the city clerk is exactly as it was made up in open ward meeting, there announced to the citizens, and is correct in every particular.

From these papers a comparison of the voting can be made, and will show that on each count the proportion of votes for the several offices, excepting that of governor, on each political ticket varied but a trifle during the entire day.

Again, after the close of the polls and as soon as the count was made up on any office of special importance the result was immediately announced to the citizens in waiting. These announcements were made from seven and one-half to ten o'clock. The result of the congressional vote was announced at from nine to nine and one-half o'clock, and as announced to the public agreed with the returns made to the city clerk.

This is susceptible of proof by the citizens who were present at the announcement, as also by all of the ward officers, and still again by the reporters of the several Boston newspapers, each of which published this count in connection with the count of the whole city in their early morning edition, as their files of November 4, 1874, will prove, and this count as published agrees with the count made up in open ward meeting as also with the recorded count of the city clerk.

This, I believe, so far as concerns the facts and my connection therewith, covers the entire ground. The statements herein contained I am ready at any time to make oath to, and have every confidence that the same will be sustained under oath by every ward officer and citizen who were present or who are knowing to the facts.

I am informed that the committee have reported in favor of throwing out the entire vote of ward 4, Chelsea. I sincerely hope that such gross injustice may not be done.

Very respectfully and waiving all personality, the question of who is entitled to the seat in Congress from the fourth district is of minor importance when compared with the question, shall an entire ward of over one thousand legal voters be disfranchised on a technicality of law when there exists abundant evidence to prove the accuracy and honesty of the vote questioned? Shall the ward officers, the city clerk, (a faithful officer of over thirty years' standing,) the city marshal and his several subordinates, the representatives of the Boston papers, and the many citizens who were present at the announcement of the vote in the ward-room and whose evidence can be obtained, shall they all by inference be branded as liars? Either they are, and are to-day criminals before the law, or they are not; and the vote of ward 4, Chelsea, is correct and honest, and as such is no more to be questioned than would be a roll-call of the House of Representatives.

With great respect for both yourself and Judge Abbott, I have herein written nothing as for or against either, but solely in the interests of the legal voters of ward 4, Chelsea, to the end that on this question they may have justice done them, and not be deprived of their suffrages on that occasion.

With kind regards, I beg to remain your obedient servant,

ALONZO R. JAMES.

Hon. R. S. FROST, Washington, D. C.

The second letter is from the democratic representative to the Legislature of Massachusetts:

CHELSEA, June 17, 1876.

DEAR SIR: I cannot help expressing my regret at that part of the committee's report relating to ward 4, Chelsea. As a democratic resident of that ward for the past twenty years, I can truly say that the ward has always been noted for its fairness and honesty in all that related to its conduct of elections. Although a strong republican ward, outnumbering my own party at times ten to one, we have always had a representation on the board of ward officers; and at the late congressional election the warden, Mr. James, and one of the inspectors, Mr. Powers, were democrats; and I feel that the report of the committee is as much a reflection upon our own party as yours. Mr. James is, as you know, one of our best citizens, a thoroughly honest, conscientious gentleman; no man in our community has a better reputation, and to his desire to have a thoroughly correct return made may be ascribed the delay which resulted in the technical violation of the election laws.

Although a democrat from the day I cast my first vote and an active worker for Judge Abbott during the campaign, I cannot help expressing my sorrow at what I consider a most unjust imputation upon the officers and citizens of ward 4.

Truly yours, &c.,

HENRY T. HOLMES,

Democratic Representative to the Legislature of Massachusetts From the Thirteenth District for the Years 1875 and 1876.

Hon. RUFUS S. FROST.

If this is the sentiment of democrats, how do you suppose the remainder of the community feel?

To show you that the votes of ward 4 were correctly counted in 1874, I will read the record of the two previous presidential elections in comparison with it:

Vote of ward 4, Chelsea.

Now as to the navy-yard vote. The evidence shows most conclusively that the exigencies of the public service not only justified but actually required a large increase of force, and, further, that a considerable portion of that force could have been retained longer with manifest advantage to the Government, and that when it was suddenly reduced it was not for the want of profitable labor, but for the want of money to carry on the work. With but one or two exceptions, the witnesses concur in stating that while there the men were usefully employed. These exceptional witnesses who attempt to deny this are so fully contradicted by the unanimous statement of the others that no unprejudiced mind can be left in doubt.

Another fact also stands out in plain relief upon this evidence, and that is, that the increase in the force was limited to applicants from no one or two congressional districts, but extended to five or six.

Another fact appears, and that is, that persons who were not voters at all were employed, and, further, that no questions were asked and no conditions imposed upon the men who entered upon the service. It is clearly and conclusively shown that no coercion, no influence, no suggestion even was ever held out by any person in the service of the Government to any other person to affect or influence his vote. So clearly did this appear by the contestant's own evidence that he thought it important to show by one witness that at one of the entrances to the yard a person was once seen holding in his hand what appeared to be ballots. But whether they were ballots, or, if so, what kind or for whom, or whether a solitary voter took one, much less whether he voted one, is left in a state of uncertainty. The contestant has rendered a public service in showing that, if the Government did attempt by the simple increase of force indirectly to increase the chances of a party triumph, the voter was left completely untrammeled and absolutely free to exercise his right of suffrage without sacrificing a jot or tittle of his manhood. But, leaving the subject still open for comment or criticism in its merely political and partisan aspects, the contestant wholly fails to derive any advantage from the evidence he adduces for several of the most obvious reasons.

He fails to show that a solitary voter from the force in the navy-yard was improperly or illegally induced to vote for Rufus S. Frost. He fails to show that one illegal vote was thrown at all by that body of men. He utterly fails to show that a solitary vote was changed by the circumstance of that employment. He even fails to show that any of that increased force voted for Mr. Frost at all or that they did not vote for Mr. Abbott. The obvious presumption that the applicants for labor would be mostly from the party having the labor in its gift is one that runs into every department of government; but who ever seriously proposed to disfranchise a man for that reason? Who would disfranchise clerks in the post-offices throughout the country for the same reason? On the other hand, this very presumption—and that is all the contestant contests upon—is fatal to the contestant's case, for if the new employés of the navy-yard were republicans, and employed because they were republicans, the argument is conclusive that no votes were changed by the employment, but that the parties worked as they voted, and, finally, voted as they worked—republicans. As a matter of law or logic the contestant was bound to show that in consequence of this increase of force he lost votes which he otherwise would have received or that Mr. Frost received votes which he would not have otherwise received; and this he has not done or even attempted to do.

I lay down this last proposition as the least which the contestant was obliged to do, while I deny that even that would of itself constitute a valid objection to a vote unless the contestant went much further. In a word, the evidence on this branch of the case is this: A certain number of men were employed in the navy-yard between the dates of October 1 and December 1 whose legal residences were within the limits of the fourth congressional district. It is not proved or known how these men voted, nor whether they voted at all; but it does appear that no influence, dictation, or suggestion was used upon a solitary voter, or that he voted in a single instance contrary to his settled convictions. Those, if any, who voted for Mr. Frost had a legal right so to do; those, if any, who voted for Abbott acted with equal freedom. Not a solitary illegal vote was thrown for either, so far as the evidence discloses. This statement of the case, which is in exact accord with the evidence, is a sufficient reply to the claims made by the contestant and a complete vindication of the vote given to Mr. Frost, whatever that vote was from that quarter.

When asked to recommend workmen to those who employed men in the navy-yard, I never asked them about their politics. I remember of two men who applied to me for recommendation whom I knew to be strong democrats, whom I knew would vote for Judge Abbott. As I knew them to be good workmen I recommended them cheerfully, and felt a little pride in showing them that I had no partisan feeling.

The House will, therefore, see that it would be a great wrong to throw out the vote of ward 4, Chelsea, and an equal injustice to disfranchise the workmen in the navy-yard by jumping at a round three hundred, and saying you guess that is about the right number to be deducted, when there is not the first scintilla of evidence to show that a single fraudulent vote was cast by a workman in the navy-yard.

I therefore hope, Mr. Speaker, that the House will rise above partisanship and refuse to throw out the vote of ward 4, Chelsea, and also refuse to disfranchise the workmen in the navy-yard. If they do, the sitting member will be retained in his seat.

Mr. POPPLETON. Mr. Speaker, it is a little remarkable that according to the practice which has obtained in the management of contested-election cases in this Congress, gentlemen whose seats are contested come upon the floor of the House and undertake to make their case here rather than before your committee in the committee-room. This is not the only time that this has occurred during the present Congress. In another case, after the proof was submitted, after the issues were made up, after the deliberations of the committee were concluded, its judgment formed, and its report made to the House, the contestee placed himself in the attitude of attempting to furnish proof before the House and to ignore your committee.

Mr. FROST. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. POPPLETON. Certainly.

Mr. FROST. I would like to ask the gentleman whether I have not offered these matters in testimony before the committee—certainly without ignoring the committee?

Mr. POPPLETON. I can say in reply to the gentleman's question that after the report of the committee was printed, after their labors upon this case were closed and a deliberate conclusion reached, when weeks had elapsed after that period, then the contestee did present these letters for my consideration as chairman of the sub-committee, and only then. The point I make is that if gentlemen have facts within their possession or knowledge which bear upon the case, it is their duty to present those facts before the tribunal authorized to hear and determine the question. It does not lie with gentlemen, after the committee have adjudicated the question and made their report, to come upon the floor of the House and appeal to members to listen to ex parte statements by men who might have been called as witnesses, whose sworn testimony might have been produced before the committee.

Mr. FROST. Will the gentleman allow me one word by way of personal explanation?

Mr. POPPLETON. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FROST. I would like to say that so far from my wishing to ignore the committee, these letters were sent to me of their own accord by gentlemen who felt that they were being injured at home by the report of the committee.

Mr. POPPLETON. I can hardly imagine, Mr. Speaker, how gentlemen can be injured with the courts open, and in the face of the service of a notice of contest notifying the gentleman that on account of laches, on account of misconduct, on account of neglect on the part of the officers of the fourth ward, Chelsea, the vote of that ward was to be attacked and that Judge Abbott would ask this House to exclude that vote from the count; I can hardly see how gentlemen can place themselves on record and say that they are afraid injustice is going to be done them. There were forty days within which they might have presented their proof. Mr. Andrews, a reputable gentleman, swears that upon the night of the election, between the hours of nine and ten o'clock, he went to that poll and that the vote as then announced to him varied materially, to the extent of some 220 votes, from the vote as given afterward upon the recount of the ballots. The testimony of Mr. Andrews was on file. The warden of that precinct was challenged by that testimony to step upon the witness-stand and swear that what Mr. Andrews said was not true. The three inspectors and the night-watchman, who had the unlawful custody of those ballots during a period of about seven hours in the night, were challenged to step upon the witness-stand and contradict the testimony of Mr. Andrews, who swore that there was a discrepancy of at least 220 votes between the count as given to him at the ward polls at night and the return count of the board of inspectors some four days afterward. This testimony was of record.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. POPPLETON. With the greatest pleasure in the world; I am always ready to accommodate my friend from New York.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Did that witness testify that any officer of the election or any police officer told him what he heard?

Mr. POPPLETON. I will answer the gentleman's question by reading Mr. Andrews's testimony.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Very well.

Mr. POPPLETON. And this House will then understand what he has sworn to.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. That is right.

Mr. POPPLETON. I read now from the deposition of Augustus Andrews:

Interrogatory 1. State your name, age, residence, and occupation.

Answer. My name is Augustus Andrews; my age is twenty-two years; I reside at No. 5 Baldwin Place, Boston; am counselor at law.

Int. 2. On November 3, 1874, did you go to the ward-room of ward 4, Chelsea; if so, at what time?

A. I did, at twenty minutes or quarter of ten o'clock in the evening.

Int. 3. State what you saw, and what took place while you were there.

A. When I went in there were six or eight men present, one or two of whom were police officers; some of those present were inside of the rails; a few outside; they were doing nothing unless one or two were writing; I asked them if they could give me their figures; thereupon one of them, going to another desk—

Now what does that mean, "going to another desk?" It was to some man who had authority and the right inside that railing. None but officers of the election were allowed inside by the statute.

Thereupon one of them, going to another desk, gave me the figures—the vote both for Frost and Abbott in that ward. I asked them if they had forwarded their returns. They said, "Yes; they had just sent them down."

Int. 4. Did you see any check-list or ballots in the room while you were there?

A. I did not.

Int. 5. What did you then do?

A. I immediately drove back to the city marshal's office, in Chelsea, and asked a police officer if he had received the figures of the votes of ward 4. He said he had, and gave them to me. They corresponded to those given to me just previously at the ward-room of ward 4.

That is the testimony of Andrews. He further goes on and states that the vote given him was 150 for Abbott and about 400 for Frost. After these ballots had lain in the custody of this night-watchman overnight, after they had gone away from the proper legal receptacle, after they had been seven or eight hours in the unlawful custody of an unlawful officer, so far as the election law is concerned, then, on a recount, some four days afterward, instead of 150 ballots in the box for Abbott and 400 for Frost, the vote stood 575 for Frost and 105 for Abbott. There is the witness, and there is the testimony that this self-reliant and self-sacrificing member of the Legislature and warden volunteered to send their communications to the contestee since to contradict—now when the case is closed, when the testimony is closed, and when your committee have made their report and asked for your verdict, these ex parte communications are produced.

Mr. FROST. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. POPPLETON. Certainly.

Mr. FROST. With all respect to the committee, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that against the evidence of one young man which has just been given to the House I place the testimony of the warden and representative, both of them democrats.

Mr. POPPLETON. It is a stubborn fact in this case that no witness that is called contradicts the testimony of Andrews, not a witness.

I affirm here now, not a single witness who is called contradicts the testimony of Mr. Andrews as to this conversation having been had in that ward-room. He stands unimpeached and uncontradicted so far as that is concerned. Another remarkable fact—a fact that was made an issue by the brief of the contestant in this case, a fact that was presented in the form of argument by the brief in this case—is that about six months before the case was concluded, before the case was argued, before it was considered, Judge Abbott asked the pertinent question, the overwhelming question, under the aspect of things as they at present stand, "Why did not you call the warden? Why did not you call the night-watchman? Why did not you call the three inspectors, the men who were possessed of knowledge as to the integrity of those ballots?" Why are they left out? That proposition was presented to the gentleman and to his counsel more than six months before the case closed, before the case was submitted—presented by the brief of the contestant himself. And this is remarkably strange, after that period has elapsed, after the challenge was made, and after the invitation was extended, if you have any testimony the committee were anxious you should produce it. I hurl back any charge upon the democratic membership of that committee of any intent or purpose of unfairness in the adjudication of this case. Look at the result of the work of your committee. Examine it fairly and see whether the deliberate judgment of that committee has not been exercised upon the case free from bias or partisanship. When the challenge is made that this proof be produced, why is not the proof produced? Why was it not produced six months ago and your committee allowed to pass upon it and the contestant allowed to take counter-proof to show the absurdity or falsity of the statement?

Mr. Speaker, the time for appeal upon a proper case and the adjudication of a proper case is when that case is on trial; when it is being submitted to the arbitration of the properly constituted legal authority, and not under such circumstances and at such times as this. So much for that.

The statute of Massachusetts regulating this matter of the counting of the ballots and the return of the vote is a recent statute, a statute enacted by the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts the same year that this election occurred; a statute, as is proclaimed and as is not denied, which was enacted for the sole purpose of preventing frauds that had grown up in this district and in the adjoining district of Massachusetts. It was proclaimed that the enactment of the statute was for that sole purpose; that the object and aim were to stop the tide of fraud and corruption flowing out of those two districts. No matter whether coming from democratic precincts or republican precincts, no matter whether coming from democratic wards or republican wards, the object was one and alike; and that was to stay the tide of fraud and corruption that emanated from those districts. And what are the terms of this statute? It provides that when the ballots are polled and have been counted and when the returns are sealed up they shall be—what? They shall be "forthwith" transmitted to the custody of the properly designated legal officer. That is the law. They shall be transmitted "forthwith."

Now what was done in this case? Why, sir, instead of that being done, the returns are taken and put in the custody of the night-watchman, a man unknown to the law, a man unrecognized. And, what is more, they venture to do that thing in the face and eyes of the statute. And what more? They fail to call that night-watchman, though he is in the city of Boston, under the very droppings of the sanctuary of these parties. They failed to call him as a witness to show that while these ballots were in his possession no fraud was perpetrated. Now who is to blame for this? Is the contestee or the contestant? The law had been violated, openly violated. The law had been trampled down, openly trampled down. Now who shall assuage the vengeance that is due for this violation of law? No one except the contestee himself. And the night-watchman, within whose knowledge the whole facts are contained, could have been subpœnaed and placed upon the witness-stand. But, no; he is as dumb as the ox before the slaughter. And yet gentlemen ask us, a committee that has deliberately gone to work to discharge its duty, to go back of the records, to go behind all this, and to say, "We will excuse you from this criminal act of neglect;" for if that be true which is written upon the document presented by the contestee himself, it would amount to criminal neglect on the part of the contestee or those who are managing his case for him. They ask us to go back and to receive these things in the form in which they appear here, in the form of mere ex parte communications.

The statute, as I said before, was enacted that very year for the purpose of preventing these very frauds that had been growing in intensity until they had assumed mammoth proportions. And then what is done? Why, sir, deliberately, in the face and eyes of this statute, these ballots are withheld from the custody of the city clerk and are not carried to him at all until opportunity after opportunity under the shades and darkness of night has been afforded for the perpetration of the most outrageous frauds.

Now, it is not necessary in a case of this kind that there should be affirmative proof that actual fraud was committed, although I regard the testimony of Mr. Andrews as prima facie, if not conclusive, evidence of the fact that frauds were committed, and that these ballots were tampered with. That is not necessary, I say; but it is only necessary in the eyes of the law that it shall appear that opportunities were afforded for the commission of fraud; and whenever that appears the onus of proof shifts at once onto the contestee, and he must prove the fact that while those ballots were thus in such illegal and unlawful custody, no tampering took place with them, no offense was committed in the way of interference with them, and that the ballots were intact.

While upon this subject I may remark that the question is involved here whether or not this statute is mandatory. I contend that a law appertaining to elections, for the maintenance of the purity of elections, as contradistinguished from the mere matter of regulating forms that are to be observed in the conduct of the election—a law enacted to prevent frauds, when the violation of or neglect to comply with its provisions would open the door to the perpetration of frauds—is mandatory in its character. When the violation of a statute enacted to prevent frauds, or the simple omission to execute its provisions, throws the door open for the perpetration of fraud, that statute is mandatory in its character, and is not directory at all. If this were not the rule, Mr. Speaker, it would be utterly impossible to determine the purpose of a mandatory statute. The object of the statute is, first, to prevent the perpetration of frauds. Now if, by violating the plain terms of that statute, you open the door to fraud, you ignore the statute, and ignore the legislation upon that subject, and the legislation goes for nothing.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have undoubted authority from the other side of the House; we have the best authority, perhaps I may say, with due deference to the gentlemen who constitute the minority of the Committee of Elections; we have the authority of Mr. MCCRARY, the author of the work on the American law of elections. We have also the authority of Judge Hoar, a clear-minded, clear-headed, jurist upon the same subject, and I beg the House to bear with me while on this point I read the authority furnished us by these gentlemen in a contested-election case to be found in second Bartlett, page 467, decided in the Forty-second Congress of the United States. In the debate in the House of Representatives Mr. MCCRARY says:

> If the law provides an officer whose duty it is to hold possession of the ballot-boxes and ballots themselves after the polls are closed, I think no recount should ever be allowed, unless it appears that the ballot-boxes and ballots had remained in the custody of that officer during the interval between the election and the recount.

In this case a recount was provided for by the laws of Massachusetts:

> That ought always to be one of the prerequisites, and without it there can be neither certainty nor safety.

He further says in the same case:

> I think another rule must be observed. It must appear that the ballots have been securely kept, that they have not been exposed, and that there has been no opportunity to tamper with them. This ought to appear affirmatively.

Now, that is the opinion of Judge MCCRARY, a pretty good authority in this House, and who ought to be first-class authority for the other side of the House. Further on in the same case Judge Hoar, of Massachusetts, says:

> It makes no difference for the purpose of my point whether it (the ballot-box) was there (in an exposed place) for twelve hours or twelve days. Now, I do not claim that there is any evidence here that when the bar-room was left alone in the day-time or in the night-time any person entered it, opened that box, and substituted other numbered ballots for the ballots which it contained. All I have to say is that adroitness less than that practiced for a less important purpose in many and ordinary cases of crime, robbery, burglary, and forgery, could easily accomplish that result. Now, we know how eager, how unscrupulous, how adroit, in many instances, are the means which are used to affect political contests. It is not the question whether the friends of the very respectable and very able gentleman who claims this seat did, or were capable of doing, such a thing. The question is whether you are willing to turn out a sitting member from this House, whenever hereafter in any district of the country any member may be able to do such a thing, and may have been able to do it without detection? The interests of the sitting member and of the contestant disappear before a question like this, which involves the interests of the American people in the establishment and maintenance of a strict, wise, and safe rule of public policy.
> It is not merely a question whether the recount was correct; it is a question whether you know and are sure that the thing counted upon the recount was the same thing that was counted, or which should have been counted at the time the original count was made.

The question is not whether the recount was correct, but are you sure; is there, in the language of Judge MCCRARY, affirmative proof that these ballots have not been disturbed in any shape or form? I say that in this case there is not a scintilla of proof on that question put in evidence on the part of the contestee, and we are left to the stubborn facts on the stubborn platform erected by the rules and decisions of law to find a verdict in this case. Aside from that we have the testimony of Anderson, which is uncontradicted, which affirmatively shows that these ballots must have been tampered with.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if this view shall be taken of this case, it puts an end to the contest; it leaves a majority for Mr. Abbott of 412 votes. I beg the House to remember this, that it is admitted that in the town of Winthrop there were 2 illegal votes cast for Frost. It is admitted and conceded, too, that there was a vast amount of fraud and corruption in the fifth ward of the city of Boston.

In order to avoid trouble and to save the labor of writing out the testimony of one hundred or more witnesses, which would depict to your view a scheme of fraud and crime unheard of and unrecorded in the record of either party of the past, we have agreed unanimously that 105 fraudulent, illegal, desperate, criminal votes were polled for Mr. Frost in the fifth ward of the city of Boston. That is the deliberate conclusion of the entire committee. Then, too, in the second ward of Boston the same set of men, the same vampires from the custom-house of Boston are found manipulating the tally-sheets and ballot-boxes of that ward; and it is agreed unanimously by the committee that 30 unlawful, fraudulent, corrupt, villainous votes were cast for Frost in that ward. The agreements of the committee go right down until we come to the navy-yard, which is the cess-pool from which all this iniquity has flowed out in connection with that district. The employés at the navy yard with those from the custom-house go hand in hand, devils like, and march down over the rights of the people of that district. Custom-house and navy-yard, twin sisters on their mission of fraud and crime, join hands that the work may be the more complete.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman allow me a question at this point?

Mr. POPPLETON. Certainly.

Mr. SPARKS. I understood the contestee to say that he presented these two letters, one from the inspector and the other from the representative of the district in the State Legislature, to the contestant. Now, I want to know if those letters were presented to the subcommittee and accepted by that subcommittee as proof and testimony?

Mr. POPPLETON. Not at all, sir.

Mr. SPARKS. A further question. Were they rejected by the subcommittee, and was the contestee warned that they would not be received?

Mr. POPPLETON. Not at all; nothing of the kind.

Mr. SPARKS. To whom were they submitted?

Mr. POPPLETON. To the chairman of the subcommittee. These letters were presented possibly ten or fifteen days after the report of this committee had been made and submitted to the House and ordered to be printed, and ready to be called up at any time.

Mr. SPARKS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that they were submitted after the report was made to the House?

Mr. POPPLETON. Yes, a long time after; after the committee had fully discharged every obligation it felt itself under, had made its deliberate report; and then ten or fifteen days after that—I will not undertake to state the exact length of time—these papers were presented for our consideration. We had no authority to act upon them. The warden and the representatives in the State Legislature were living at the time the testimony in the case was taken, and, as I have said, more than six months before that time Mr. Abbott, the contestant, had asked the contestee, "Why do you not call the warden? Why do you not put the inspector on the stand and the night watchman on the stand?" It is a little too late to come in with this last dodge.

But my attention was called away from the navy-yard. Now, I am not going to take up the time of the House in discussing this navy-yard business. It is the source from which all their blessings have flowed in this district. It has been the cess-pool whose bitter waters the honest people of the fourth congressional district of Massachusetts have been compelled to drink from year to year from the time that Mr. Burlingame represented the district down to the present time. During that whole period the history of the district has been fraught with charge upon charge of corruption and iniquity on the part of the manipulators of the navy-yard located in that vicinity. The gentleman from Indiana tells the House that the democratic party made use of the navy-yards and that democratic administrations used to use the navy-yards for political purposes, and I suppose he would have his argument go so far as to hold that the republicans had a right to use the navy-yards also. So far as a charge against the democracy is concerned, one thing is certain: that the democracy of the present day, marching on the line of reform, are going to reform the republican party, and if the democratic party needs reform in any respect, they will get their full measure of it.

Now in order to show you the line of policy adopted, I will read you a little piece of literature which you will understand quite well:

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS, October 23, 1874.

MY DEAR COM.: I wish you would approve requisitions for men to be employed as they may be made until the 1st of November.

You will remember that the election occurred on the 3d day of November.

Some fifty additional men have been allowed from the Chelsea district, and I suppose some more will be required from Gooch's district.

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] is interested in this.

Now mark the authoritative declaration of an officer high in the administration.

The administration desire the success of Gooch and Frost.

Yours respectfully,

I. HANSCOM.

Chief of Bureau of Construction of United States.

There was the groundwork of your navy-yard officers and your navy-yard vote. Is not that pleasant literature for some of these gentlemen to read? Why, sir, there were five hundred and fifty-eight men employed in that yard, some of them from the 26th of September and some of them from the 1st of October, and the sun had hardly set upon the night of the election when discharges commenced and extended to the number of three or four hundred men during the month of November; and yet, in view of these facts, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] gets up and tells you what a terrible offense the democratic members of the Committee of Elections have committed in undertaking to unseat his dear friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. FROST.] I say that if you of the republican party obtain 500 votes in this way, so long as I am a member of the Committee of Elections I shall send these votes back and say to the honest people of the district, "Your votes shall be counted and none of these fraudulent votes shall."

Another little point, another little episode. Here is a gentleman employed in the Boston custom-house, and I want you to look at him and see how he appears. He is one of the recommenders. I am sorry to say that the contestee is one of the recommenders also for the employment of men in the navy-yard. I regret to say it, but it is a fact that stands out in this case in bold relief; and I would steer very far from the record if I did not announce the fact that the contestee is also one of the parties recommending men for employment in the navy-yard just preceding the election. This man's name is Charles H. Leach. Here is his first letter:

CUSTOM-HOUSE, BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS, SURVEYOR'S OFFICE,
September 19, 1874.

MR. HAINS:

DEAR SIR: The bearer, Mr. Donovan, of ward 2, desires employment in your department. If you can favor him in this direction you will oblige the undersigned.

Yours, respectfully,

CHARLES H. LEACH.

Now here is another letter written on the 31st of October, four days before the election. I ask gentlemen to listen to it:

BOSTON, October 31, 1874.

FRIEND SAMSON: Can you give employment to this man? He is capable of doing good service. I hope I shall not be obliged to ask another favor before election—a few days, that's all.

Yours, respectfully,

CHARLES H. LEACH.

We will use him at the polls Tuesday.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POPPLETON] has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask consent that the gentleman's time be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. POPPLETON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is very kind in requesting that my time be extended, and I very highly appreciate the compliment just paid me by the House in complying with the request. But I will not detain the House longer on this subject, and will ask that a vote be now taken on the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first question is upon the resolutions reported by the minority of the Committee of Elections as a substitute for the resolutions reported by the majority of the committee.

The resolutions of the minority of the committee were as follows:

Resolved, That Rufus S. Frost was elected, and is entitled, to a seat in this House, &c.

Resolved, That Josiah G. Abbott was not elected, and is not entitled, to a seat in this House, &c.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, and Mr. HURLBUT called for the yeas and nays upon substituting the resolutions of the minority for the resolutions of the majority of the Committee of Elections.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 79, nays 102, not voting 106; as follows:

So the resolutions of the minority of the committee were not adopted.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. THOMPSON. I am paired on this question with my colleague, Mr. HOAR. If present he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I am paired on this question with Mr. WOODBURN, of Nevada. If present he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. WALKER, of Virginia. My colleague, Mr. HUNTON, is absent on account of sickness; and my colleague, Mr. GOODE, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. My colleague, Mr. CLARKE, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. COCHRANE. My colleague, Mr. STENGER, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. SCALES. I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. SEELYE; if present he would vote "aye," and I would vote "no."

Mr. CASON. I am paired with Mr. FULLER, of Indiana; if here he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. HENDEE. Both of my colleagues, Mr. JOYCE and Mr. DENISON, are absent on account of sickness; if here they would both vote "ay."

Mr. HUBBELL. I am paired with Mr. DURHAM, of Kentucky; if present he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. PIPER. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. PAGE; if present he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. McDILL. My colleague, Mr. OLIVER, is necessarily absent from the House.

Mr. G. A. BAGLEY. My colleague, Mr. ODELL, is detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. SINNICKSON. On this question I am paired with Mr. MONEY, of Mississippi. If here he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. BRADLEY. My colleague, Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS, is absent by leave of the House. My colleague, Mr. WALDRON, is paired on this question with Mr. NEAL, of Ohio. If present, Mr. WALDRON would vote "ay," and Mr. NEAL would vote "no."

Mr. MORGAN. I am paired with Mr. PLATT, of New York. If present he would vote "ay" and I would vote "no."

Mr. FORT. I am paired with Mr. CLARKE, of Kentucky.

Mr. WADDELL. My colleague, Mr. YEATES, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. LYNDE. I am paired with Mr. BLAIR, of New Hampshire. If present he would vote "ay" and I would vote "no."

Mr. POPPLETON moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the following resolutions, reported by the majority of the Committee of Elections:

Resolved, That Rufus S. Frost was not elected, and is not entitled, to a seat in the House of Representatives in the Forty-fourth Congress from the fourth congressional district of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That Josiah G. Abbott was elected, and is entitled, to a seat in the House of Representatives in the Forty-fourth Congress from the fourth congressional district of Massachusetts.

The resolutions were adopted.

Mr. POPPLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SINKING FUND.

Mr. STONE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3893) to amend section 2 of an act to further protect the sinking fund and to provide for the exigencies of the Government, approved March 3, 1875; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 146) to amend the act approved June 18, 1874, relating to the admission of articles intended for the industrial exhibition of 1876.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, of New York, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (S. No. 123) for the relief of Philip S. Wales, medical inspector in the United States Navy;

An act (S. No. 894) to provide for the sale of the Fort Kearney military reservation, in the State of Nebraska;

An act (S. No. 928) for the relief of Albert W. Preston;

An act (H. R. No. 339) for the relief of E. D. Franz;

An act (H. R. No. 341) for the relief of Louis Rosenbaum;

An act (H. R. No. 1808) for the relief of Daniel Wormer, of Albany, New York;

An act (H. R. No. 2684) to amend sections 3946, 3951, and 3954 of the Revised Statutes; and

An act (H. R. No. 3411) authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the morning hour be dispensed with and that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar. Pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that, should this motion be agreed to, this may be considered as "objection day." The House will remember that on last Friday, which was "objection day," the business of the Committee of the Whole was interrupted.

Mr. PIPER and Mr. SCHLEICHER objected.

Mr. CONGER. I raise the question whether the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT,] which involves dispensing with the morning hour and thereby a suspension of the rules of the House, does not require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The effect of this proposition is simply to postpone the morning hour, which may be done by a majority vote. This amounts to nothing more than a question of consideration as to what business the House will take up.

Mr. CONGER. But the effect is to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House may at any time by a majority vote postpone the business of the morning hour. The Chair overrules the point.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BRIGHT that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar, there were—ayes 78, noes 52; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BRIGHT and Mr. SCHLEICHER were appointed.

The House divided; and tellers reported—ayes 95, noes 55.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGHT. I now renew the request for unanimous consent, that this be considered "objection day," for the reason already stated, that on the last "objection day" the business of the Committee of the Whole was interrupted.

Mr. PIPER. I object.

LAND CLAIMS IN NEW MEXICO.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of business upon the Private Calendar, the pending bill being the bill (H. R. No. 344) to confirm certain land claims in the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. COCHRANE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. On the last "objection day" certain bills were objected to; and on the second reading of those bills, as I understand, five objections are required to postpone them again. I desire to know whether that rule applies to-day?

The CHAIRMAN. This is not objection day; and the House has refused to have it so considered. The first bill in order is a bill which was pending in the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar on the last day when bills were taken up for consideration and discussion. It is the bill (H. R. No. 344) to confirm certain land claims in the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read.

The CHAIRMAN. When the bill was last under consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, the pending question was on the amendment moved by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to strike out in the second section, line 4, the words "United States" and to insert in lieu thereof "the parties respectively asserting claims to said lands."

Mr. DUNNELL. I notice that the Delegate from the Territory of New Mexico [Mr. ELKINS] is absent as well as the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JOYCE] who reported this bill from the Committee on Private Land Claims. I therefore suggest by unanimous consent that it be passed over for the present.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JOYCE] is absent on account of ill health.

Mr. DUNNELL. He is absent on account of ill health, and as I understand desired to speak on this subject and I believe was entitled to the floor.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Then, if there be no objection, I hope the bill will be postponed until next private-bill day.

Mr. FORT. While the Delegate from New Mexico is absent, there is no doubt he would like to have the bill passed; and if there is no objection I do not see why the amendment should not be adopted and the bill passed, for the amendment certainly is a correct one.

Mr. BUCKNER. I have no objection, if that is the wish of the House that it should be passed over for the present on account of the absence of the gentleman from Vermont who has charge of the bill, as well as of the Delegate from New Mexico at whose suggestion the bill was reported.

Mr. DUNNELL. If the House is disposed to act favorably on the bill I do not object.

Mr. FORT. If there is no objection to the bill I submit, after having been reported unanimously from the Committee on Private Land Claims, we ought to pass it.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose there will be no objection to the suggestion of the gentleman from Minnesota, that the bill be passed over for the present. It was my intention to move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, but in the absence of the gentleman from Vermont and the Delegate from New Mexico I am willing to agree that the bill shall be passed over for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill is passed over.

MISSOURI LAND CLAIMS.

The CHAIRMAN. The next business on the Private Calendar is a bill (H. R. No. 820) for the relief of the mission of Saint James, in Washington Territory.

Mr. BUCKNER. The clerk is mistaken as to the order in which these bills come in. The next business on the Private Calendar is the bill (H. R. No. 819) to confirm certain land claims in the State of Missouri. It was passed over by unanimous consent with the understanding that it should not lose its place on the Calendar. It has never been acted on, and I insist that, not losing its place under the understanding, it is the bill which must next come up, the unfinished business having been disposed of.

Mr. DUNNELL. That bill was originally objected to by me, and I do not see how we can go back and take it up.

Mr. BUCKNER. I will tell the gentleman from Minnesota that while he opposed the bill and offered an amendment to it, I was not at the time in a condition of health to go on with its consideration, and it was on my account, by unanimous consent, that the bill was passed over with the understanding that it should not lose its place on the Calendar.

Mr. DUNNELL. It was passed over, and necessarily the call must go on from the place where it left off.

Mr. BUCKNER. But it was passed over with the understanding that it was not to lose its place on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill just passed over in reference to land claims in the Territory of New Mexico came up this morning as the unfinished business on the Private Calendar. That being disposed of, the call of the Calendar goes back to the beginning, and the bill in reference to land claims in Missouri, having been passed over with the understanding that it should not lose its place, comes up this morning, as suggested by the gentleman from Missouri, as the first business in order.

The bill was read.

The first section of the bill provides that the decisions made in favor of land claimants by the recorder of land titles at Saint Louis, Missouri, acting as commissioner, under the act of Congress approved June 22, 1860, entitled "An act for the final adjustment of private land claims in the States of Florida, Louisiana, and Missouri, and for other purposes," extended by an act of Congress approved June 10, 1872, as entered in the transcript of decisions transmitted by said recorder to the Commissioner of the General Land-Office, and by him laid before the Forty-third Congress, be, and the same are hereby, confirmed; saving and reserving, however, to all adverse claimants the right to assert the validity of their claims in a court or courts of justice, to wit: Eight thousand arpents to the legal representatives of J. Clamorgan; twenty-nine hundred and forty-four arpents to the legal representatives of Peter Provenchere; seven thousand and fifty-six arpents to the legal representatives of Francis J. B. Valle; seven thousand and fifty-six arpents to the legal representatives of Francis Valle, sr.

The second section of the bill provides that, if it shall be found that any tract or tracts confirmed as aforesaid, or any part thereof, had been previously located by any other person or persons under any law of the United States, or had been surveyed and sold by the United States, this act shall confer no title to such lands in opposition to the rights acquired by such location or purchase; but the individual or individuals whose claim or claims are hereby confirmed shall be permitted to locate so much thereof as interferes with such location or purchase on any unappropriated land of the United States that may be subject to entry at private sale; provided that such location shall conform to the legal divisions and subdivisions, and shall not interfere with the rights of other persons.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask the Clerk to read the report of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

The claims mentioned in this bill come before Congress for its action by virtue of the fourth and fifth sections of the act for the final adjustment of private land claims in the States of Florida, Louisiana, and Missouri, approved June 22, 1860. (12 Statutes, pages 84, 85, and 86,) the provisions of which were extended by act of Congress approved June 10, 1872, and on account of the action of the Commissioner of the Land Office as required by said first-mentioned act, and reported to Congress at the first session of the Forty-third Congress. By the provisions of the first-named act the recorder of land titles in the State of Missouri was made a commissioner to hear and decide, according to equity and justice and the principles in such acts set forth, all the claims provided for by this act. Having done this, the act required this officer to certify his decision to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who either approves or disapproves the action of the recorder, and in either event the law requires him to bring the matter to the attention of Congress.

The claims thus provided for are described in the first section of the act as being for lands claimed by virtue of "grant, concession, order of survey, permission to settle, or other written evidence of title," emanating from any foreign government, bearing date prior to the cession of the territory out of which said States were formed, &c. The recorder of land titles at Saint Louis, after hearing the evidence in each of these cases, decided in favor of their confirmation, respectively; that is to say, to the legal representatives of Jacques Clamorgan, 8,000 arpents; of Peter Provenchère, 2,944 arpents; of François Vallé, jr., 7,056 arpents, and of J. Baptiste Vallé and François Vallé, sr., 7,056 arpents.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office approved of the decision of the recorder as to the two claims first above mentioned, and under the law his judgment is final and conclusive against the Government, as to them. As to the two claims, each a league square, (7,056 arpents,) of François Vallé, jr., and J. Baptiste Vallé, and Francois Vallé, sr., that officer disapproved of the judgment and decision of the recorder, on the ground that the papers "filed in these cases do not show either a grant, concession, order of survey, permission to settle, or other written evidence of title." The recorder, on the contrary, had held, in his decision of these cases, that they each show that there is written evidence of title of these claims emanating from the Spanish government and bearing date during the time said government claimed jurisdiction over the territory in which this land is situated.

The question before the committee is as to the proper construction of the first section of the act aforesaid, as applied to the facts of the two claims of François Vallé, jr., and Francois Vallé, sr., and J. Baptiste Vallé. Was there any "written evidence of title" to the land claimed, emanating from the Spanish government? If we are to understand that by the language "written evidence of title" Congress designed that the claimants should have written evidence of a complete and perfect title from the Spanish government, these parties certainly had no claim against the Spanish government. Among all the claims in the State of Missouri which have been recognized and confirmed by the United States, there were not more than 1 per cent. that were complete and perfect titles. They were inchoate and imperfect titles, and were known as concessions, orders of survey, or permits to settle, made under the authority of the laws of Spain. Neither of these descriptions of title was evidence of complete title. Looking at the several acts of confirmation passed by Congress to carry out the stipulations of the treaty with France, it seems to your committee that Congress intended by this act to recognize the right of such claimants as held any written evidence from any officer or agent of the Spanish government showing present right to the possession of a tract of land, and which, according to the usages and practice of the Spanish government at New Orleans, would in time be perfected into a complete and perfect title.

In the two cases before the committee, the initiatory proceedings seem to have been somewhat different from the most of the claims confirmed in the State of Missouri, but they comply more exactly with the regulations adopted by the intendant-general at New Orleans in 1799. The thirty-second article of these regulations directs that "the granting or sale of any land shall not be proceeded in without formal information having been previously received that they were vacant; and, to avoid any more mistakes, besides the signature of the commandant or syndic of the district, the information ought to be joined by that of the surveyor and two of the neighbors," &c. This statement was directed to be addressed, with the petition, to the intendant-general, upon which he would cause the final title to issue. This was the mode of proceeding in these cases, the parties being at once put into possession of the lands by the commandant. In the other form of proceedings, on the petition of the applicant the concession was made by the lieutenant-governor, and a plat of the land in the first instance made and the party put in possession, the papers being afterward sent to the intendant-general for approval and the issuance of a final and complete title. In this class of cases the commandant, on receiving the written petition of the applicant, finds out by the surveyor and two citizens whether the land desired is vacant; if so, he orders the petitioner to be put in possession and a survey to be made, and then the petitioner waits for a final title from the intendant-general at New Orleans.

In the two cases before your committee, the petitioners apply to the commandant for a league square of land, and, according to the rules and regulations prescribed by the intendant-general at New Orleans, the surveyor of the province, in company with two citizens, examine the land asked for and certify to the commandant that it belongs to the public domain, who reports these facts to the intendant-general at New Orleans, puts the party in possession, and recommends the grant to be made. The intendant-general refers the applications to the proper department of the government at New Orleans, and, before any action is taken, the change of government takes place. So far as written evidence of title is concerned, it is not perceived why this objection of the Commissioner would not have excluded a large portion of the claims in Missouri, confirmed by the act of July 4, 1836. It is true these claims were founded on a concession, warrant, or order of survey. Neither of these made a perfect title, and the very object of the statute of 1860 was to enlarge the right of these claimants and extend their right to confirmation to cases which were not, strictly speaking, concessions, orders of survey, or permissions to settle, but where they had any written evidence of title, that is, as we construe those words, any cases where an authorized officer of the Spanish government gave consent in writing to an appropriation of a part of the public domain, and put the petitioner in possession thereof. In both of these cases, possession is proven to have been taken by the applicants and maintained by them for many years after the change of government.

The short time intervening between the filing of the petition in these cases and the cession of this territory and purchase by our Government, and the difficulty of communicating with the government at New Orleans, no doubt prevented favorable action thereon by the Spanish authorities, and Congress has by its legislation, since the report of the last board of commissioners was acted upon in 1836 and prior to the passage of the acts under which these claims are prosecuted, shown its recognition of claims with no higher evidence of title than these claimants have produced. In the act of 4th of July, 1836, confirming the report of this board, many claims were excepted from confirmation; but since the passage of this act most of the claims thus excluded from confirmation have been confirmed by a special act of Congress. The claims thus confirmed have no higher dignity, nor are they supported by any better evidence of title, than the two claims whose confirmation by the recorder has been disapproved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. (11 Statutes of the United States, page 294.)

It is the opinion of your committee, therefore, that these four claims should be confirmed, with the usual clause of saving of advance rights and allowing relocation upon any public lands of the United States; and they recommend the passage of the bill (H. R. 819) accompanying this report.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, notified the House that that body had adopted the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 332) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1867, and for other purposes," approved June 22, 1872.

MISSOURI LAND CLAIMS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. DUNNELL. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That no location shall be made on any land north of the State of Missouri.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Chairman, I objected to the passage of this bill when it was up before. My attention was called to some statements made in the report of the Committee on Private Land Claims, and to the large amount of land it is proposed to convey by this bill. It provides for the disposition of about twenty-four thousand acres of the public land, and the very best that can be said by the committee is that the title is uncertain; to use the words of the committee, which I will read from the report:

Neither of these made a perfect title, and the very object of the statute of 1860 was to enlarge the right of these claimants and extend their right to confirmation to cases which were not, strictly speaking, concessions, orders of survey, or permissions to settle, but where they had any written evidence of title, that is, as we construe these words, any cases where an authorized officer of the Spanish government gave consent in writing to an appropriation of a part of the public domain, and put the petitioner in possession thereof.

These imperfect and inchoate titles have been for a very long time unsettled and unadjusted. For seventy or eighty years these claims obtained no recognition by the Government, and now upon the report of this committee, unsatisfactory in its reasonings and its conclusions, it is proposed to grant scrip to the amount of 24,000 acres of land. It will be remembered all these original claimants have passed away.

Really these men who get hold of this scrip are not any of them the original owners or the original claimants. It is now proposed to give them scrip, and they are to be allowed to go anywhere, anywhere in the country, and locate this scrip on any unappropriated land. They may be public lands open to homestead entry; they may be timber lands of the country. It is proposed, I say, to give scrip to the amount of 24,000 acres of land.

Now, I have offered an amendment here. I have said to gentlemen that if the lands could be found in the State of Missouri, where these claims exist, then if the State of Missouri presented no objection, very well. But if the rights of these claimants originally pertained to the State of Missouri, then I insist that they should find their lands in that State, rather than go into the State which I in part represent, and other States where there are large quantities of the public lands. And it must be remembered that the amount of public lands now open for entry under the homestead law is very small; but there are still very valuable timber lands in the country. It is proposed to give away 24,000 acres of these lands upon what I consider a very unsatisfactory title.

In the discussion that was had here upon the bill which was passed over to-day in regard to certain private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico, the great objection to that bill was the vague, uncertain character of those Spanish titles. And it will be remembered that the General Land Office has itself passed against two of these claims. Deliberately has the General Land Office investigated two of these claims and decided against them. Now the Committee on Private Land Claims comes in and says, "As we construe this concession these claims should be confirmed, and we propose to grant scrip to the amount of 24,000 acres." I believe it would be very much better to abide by the results of the decision of the General Land Office. I am unable to discover from this report any other than special pleading to get through this especial bill. I see no good argument furnished why we should give scrip to the amount of 24,000 acres.

I am opposed, Mr. Chairman, to the issuance of scrip. We have issued a great deal of it. It has been a source of corruption and a source of fraud, and we have already parted with large areas of our public lands by the issuance of scrip; and I think the time has now come when there should be a good, solid, substantial argument whenever we are called upon to dispose of more of the public lands. I confess that I am unwilling that 24,000 acres of land in my own State should be plastered over by scrip held by a title almost a hundred years old, resting primarily upon a Spanish grant. I am unwilling that 24,000 acres should be thus covered over by the holders of this scrip, non-residents, to be held in that way for many years. I desire that the public lands should be open to an easy, ready settlement by homestead entry; and therefore I am seriously opposed to this method of meeting the rights, if they have any, of these claimants.

Mr. BUCKNER. The objection which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] makes, as I take it, to this bill is not so much that the bill is wrong in itself. He offers no argument against the views set forth here by the Committee on Private Land Claims as to the construction of the statute referred to. But he objects to the bill because there is some danger of the loss of his pine lands; because, in other words, there is danger that the Government of the United States shall be required to do what they agreed to do in the treaty by which Missouri, of which I believe Minnesota was then a part, was acquired; that is, inasmuch as they have taken land which formerly really belonged to these parties, they shall give them land elsewhere.

Now, sir, the objection that this is a large amount of land may operate with some gentlemen. They may be inclined to say, "If it were a small amount of land, we should be willing to grant it; but, because it is large, because of its size, we will not do justice and comply with the treaty obligations of this Government." I confess, sir, that sort of logic does not operate with me at all. If the claims are just; if it is due to these parties that they should have this land, and the Government have sold what originally belonged to them, and by the terms of the treaty and under the laws of Congress belonged to them, then it matters not whether the quantity is large or small. The Government of the United States should do its duty in the premises.

I suppose, sir, we might have got rid of the objection of the gentleman from Minnesota if we had agreed to give these parties the right to locate their land in the State of Missouri, and had excluded the pine lands of Minnesota. I take it that is the ground of the objection of the gentleman. If we could have done that in justice to these parties, or in justice to anybody, I presume we should have had no objection to this bill. But on what principle can that be claimed? There are claims for lands coming up against the Government in Indiana and in the Southern States where there are no public lands; in Arkansas, Alabama, &c., where the public lands are all exhausted. Will the gentleman's argument apply to such claims? It would be equivalent to saying that no such claims could be entertained at all.

No, sir; this is not a claim against the State of Missouri. These lands belonged to these parties when the territory now occupied by Missouri was a Territory and Minnesota was a part of that Territory. And therefore Minnesota has no right, and no other part of the country west of the Mississippi River has the right, to be exempt from the operations of this act. It is impossible that the Government should indemnify claimants by certified locations in Illinois or Indiana at this day, or even in Missouri to a very great extent, because our public lands amount now to very little in value; and that is true in reference to many other States of the Union. Hence, there can be no propriety in the suggestion of the gentleman that it should be confined merely to the State of Missouri. If there is any objection to the bill at all it grows out of the construction which the Committee on Private Land Claims have given to the law, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] does not attempt to show that that construction is wrong or improper.

Mr. DUNNELL. Is not the construction of the committee in direct conflict with the previous construction given by the General Land Office?

Mr. BUCKNER. I will answer the gentleman on that subject. The Commissioner of the General Land Office referred this subject to a clerk in his Office who made one decision, and the recorder of land titles at Saint Louis decided in another way, to wit, that this was written evidence of title, and the difference of opinion between these two officers brings the case here and it is for the House to decide. The question is what is meant by "written evidence of title." The Committee on Private Land Claims on an examination of the matter had not a doubt but that these cases were included in the term "written evidence of title," and it is for the House to say which is the proper construction. I admit that so far as the Commissioner of the General Land Office is concerned he has said that there is no written evidence of title. I cannot say that he is wrong. The recorder of titles says that he is wrong, and here is a statute passed by Congress in 1860 which says that the party who has written evidence of title shall have a claim against the Government for the land originally granted to him. Now the report from the General Land Office contains all the evidence of title. It is true that there is no title from the Spanish government, from the intendent generale, but the title emanates from an officer of the Spanish government, which the Spanish government would have respected but for the fact that it went out of existence before the maturity of the title.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Has this question of title been investigated by the courts?

Mr. BUCKNER. No, sir; it could not be, in the nature of things. It is a matter for Congress. Two officers of the Government decided differently, and the law requires in such a case the question shall be brought here, and the Committee on Private Land Claims decided against the opinion of the clerk in the Land Office and in favor of the opinion of the recorder of titles. Now, if the gentleman can show that written evidence of title is anything else than is here presented, then it is a fair subject for discussion.

But there are two of these claims about which there is no dispute at all. They come in on a different principle altogether, and both the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the recorder of land titles decided that the Government must give them 11,000 arpents of land. As to the others I have no question about them. I have stated in answer to the gentleman that there is a diversity of opinion between the recorder of land titles and one of the clerks in the General Land Office, and hence the question is brought before Congress and we have to decide it. And the Committee on Private Land Claims have decided that the recorder of land titles was right, and the parties are entitled to the land; not to the lands originally granted, for the Government has sold those lands long ago and the money received for them has gone into the Treasury; and inasmuch as you cannot give the parties the lands which were originally granted them, the law of 1860 gives them the right to come in and have a relocation on any public lands in the United States. That is what this bill promises. There is no question of title here. It is only a question whether the Government shall carry out the treaty stipulation involved in its treaty with France in the acquisition of the territory of Louisiana, of which Minnesota was then a part. I shall not go into an argument as to whether the Committee on Private Land Claims are right in their construction or whether the clerk of the Commissioner of the General Land Office is correct in his construction. I submit this report as proving that written evidence of the title does not mean a perfect title. An officer of the government of Spain, or rather France, gave written evidence of title with possession of the land, and hence the cases come within the terms of the act; and if it is wrong to give the parties the benefit of this legislation, then the act of 1860 and the extension of that act in 1872 were wrong, and not the committee in reporting this bill.

Mr. FORT. This land claim is respectable for one thing, and that is its extreme age. Before I vote on the question I hope the gentleman from Missouri will explain to this House how it is that these claims for these lands have slipped to this date, and also how it is, when he says the Commissioner of the General Land Office has decided against these titles, the claimants do not take an appeal to the Secretary of the Interior and then to the courts in the regular way and test their title, if title they have to these lands. Now, Mr. Chairman, it does seem to me that, if a bill is to be passed at all by which these claimants may have their rights, if rights they have, it should provide that the question should be submitted to some judicial tribunal.

Mr. BUCKNER. The law does not so decide; that is the trouble.

Mr. FORT. If the law does not so decide why does the gentleman ask us to pass another law? By his presence here in reporting this bill he confesses that the existing law is not sufficient. If the law was now adequate he would have no need to come to the House and ask the House to take jurisdiction of this very intricate matter. It must occur to any mind on a moment's reflection that this is a question that ought to be determined judicially. It is impossible for gentlemen here to settle this question and say whether the title passed from Spain to these claimants at that time.

I think it is asking too much of a committee of this House or of the other House to sit judicially upon such a question as this and determine it. If the law of 1860 is not sufficient—by the way, so far as I know, that law has not been quoted here to-day—if that is not sufficient, then I think this House should require of these claimants that they come in here with a bill which will properly open the doors of the court and allow the court to say whether they are entitled to this land or not. It is very singular that a claim of this description, for 24,000 acres of land—whether the amount be more or less matters but little—should sleep for nearly a hundred years, and this House to-day be called upon to settle the title which, if it attached at all, attached before any gentleman in this House was born. Why do they not explain how it is that they have delayed so long to ask for justice?

Mr. BUCKNER. I will answer the gentleman right here if he has no objection.

Mr. FORT. Very well.

Mr. BUCKNER. If the gentleman were at all familiar with the legislation of Congress upon this subject he would not ask that question. When the treaty was made the Government of the United States did not know, and could not know, but what it would settle all these claims. The very first act of Congress of 1805 was confined to claims for not exceeding two thousand arpents. As the train of facts in the history of the country became developed, just so did Congress proceed to provide for these claims. In 1836, some thirty years after the acquisition of this territory, in the act of July 4, 1836, there were more claims allowed than at any prior time.

Mr. FORT. Why was not this claim made then?

Mr. BUCKNER. It did not come within the spirit of any law which the Government had authorized. Prior to that time evidence of survey and cession was required to confirm the title; but in 1860 the law was extended so as to cover all cases where there was any written evidence of title. Up to that time these parties had no claim against the United States as a political body.

Mr. FORT. Why did not these parties then come into Congress and present their claim? Why did they wait until to-day? The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] says they had no claim. Had they no claim then?

Mr. BUCKNER. When?

Mr. FORT. The gentleman says that there was no law in existence which authorized their claim. That is no reason why they should not have applied for legislation as they apply to-day.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I have before me the act of 1860, on which this proceeding is founded. I wish to call attention to the second section of that act as indicating the sanctity or verity that should be ascribed to the report upon which this bill is founded. The second section provides as follows:

> That the registers and receivers of the several land offices in the States of Florida and Louisiana, within their respective land districts, and the recorder of land titles for the city of Saint Louis, for the State of Missouri, and their successors in office, shall be, and they are hereby, appointed commissioners to hear and decide, under such instructions as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in conformity with this act and according to the justice and equity of the principles hereafter established, in a summary manner all matters respecting such claims within the district aforesaid as come within the provisions of this act.

"In a summary manner." This recorder of land titles in the city of Saint Louis and the State of Missouri was an officer having scarcely the dignity and importance of a register or receiver of the land office. I believe the salary has always been $500 a year. He stood upon the same footing with the register of the land office at Chillicothe for many years and up to the present time, and the register of the land office at Indianapolis, Indiana, and at Springfield, Missouri. That is to say, the office was a nominal one; and by an act passed at this session of Congress we have abolished all these offices as mere sinecures.

This officer in Saint Louis was authorized to hear and decide in a summary manner; none of the safeguards of judicial proceedings, none of the safeguards which surround important judicial proceedings were deemed to be necessary. He was to hear and decide in a summary manner these claims and report to the Commissioner of the General Land Office; the Commissioner of the General Land Office was to report to Congress, and Congress was then to take the subject into consideration and determine what legislation was proper.

But I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] to the fact that I do not find in this act of 1860, although I have not had time to examine it carefully, any provision that seems to contemplate that the Government of the United States shall re-imburse these parties by issuing land scrip for the land which they may not be able to obtain under the provisions of that act. These ancient claims were generally without limit, as shown by this act. They were frequently merely possessory, their limits poorly defined, generally by monuments instead of by metes and bounds. After this long lapse of time, independent of the perils of fraud in such transactions, of course those claims became exceedingly obscure.

Now this act of 1860 certainly did not contemplate that if these lands became exhausted in any way, were disposed of by the Government of the United States before the claim is set up, therefore the United States shall substitute other lands for those disposed of.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the summary judgment passed in this case was passed by that recorder of land titles in Missouri that we have been trying to abolish for the last eight or ten years?

Mr. HOLMAN. This is the same gentleman.

Mr. GARFIELD. I can state from my personal knowledge that while I was a member of the Committee on Appropriations I undertook two or three times to leave out any provision for this officer, as he seemed to be ornamental rather than useful. But I was always overborne by the statement that he had in his custody some important records. I never heard, however, until to-day that he was a judge or had any judicial functions.

Mr. HOLMAN. We never succeeded in getting this officer dispensed with until this session of Congress, but I am glad to assure my friend from Ohio that at this session we have finally abolished that office by the concurrence of both branches of Congress.

Mr. GARFIELD. I inserted in one of the appropriation bills (I think four yeas ago) a clause directing that all the records in possession of this officer should be forwarded to the General Land Office, to be a part of the public archives; but I found that the roots of this office ran down among so many Missouri interests that I could not very well carry the measure through; I was overborne. It always seemed to me that the business of that office should be consolidated with that of the General Land Office here in Washington.

Mr. HOLMAN. I tried to get the office abolished long before my friend from Ohio began his efforts; I tried as far back as 1861. No good reason was ever given why the office should not be abolished; but for some reason or other it was always kept up. At this session for the first time everybody seemed to acquiesce in the policy of abolishing the office. One argument which had been used in favor of keeping it up was that the salary was but trivial—$500. The records of this office are simply copies from the General Land Office, which happened to be there. We have directed them to be turned over to the State authorities of Missouri as has been done in other States.

Now this is the officer who was authorized to hear and determine these questions "in a summary manner," as a justice of the peace, under our State laws, is directed to hear "in a summary manner" cases of assault where the fine does not exceed one or two dollars. It now turns out that we are asked to give 11,000 arpents of land as the result of these judgments in two cases alone. An arpent, I believe, is a little less than one acre.

Mr. RIDDLE. Six-sevenths of an acre.

Mr. HOLMAN. So that the land in these two cases alone is something like nine or ten thousand acres. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to these claimants, whoever they may be, (whether foreigners or Americans,) getting whatever land they can find there that they have obtained a right to at any time during the last century. As to that, I think it may be well enough to confirm the titles upon the statement of the gentleman from Missouri. But as to giving them other lands, to that I object. I therefore desire to move that that portion of this bill be struck out. I suppose the gentleman from Missouri will have no objection to that.

Mr. BUCKNER. Does the gentleman propose to abrogate the provision of law on this subject? Here is the provision, which I can read to the gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. I stated that I had not been able to read the act through.

Mr. BUCKNER. I wish the gentleman had read it through. I wish he was more familiar with the legislation of Congress in reference to these old claims. If he had been, I do not think he would have made the speech that he has made.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will my friend read that section?

Mr. BUCKNER. The section is as follows:

And be it enacted, That whenever it shall appear that lands claimed, and the title to which may be confirmed under the provisions of this act, have been sold in whole or in part by the United States prior to such confirmation, or where the surveyor-general of the district shall ascertain that the same cannot be surveyed and located, the party in whose favor the title is confirmed shall have the right to enter upon any of the public lands of the United States a quantity of land equal in extent to that sold by the Government: Provided, That said entry be made only on lands subject to private entry at $1.25 per acre and as far as may be possible in legal divisions and subdivisions, according to the surveys made by the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend is right. I had not got as far as that section. I was struck with the second section. The "summary" proceeding struck me with so much admiration that I could not read beyond that point.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I would like to put a question to the gentleman from Missouri, if he will allow me.

Mr. BUCKNER. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I have not been able to find out from this report or from the debate thus far the nature of what is claimed to be "written evidence of title" in these cases.

Mr. BUCKNER. That is a proper question; and I will answer it. The evidence is that an officer of the Spanish Government was authorized under the direction of the intendant-general, who then lived at New Orleans, to go out and in the presence of two witnesses select and survey this land and put it in the possession of these parties. Of this, written evidence is given which is filed in the office of the recorder of land titles, who was the keeper of all the old Spanish and French archives in the State of Missouri. By the act of Congress he was authorized to render judgment upon these titles. In the State of Missouri, hundreds and thousands of our titles are dependent upon the judgment of that officer, the recorder, of whom the gentleman from Indiana has spoken.

The only question here is what is the meaning of the language "written evidence of title?" Congress certainly meant something by it. It had never been used in any law prior to 1860. As far back as 1825 and 1830 these parties filed their claims; and the commission of 1836 in their report on these very claims say that there is no pretense of fraud in connection with them, but that they had no jurisdiction; that these were neither warrants nor orders of survey, nor concessions by the lieutenant-governor, and that therefore they had no jurisdiction. Then Congress came in and passed this additional section for the benefit of these parties, where they had "written evidence of title." As I have said, that could not have meant perfect titles; but it meant just such titles as the Spanish government would recognize if it had not transferred the land to us. That is what I say it means; and that is all there is of it.

In 1836 these claims, extending from 1805 to 1836, are reported to have been filed before the commissioners, who decided that they had no jurisdiction. Congress, in the first instance, declared that the act should not cover grants of more than two thousand arpents. Afterward it was found that this excluded a large number of claims; for some of them embraced 30,000 arpents, many of them seven thousand and fifty-six arpents. Until 1836 these claims of seven thousand and fifty-six arpents were never confirmed at all. The Frémont claim, with which I happen to be familiar, embraced 10,000 arpents, which was in excess of the law, so that only seven thousand and fifty-six arpents were confirmed. But the claimants were equally entitled to the confirmation of the remainder; and, so far as this particular claim was concerned, no question was ever raised. All the officers decided in favor of that claim.

Now these parties have not been guilty of any laches. The Government never authorized these claims to be confirmed. Yet they have been knocking at the doors of the commission and at the doors of Congress, asking that the Government should discharge the obligation which it assumed in the treaty with France.

Mr. DUNNELL. I wish to ask whether the parties in these cases were ever before Congress heretofore?

Mr. BUCKNER. No, sir; none of these parties were ever before Congress. Congress in the first place authorized a board of three commissioners to examine titles. In 1834 Senator Linn, Mr. Harrison, a former member of Congress, and one other gentleman were authorized to pass upon these claims under the law. Then the recorder of land titles was authorized to hear and determine these claims. In all these cases these parties put in their claims; yet because it was held that there was no jurisdiction—in other words, because Congress had not authorized the confirmation—the claims were rejected. This appears from the report to which I have referred.

The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] without knowing anything about the matter, has said that this recorder of land titles has merely copies of the records here at Washington. Sir, this recorder is the custodian of all the old Spanish archives and muniments of title of one-third of the land in the State of Missouri. It is true his business is now disappearing; he has not much to do now; and therefore I and others have consented that the office should be dispensed with. But he has been a very important officer. The law gave this officer authority to determine upon these claims. It is not now a question whether that law was right; the question is whether Congress will carry out the obligation it thereby assumed.

A gentleman near me reminds me that this act was by its original terms to continue in force only three years; but it was extended in 1872. These parties have been asserting their claims to these lands all the time; and as the Government has sold some of these lands it is but just that other lands should be given in the place of them. In 1836 Congress granted millions of acres upon relocation, because under previous laws the lands to which the parties were entitled had been sold.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the second section the following:

And provided further, That no location shall be made on any lands north of the State of Missouri.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to move an amendment to strike out the last clause of the second section, which reads as follows:

But the individual or individuals whose claim or claims are hereby confirmed shall be permitted to locate so much thereof as interferes with such location or purchase on any unappropriated land of the United States that may be subject to entry at private sale: Provided, That such location shall conform to the legal divisions and subdivisions, and shall not interfere with the rights of other persons.

I find that the statement of the gentleman from Minnesota as to the number of arpents in these lands is correct. The number altogether is 24,956, which, estimating an arpent as six-sevenths of an acre, would be about twenty thousand acres. I find this bill does not provide exactly to whose benefit these lands shall inure. The only description of the persons who are to receive these lands is in the concluding part of the first section:

Eight thousand arpents to the legal representatives of J. Clamorgan; two thousand nine hundred and forty-four arpents to the legal representatives of Peter Provenchère; seven thousand and fifty-six arpents to the legal representatives of François J. B. Vallé; seven thousand and fifty-six arpents to the legal representatives of François Vallé, senior.

These were the original claimants, I suppose. Now it does not appear, although it might be inferred perhaps, that these were citizens of the United States. That fact, however, is not apparent. After the lapse of one hundred years, it seems to me we ought to be informed who are to be the recipients of the benefits of this act of Congress; to whose benefit this legislation is to inure.

Mr. BUCKNER. To the legal representatives, whoever they are.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, in the course of a hundred years the blood of our people circulates frequently through a multitude of veins, and may branch off into such innumerable channels as to become very thin. [Laughter.] It seems to me that after such a lapse of time legislation of this character should be adopted with great caution.

How does it happen that with the great city of Saint Louis, growing up and rendering lands in that part of the country valuable, this matter should have rested till the year 1860; that Congress should not until then have organized this tribunal? Even then it will be observed the authority of the tribunal was limited to five years.

A MEMBER. Three years.

Mr. HOLMAN. At the expiration of three years the power of this tribunal seems to have expired, and no claim has been asserted since.

Mr. BUCKNER. Yes, sir; the claim has been asserted from the beginning.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, that does not appear upon the face of these papers.

Mr. BUCKNER. There is no necessity that it should.

Mr. HOLMAN. The time specified by the act of Congress expired; and then in 1872 the authority of this court, this recorder of land titles, was extended. In 1873 or in 1874 this report is made to Congress for the first time. Yet the city of Saint Louis has been a great and prosperous city for half a century, a very important and influential community for more than three-quarters of a century. If this is a bona fide claim against the Government, coming down to us from the former government of that region of country, how has it happened that this claim has not been sooner asserted?

Mr. FORT. Did the report show officially any copy of this paper title? Is there any evidence of that?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have seen none.

Mr. LAWRENCE. May not some of these "legal representatives" who are provided for be speculators who have been buying up these claims for a song?

Mr. HOLMAN. That may be. I would be glad if the names were mentioned. I should like to know who are to be the recipients of these 20,000 acres of lands to be located anywhere upon our territorial domain.

Mr. BUCKNER. Particular parties may die out; and thus the names of the representatives may change.

Mr. HOLMAN. But, sir, that is not the principle upon which we act in our ordinary legislation. It is our practice to specify who are to receive the benefits of an act of Congress. According to the gentleman's argument we should not name any persons in our bills, for fear they may die out before the bill drags its slow length through both branches of Congress.

To my mind there is in this case a want of assurance that this is a claim which the Government of the United States should respect. There is great moral force in those statutes of repose which have been adopted by every State of this Union, and by every civilized community, under the name of statutes of repose, statutes of limitation, statutes against frauds—for these are statutes of repose. I would like to ask my friend from Missouri whether there is not moral force in the proposition that a principle which seems to have been universally adopted as between citizen and citizen throughout this broad land may safely be applied in behalf of the Government against an ancient claim like this. A citizen settling upon land, after the lapse of a certain time—generally only twenty years—less than an ordinary human life-time, acquires under the law, as a measure of public policy, the safeguards of a title. Now, after the lapse of over one hundred years, there certainly does appear no danger of injustice if Congress rejects a claim to lands in a highly cultivated and improved region of country—lands which for years have been growing every day more valuable, particularly where there has been no actual possession of these lands and no successful assertion of the claim to them during all this period. The universal recognition of the statute of repose seems to me to apply most forcibly as an argument in this case; and while I would not invoke that principle in behalf of the Government after a lapse of only twenty, twenty-five, or thirty years where a citizen of a foreign nation asserted a claim under a treaty, yet after a whole century has elapsed it seems to me there are too many chances of fraud and too many difficulties in ascertaining the truth to justify legislation of this kind. I have no objection, of course, to these parties obtaining possession of any lands to which they may be entitled——

Mr. BUCKNER. The Government has sold their lands.

Mr. HOLMAN. How has that happened? Why were they not there asserting their claims?

Mr. BUCKNER. Let me give the gentleman a little information; for I see he is striking in the dark.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am trying to get at the facts.

Mr. BUCKNER. I will take one of these claims—the claim of Francis Vallé, jr. This is one of the claims certified by this recorder of land titles. The Spanish grant in this case was surveyed by the deputy surveyor, as appears in the printed documents of Congress, and was recorded by the surveyor-general of the Territory of Louisiana on the 24th of February, 1806.

This claim was presented before the board of commissioners appointed in 1805; and according to the report made to Congress, which I hold in my hand, it appears that the board decided that the claim ought not to be confirmed.

Mr. STEVENSON. What is the date of the first record?

Mr. BUCKNER. The first record is February 24, 1806. All parties were required to present their claims before this commission appointed to Congress; and the opinion of the court was "that this claim ought not to be confirmed," and for a very good reason.

Mr. HOLMAN. In what year was that decision made?

Mr. BUCKNER. In 1810.

Mr. HOLMAN. The matter was pretty fresh then.

Mr. BUCKNER. The reason that the claim was not confirmed was because, as the commissioners afterward decided, they had no jurisdiction, "there being no concession warrant or order of survey."

Now in 1860, Congress provided "that any party who has either an order of survey, a warrant, or concession, or any written evidence of title from the French or Spanish government shall have his claim confirmed." Various claims had been rejected because of want of jurisdiction, because they were not embraced in the classes of cases which the different tribunals were authorized to act upon. Up to 1860 there was no authority for these claims to be allowed, although they had been urged upon Congress for fifty years. Now, under the act of 1860, the recorder of land titles decides in favor of these claimants. If there is any objection to that action, a previous Congress, not this Congress, is responsible. The United States Government for a time did not recognize to what extent its faith had been pledged to France. The whole policy of the Government has been, wherever its faith has been pledged by treaty in acquiring territory, to carry out its obligation to the letter. That is the reason Congress year after year has been extending these provisions of law in order that any party who at any time had any claim against the Spanish government might be re-imbursed.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BUCKNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. We acquired that territory, I believe, in 1803. This tribunal was organized in 1806, three years afterward.

Mr. BUCKNER. In 1805.

Mr. HOLMAN. And this claim was recorded in 1806?

Mr. BUCKNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. One year afterward.

Mr. BUCKNER. And let me say to the gentleman that at that time, according to my recollection, no claim could be confirmed if it embraced more than two thousand arpents; yet in our State we have confirmed many claims to the extent of 30,000 arpents.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, as the legislation establishing this tribunal was in 1805, two years after we acquired that territory, when the terms of the treaty were fresh in the minds of all men and when the obligation resting upon our Government was distinctly recognized, when our relations to France were of the most intimate character and the duty of carrying out in good faith the terms of the treaty was clearly conceded, we cannot assume that the tribunal organized at that time to determine upon these titles was not, especially as to the rules prescribed for their determination, just such a one as the terms of that treaty seemed to demand.

Mr. BUCKNER. And yet under the act of Congress of 1834, which extended the provisions of previous legislation, there were more claims confirmed than ever had been confirmed prior to that time.

Mr. HOLMAN. That may be true. But we want to do justice here not simply to these unknown claimants, but to the Government and to the people who desire to settle our public lands, not in large tracts as would be the case inevitably under this bill, but in small quantities, a quarter section each. We want to do exact justice; and I ask whether we cannot repose with absolute confidence upon the assumption that the legislation of Congress passed when the treaty was fresh in the minds of the parties was more just in declaring the character of claims to be recognized under that treaty and the rules to be observed by the tribunal of adjudication than any rules that may now be prescribed after this long lapse of years? If these claims were then rejected is it not safe to assume that they were properly rejected?

Mr. SAVAGE. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 819) to confirm certain land claims in the State of Missouri, and had come to no resolution thereon.

BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. LYNDE submitted the following report:

The committees of conference of the Senate and House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill of the Senate (No. 332) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1867, and for other purposes," approved June 22, 1874, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to the two Houses respectively, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and concur therein with an amendment, as follows:

Strike out all of the amendment of the House after the words "that" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Section 5108 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

SEC. 5108. At any time after the expiration of six months from the adjudication of bankruptcy, or, if no debts have been proved against the bankrupt, or if no assets have come to the hands of the assignee, at any time after the expiration of sixty days, and before the final disposition of the cause, the bankrupt may apply to the court for a discharge from his debts. This section shall apply in all cases heretofore or hereafter commenced."

And that the House concur in the same.

WM. P. LYNDE,
SCOTT LORD,
WM. P. FRYE,
Managers on the part of the House.

A. G. THURMAN,
GEO. G. WRIGHT,
GEO. F. EDMUNDS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The report was adopted.

Mr. LYNDE moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, of New York, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) for the issue of silver coin.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SAVAGE. I move that the House adjourn; but yield for a moment to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BEEBE.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman cannot yield unless he yields for all purposes.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. BEEBE. I wish to inquire whether it is not competent for the gentleman to yield for a motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the rule, as it seems to be strangely misunderstood. A gentleman who makes a motion to adjourn, and then yields the floor, yields it for all purposes.

Mr. CONGER. I move to adjourn unconditionally.

MINER HILL FARM, VIRGINIA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting copies of papers relating to the occupation by United States troops of Miner Hill farm, Virginia; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave for withdrawal of papers was granted in the following cases, there having been no adverse report:

To Mr. STEVENS, papers in the case of James Sinclair; and To Mr. HOSKINS, papers in the case of Lee & Durham.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. ELLIS for twelve days from the 17th instant:
To Mr. HOAR indefinitely; and
To Mr. CROUNSE indefinitely.

Mr. CONGER. I do not object in these cases; but hereafter, unless some good reason is given, I shall feel it my duty to object to granting members indefinite leave of absence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is probably a very proper suggestion.

The motion of Mr. CONGER that the House adjourn was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. HOPKINS: Proceedings of a mass meeting of soldiers of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, with resolutions favoring the passage of the bill equalizing bounties, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KIDDER: A paper relating to the incorporation of the Fort Abraham Lincoln and Little Missouri Railroad Company, to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. MAGOON: The petition of Hon. C. Hutchinson and 131 others, citizens of Grant County, Wisconsin, that there be no reduction of the present tariff on lead and zinc, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, memorial of the Wisconsin Legislature, for a centennial directory, to the Committee on the Centennial Celebration.

Also, memorial of the Wisconsin Legislature, against the bridging of the Detroit River, to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, memorial of the Wisconsin Legislature, for a tri-weekly mail from Waupaca via Dayton, Belmont, and Almond, to Plainfield, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Also, memorial of the Wisconsin Legislature, for mail service between Durand and Pepin, Wisconsin, to the same committee.

Also, memorial of the Wisconsin Legislature, for mail service between Kiel and Memee, to the same committee.

By Mr. NEW: Papers relating to the claim of Gallus Kerchner, for compensation for stone delivered to and by the United States on the arsenal grounds at Indianapolis, Indiana, to the Committee of Claims

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, July 15, 1876.

The Senate met at eleven o'clock a. m.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIS G. CRAIG, of Keokuk, Iowa.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No 3892) to remove the political disabilities of George Watson Carr, a citizen of the State of Virginia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 148) in reference to the wreck of the United States monitor Tecumseh was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

CONGRATULATIONS OF ARGENTINE CONGRESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication; which was read:

NEW YORK, July 11, 1876.

To Congress:

Argentine congress, inspired by sacred remembrances to-day raises in freemen's souls, heartily congratulate your Congress on the glorious centenary of that great country.

Given congress in session.

MARIANO ACOSTA CARLOS SARARIA,
Secretary.

BUENOS AYRES, July 4, 1876.

Mr. WEST. I suggest that the communication lie on the table for a moment, there being no representative of the Committee on Foreign Relations in the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] is present.

Mr. HAMLIN. We do not need to refer it. Let it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will lie on the table and be printed, if there be no objection.

GEORGE JACKSON.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to give notice that as soon as I can get the floor for the purpose I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 329) to remove the political disabilities of George Jackson, a citizen of West Virginia. It has passed the House and been reported favorably by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 840) for the relief of Norman H. Ryan, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WADLEIGH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 186) to provide for compensation to the owners of certain lands ceded by the United States to Great Britain in and by the treaty of Washington of July 9, 1842, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 571) extending the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims of the United States, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 866) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas H. Williams, of Maryland, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Reuben Davis, of Mississippi, praying the removal of his political disabilities, reported a bill (S. No. 990) to remove the political disabilities of Reuben Davis, of Mississippi; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the petition of Edwin Rogers, postmaster at North Adams, Massachusetts, praying the passage of a law relieving him from the liability for the amount of certain postage-stamps alleged to have been stolen from his office on May 1, 1876, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 991) for the relief of Edwin Rogers.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. By the expiration of the morning hour the other day my motion was not acted upon to agree to another conference with the House on the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes. My motion was that the Senate further insist on its amendments and ask for a further conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the committee on the part of the Senate.

JAMES W. LOVE.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3490) for the relief of James W. Love, postmaster at Patriot, Indiana, have instructed me to report it back and recommend its passage. It makes an appropriation of but $26. It is a very clear case, and I hope the Senate will pass the bill. If the report be read I am sure no Senator will object to the bill.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 3490) for the relief of James W. Love, postmaster at Patriot, Indiana, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to place to the credit of the post-office fund, on money-order account, the sum of $26; and the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to credit James W. Love, postmaster at Patriot, Indiana, in his account as such postmaster with $26, being for the loss of a like sum, money-order funds, remitted by him to the post-office at Cincinnati for deposit, and destroyed while en route by the burning of the mail-boat Pat Rogers, on the Ohio River, August 5, 1874.

Mr. HAMLIN. I can state in a word that this money was transmitted by the direction of the Department from the office to another, and was burned in transit.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to a third reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read the third time by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the bill read at length, a regular third reading.

The bill was read the third time at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

MEDAL TO LIEUTENANT MASON.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 17) authorizing Lieutenant Theodorus B. M. Mason, of the United States Navy, to accept a silver medal from the King of Italy, to report it without amendment, and I ask to have it passed. I will state the facts.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. Mason was a lieutenant in the Navy. He was on board of one of our ships at Callao, Peru. There was an Italian vessel there laden with petroleum which took fire. There were a great many other vessels in the harbor and they were all frightened at it. The lieutenant of this vessel with a part of the crew took a small boat and went to the ship with a Babcock extinguisher and put the fire out, and saved the ship.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THIRD-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 2581) to amend section 3887 of the Revised Statutes. I want to get it off the Calendar by an indefinite postponement. It will take but a moment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. This is a bill which authorizes the sending of packages with the name and address of the sender through the mails. That provision was incorporated in the post-office appropriation bill, and therefore this bill becomes unnecessary. I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES F. BUCKNER.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to take up House bill No. 3486, reported from the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3486) for the relief of James F. Buckner. It authorizes the proper accounting officers of the Treasury in the settlement of the accounts of James F. Buckner, collector of internal revenue for the fifth district of Kentucky, to credit and allow such amounts as are shown to have been stolen or embezzled by his late deputy collector and cashier, George N. Jackson, it being first proved to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that such embezzlement or larceny did not occur through any fault or negligence of Buckner; but Buckner is to assign and transfer to the United States, and for their benefit, any bond or other security, lien, by judgment or otherwise, against Jackson or others, and the right to prosecute all suit or suits thereon or for the enforcement thereof, and the exclusive benefit of all such shall inure to the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAWSON & BREWIS.

Mr. WITHERS. I move the present consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1807) for the relief of Anthony Lawson, surviving partner of the firm of Lawson & Brewis, of Alexandria, Virginia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is this bill reported to-day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, it is on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report in that case read.

Mr. WITHERS. There is a House report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have a law on that subject somewhere.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives February 4:

The Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Anthony Lawson and Thomas A. Brewis and their heirs, respectfully report:

They find that certain lots of land in the city of Alexandria, Virginia, were assessed for direct taxes under the law of Congress approved June 7, 1862, entitled "An act for the collection of direct taxes in the insurrectionary districts within the United States, and for other purposes," as the legal property of Anthony Lawson and Thomas A. Brewis, partners under the name and style of Lawson & Brewis, and that default being made in the payment of the taxes assessed thereon, the same were sold under said law to sundry parties, and deeds executed therefor. The proceeds of sale were paid into the Treasury, and were largely in excess of the direct taxes, costs, and legal charges accrued thereon by reason of the sale thereof as aforesaid.

Under the laws of the United States the original owners are entitled to the excess of proceeds, and Thomas A. Brewis having departed this life, the legal right to demand said excess has accrued to Anthony Lawson, the surviving partner of the late firm of Lawson & Brewis.

It appears that all of the lots mentioned in the bill reported by your committee have been repurchased from those who claim under the tax sales aforesaid by said Lawson & Brewis, so that no quitclaim or release deeds are necessary to be executed in order to confirm the titles under said sales.

Your committee therefore report the accompanying bill, with a change of title and like change of provisions from the bill referred to the committee, in view of the legal rights of the said Anthony Lawson as surviving partner of the firm of Lawson & Brewis.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Can the Senator read to the Senate the present law upon the subject of direct tax sales and the circumstances under which money is to be repaid? The law has been amended once or twice on topics of this kind.

Mr. WITHERS. I have not investigated the matter myself, but it has been investigated fully and reported by two committees of this body, the Committee on Claims and the Committee on Finance, both of whom recommend the passage of the bill. It was also recommended by the committees of the last Congress, but failed to pass for want of time in the closing hours of the session. The law, I understand, is fully complied with. Cases have been adjudicated upon the same principle. This money has been lying in the Treasury and the parties have been unable to recover possession of it for several years in consequence of difficulties. I suppose there will be no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to see the present statute, if it is to be found, upon that subject, so that we shall not have one law for one man and another law for another. I want to see the law if it is possible to find it. It is impossible to find the law in a moment, Mr. President.

Mr. KERNAN. Is it not the law of 1862 and 1863?

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is a later one, where we re-adjusted the whole thing on the subject of claims of this or some other character; I do not know what. I cannot find it in the book. The man who made these indexes deserves to be reproached; but we did pass about three or four years ago a systematic statute on the subject of disposing of claims about direct tax sales.

Mr. KERNAN. Did it apply to surplus money?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not remember. That is exactly why I want to find the statute. If I remembered exactly how it was I would state it, but I do not remember. I do know that difficulties were constantly arising, and a provision of law was made to guard the rights of persons and the rights of the United States. Whether it would apply to this case it is totally impossible to tell without finding the statute; but I do not feel justified in stopping my friend's bill because I cannot find the law.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Anthony Lawson, the surviving partner of Lawson & Brewis, or to his assignee or personal representative, without interest, the amount of the proceeds of sale for direct taxes due the United States of certain lots of land in Alexandria, Virginia, less, in each case, all the taxes, costs, and legal charges accrued by reason of the sale.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXTENSION OF ALABAMA CLAIMS COMMISSION.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not wish to interfere with further morning business, but I reported from the Judiciary Committee on Monday a bill to extend the duration of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims. That commission expires on the 22d of this month, and if the bill is to be passed at this session of Congress, it is important that it should be acted upon at a very early day.

Mr. MERRIMON. That will give rise to debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have got through the morning business already.

Mr. WRIGHT. If the morning business has been concluded, I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill I have named. Of course if there be morning business I will give way to that after the bill shall be taken up. It was recommended by the committee unanimously, I may say, and it is very important that it should be passed.

Mr. MERRIMON. I think that bill will give rise to some discussion.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am very sure it will not.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am sure it will. The Senate is very thin. How long is it proposed to extend the commission?

Mr. WRIGHT. To the 1st of November next.

Mr. MERRIMON. Will one objection carry the bill over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will not. The bill is on the Calendar, subject to the order of a majority of the Senate.

Mr. MERRIMON. Has it been just reported?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was reported on Monday, and is on the Calendar.

Mr. WRIGHT. The bill was reported since the last Calendar was made out, and therefore it is not on the printed Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill?

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate.

Mr. COOPER. While the clerk is looking for the bill just taken up, I ask the Senator from Iowa to let us pass Senate bill No. 620, to remove the political disabilities of James Argyle Smith, of Mississippi.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield for that purpose?

Mr. WRIGHT. If the bill is found I wish to proceed with its consideration. If not I will yield, if it will not displace this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is now found.

Mr. WRIGHT. Let the bill be read. We can dispose of it in a minute.

The bill (S. No. 983) to extend the duration of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. By it the existence of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, created by the act entitled "An act for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain," is continued and extended to the 1st day of November next, with the same effect and no other as if the last-named day had been named in the act for the termination of the powers of the court.

Mr. COOPER. Now I ask the indulgence of the Senator from Iowa——

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not think there will be any discussion. We can pass this bill in a few minutes.

Mr. COOPER. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I offer an amendment to the pending bill to strike out "the 1st day of November" and insert "the 1st day of January."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. MERRIMON. I think this is a bill of very considerable moment. The Senate is very thin, and I had hoped the Senate would not consider it this morning. I doubt whether we have a quorum present now. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed to take up this bill for consideration at this hour, and upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You cannot reconsider a vote of that kind.

Mr. MERRIMON. I have no objection to acting on the bill when the Senate shall be full.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can move to lay the bill on the table. Does he make that motion?

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not want to be factious about this matter, but I want the Senate full when the bill is considered.

Mr. DAVIS. I appeal to the Senator from Iowa to let his bill lie for a few moments until the Senate is full, and then probably there will be no objection to going on with it.

Mr WRIGHT. I do not think there can be any objection to this proposition. The business before the court is of such a character that it is impossible for them to get through by the 22d of this month. Unless we act on this bill by the 22d of this month the commission will fail; and it must be acted on by both Houses.

The proposition is to extend the time to the 1st of November. After due investigation and inquiry, it is believed they can get through with their work by that time, and not before; and therefore we have fixed the 1st of November as the proper time for closing the commission.

Mr. MERRIMON. While I take it there is no objection to extending the commission, there will be objection to allowing it to expire on the 1st day of November. There is a large surplus amount of this fund that will not be disposed of by that time and cannot be under the existing law. A bill has passed the House extending this commission for a considerable period in the future and also providing for a further distribution of the Geneva award fund. If the commission shall expire on the 1st of November it may give rise to a very serious difficulty about the disposition of that fund in the future or raising another commission to dispose of it. If the House bill is to pass, or if the Senate is to mature a bill for the further distribution of the fund, this commission ought to be continued to act under such legislation as may be had in that behalf.

Mr. WRIGHT. My friend will allow me to say that if the House bill shall be passed, or anything like it, then that in itself extends this commission a year. That bill proposes to enlarge their jurisdiction; but by reason of the possibility that that may not pass and in view of the business now before the commission, it is proposed to extend its time so that it may close up its present business. If its jurisdiction shall be extended, in that bill we can extend its time also.

Mr. MERRIMON. It has ten days yet before it expires.

Mr. WRIGHT. I know it has some days yet; but this bill has to pass here and go to the other House. It is now before the Senate and I trust the Senate will dispose of it.

Mr. DAWES. If the House bill does not pass at this session, it goes over to the next session. What propriety is there in terminating that commission between the sessions? I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that pending the House bill it is hardly worth while to cut off the heads of the commission. The House bill may not be disposed of this session; and certainly if it is not, with that House bill pending, which contemplates a final disposition of the balance of the award and such a disposition of it as will necessitate the continuance of the commission beyond November, it seems to me that it would be rather singular to extinguish the commission.

Mr. WRIGHT. The theory of this proposed legislation is this: The first bill gave life to this commission for a year or about a year. It provided that the President might extend the life of it for six months. It was extended six months. At the present session of Congress we have extended its life to the 22d of this month. Believing originally that it should close its work in a year or within the six months additional for which the President was allowed to extend its time, at this session we have passed a law continuing it to July 22, believing we had given them sufficient time to close up the work. It seems they are unable to do it. Now, in view of their present jurisdiction, we have believed that by the 1st of November they can close up their work, and we deemed it appropriate and proper that the commission should be closed up at that time. This is the third extension of its time.

I may say without any disrespect to the commission—and certainly I have no other than the kindest feelings—that it seems to me next to impossible to ever close one of these commissions when they get started. We propose, therefore, that this work shall be closed up by the 1st of November, so far as the present jurisdiction is concerned, and the commission wound up.

Mr. MERRIMON. If it is proper, I should be glad if the Senator would answer me this question: Why the 1st day of November was selected? Why not let the commission expire when Congress shall come together again at some period within the next session?

Mr. WRIGHT. For this reason: If you extend the time beyond what is necessary to close up its work, the Government is paying five to ten or fifteen thousand dollars a month for this commission; and if they can close the work by the 1st of November, why not save that expense?

Mr. DAWES. Is it on the ground that this commission has failed to discharge its duty with a rapidity that would meet the views of the committee?

Mr. WRIGHT. Not at all.

Mr. DAWES. Is it not an unusual commission; is it not rather a special duty that has grown upon the commission a good deal by legislation since it was created? The jurisdiction of the commission has been enlarged for claims that it did not apply to when it was created.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We gave it more time for that purpose.

Mr. DAWES. You gave it more time for that purpose. I have never heard but that the commission addressed itself with remarkable diligence to the discharge of its duty; and certainly in view of the fact that there is a large balance of the award undisposed of and that a bill with remarkable unanimity thus far has reached this body for a final disposition of the balance of the award, which will necessitate the continuance of the commission or the creation of a new one at the next session of Congress, it is very strange, it seems to me, that it is deemed absolutely necessary to extinguish it in November before the meeting of the next session of Congress.

Mr. WRIGHT. Let me say one word in addition to what I have already said. The jurisdiction of this tribunal has not been enlarged by our subsequent legislation, but provision was made by the act of January last allowing the additional time for the filing of claims, but not any other or different claims than those allowed before, and those claims were filed. In view of the permission thus given to file additional claims and in view of the fact that a few cases then remained undisposed of at the time we passed that law, we extended the court to the 22d of July. Now they have disposed, as I understand, of all the cases then pending, and, if not a large proportion of those subsequently filed, certainly of a very considerable number of them, and the committee, after due correspondence, believed unanimously that they could close their work by the 1st of November, and, therefore, we did not see the necessity of extending the time of this commission two or three months longer at an expense to the Government, if they could close their work at that time.

Now let me say another thing. I have not suggested nor will I suggest for a moment that any member of this commission has been the least wanting in diligence or fidelity to duty. I think they have been as faithful as any commission perhaps we have ever had; but the work can be closed up at that time, as I understand, and I do not see any necessity for continuing it beyond that.

Mr. MERRIMON. I wish to ask the Senator whether, if the work of this commission is closed, under existing legislation there will not remain an undistributed balance of eight or nine million dollars.

Mr. WRIGHT. There will be a large balance undistributed; there is no question about that; but are you to keep the commission alive until we exhaust that fund, and keep it alive for the purpose of exhausting the fund?

Mr. MERRIMON. There is legislation proposed and pending before Congress now to provide for distributing that fund and how it shall be distributed, enlarging the jurisdiction of this commission. I understand a bill has passed the House for that purpose and is before the Senate now. If that is to be done, why shall we allow this commission to expire and go to the trouble of providing a new commission, with probably new men, who will have to become informed on the subject and prepared to make decisions? and very important decisions they will be called on to make. This commission is better qualified than any other commission could be probably for some time after it shall be appointed. The new commission would have to learn the current business, the run of decisions, the run of the law on the subject. This commission is already informed, it is educated on the subject, and if that large surplus is to be distributed, I can see no reason in the world for allowing this commission to expire. Let us wait and see whether their jurisdiction will be enlarged, and it will be time enough then to say whether we shall allow it to expire before the next session of Congress.

Mr. WRIGHT. The effect of my friend's logic would be this, that if we do not pass the bill that is now before us from the House at the next session, we must still continue the commission in life in the possibility that we may have some legislation in the future. This thing is all in a nut-shell. They have a certain jurisdiction. With the matters now before them and of which they have jurisdiction, they can close the work by the 1st of November, if the Senate shall pass the House bill that provides for continuing them in life; but if we do not pass it, then, upon the Senator's logic, we should continue this commission until the next session on the possibility that we shall pass it; and if we do not pass it, then we shall still continue the commission rather than have this fund undistributed. At present there are before the commission certain cases. It is believed they can close their work by the 1st of November; and if after that there shall be additional legislation, that will continue them in life; but why continue them in life in view of the possibility that we may have legislation hereafter?

Mr. SAULSBURY. What will be the effect of passing the bill proposed by the Senator from Iowa? This commission, with its present jurisdiction, after it shall have made all its awards, will leave in the Treasury of the United States several millions of dollars. To pass this bill and wind up the commission on the 1st day of November next will be virtually locking that money permanently in the Treasury of the United States, which, in my judgment, ought to be distributed to some other claimants. The time is very short between the 1st of November and the 1st of January. My amendment continues in existence this commission until Congress at the next session shall have time, if they see proper so to do, to enlarge the jurisdiction of the commission so that they may deal with the residue of that fund which is now outside of their present jurisdiction. It may be that there will be a little expense in paying the commissioners; but we had better do that than destroy the commission and then perhaps have a conflict in reference to the creation of another commission for the purpose of distributing the $8,000,000 or $9,000,000 which remain in the Treasury. I hope, therefore, that the amendment I have offered will prevail.

I am not very partial to these commissions; but I know nothing about the labors of this commission. I presume they have been diligent and faithful in the discharge of their duty; but if you require them on the 1st day of November to wind up their business, it will be a very short time from then to the 1st of January when at the next session Congress can, if it sees proper, enlarge the jurisdiction of the commission so as to deal with the residue of the fund. I hope my amendment will prevail.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa a question. Was there anything before the committee that reported this bill from the commission with regard to this business? Have they expressed any opinion with respect to the time it will take them to complete the unfinished business?

Mr. WRIGHT. I can say to the Senator from Florida that as far as that is concerned we have no information from them directly. Of course I suppose they would have great delicacy in expressing an opinion on the subject; but we have a report as to the condition of the business, and we know what they have done, and we know the length of time that is given them by the proposed bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This commission has been, I believe, extended twice already, and we have enlarged its jurisdiction in one single respect, and that was to take in a certain class of claims like those in the original bill, but which, through the distance of the claimants from the United States at the time, or through accident or mistake, failed to get presented within the limit that the statute applied. That class of persons were almost entirely sailors, sea-faring men, some of whom had returned to the United States to find that the time for filing their claims for personal effects, &c., had gone by. It was thought hard to cause them to lose their little claims on that account; and the Senate, therefore, unanimously, I believe, passed the bill which allowed them to come in. The old cases, the main cases, with almost no exception, have long since been disposed of. Under this new provision as to personal effects, &c., accidents, and absent men, there were filed more than six hundred claims. The court has disposed of about two hundred of them; and it has been found, just as might have been anticipated as the court wades along into this class of claims, many of the claimants, if they are the persons who were actually on board these vessels, which nobody knows, are far off, some in the Sandwich Islands, some in the East Indies, scattered all over the world. The commission has found that a Sandwich Islander, for instance a Kanaka, puts in a claim that he was on a certain whaling-vessel that was destroyed, and that he had fifteen hundred dollars' worth of clothing and personal effects that he wants to be paid for out of what is called this fund. Many of these cases are so evidently fictitious from the very nature of the case that the court has felt, I believe, considerable disgust at them; and, I have no doubt, taking those that were outside of the United States, those that have not been disposed of, of returned sailors whose identity and homes were known, that more than half the claims that are left are absolutely fraudulent; and as to the other half I think it may be safely guessed as to one-half of that half that although put in in the names of some persons really in existence somewhere, those persons never heard that they had any claim to file nor filed any, because in the case of people absent from the United States it is done under a power of attorney, as it is called. I think therefore we shall not run any great risk of doing any particular injustice to anybody as the law now stands. If we let this commission expire a week from to-day, which I believe is the day it does expire, the 22d, the commissioners will report to the Secretary of State the cases they have decided, and the claimants will get their pay and the thing will be wound up. For one, I am not very eager, I confess, from the inquiries and investigation I have made about this business, to extend this commission at all, because I believe the instances will be very rare in which any honest claimant will ever lose his money, and if any such instance should exist it can be afterward ascertained, as we do in all such cases, and provided for.

Mr. MERRIMON. If the Senator will allow me, I beg to ask him if there was not a very earnest debate here at the very last session as to whether the jurisdiction of this commission should be enlarged so as to bring in a very large class of claimants who insisted that they were meritorious?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am coming to that. I was about to dismiss this part of these small claims that are left, and to say if any of them, as undoubtedly some of them are, are just, they can readily and easily be provided for without keeping up this very expensive institution. I do not mean when I say "very expensive" unnecessarily or extravagantly expensive, but from the nature of things a commission of five eminent gentlemen at $6,000 a year, and a head counsel at $8,000, and an assistant counsel and clerks and agents and stenographers and rooms and porters and messengers and so on, of course takes money. So that taking the law as it now stands, as I have said, it will not be a very serious calamity if the commission expires as it is; but we thought on the whole, with some doubt, that it perhaps might be well to give them two or three months more to close out, as far as they then could, cases in which the testimony has not yet come in. We thought perhaps it would do to let them go on until November, when they could wind up all the cases that looked to them as if they had any real merit in them; but to be sure a good many people who are engaged in prosecuting claims of this kind and appearing for the honor of the claimant without any real authority may be a little disappointed, if there are any such.

Now, the question is that which my friend from North Carolina and my friend from Delaware allude to when they say that there is a large class of claims against this money—I do not call it a fund; I do not know what is meant by a "fund" in this connection. The treaty did not say that it was a fund; the award did not say that it was a fund; the act of Congress that we have already passed on the subject does not say that it is a fund. It is money in the Treasury that belongs to the United States. Whether anybody has a claim against the United States in respect of the subjects out of which that money came, is another question.

My friends ask, why not keep this commission alive in order to consider whether we will not contrive some other claim upon the fund, as there are a good many, and allow them to be paid out of it as they call it a fund? The answer is obvious to me in respect of continuing this particular commission as good as it is, for, I dare say it is as good a commission as any that we have had, although it belongs to that class of commissions that human experience has shown never terminates. The Mexican commission is one illustrious instance of that; begun under the treaty of 1848, in spite of all we can do, it is still prosperous and being paid its daily allowance out of the Treasury; and there is the Spanish commission, which has certainly the quality of longevity if nothing else. We thought it would be rather a wholesome thing, knowing that these gentlemen would not feel hurt by it, for they are all honorable and eminent men, to find one commission that could terminate somewhere and at some time.

What harm is it to do? Suppose Congress shall pass a bill which shall provide for the payment of the claims of those persons whose property was destroyed by the rebel cruisers outside of the three vessels that Her Majesty's government of Great Britain were held responsible for the action of. That is one set of claims. Suppose it should happen that the Senate and House should decide, and the President should agree, that the war-premium men, the people who paid enhanced premiums on account of the state of war, should be re-imbursed all their war premiums, although there would be a serious inquiry whether the war-premium men did not charge their premiums in the cost of their goods, just as they did freights and commissions and everything else; and so whether you and I and all the rest of the people of the United States did not pay the war premiums ourselves when we bought the goods. That would be worth thinking of—but we cannot stop to discuss that now—and in that case, Mr. President, you and I would be the true claimants; and I trust, if we are, our dividend will be large.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAXEY. I understand that he referred to the Mexican commission organized under the treaty of 1848. Will the Senator please state when it was organized? I want to know how long it has been at work.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know. As far as I can remember it was organized when I appeared to occupy a seat on the floor of this body, as the expression sometimes is, and I have no doubt that it will outlast my continuance here, although I hope to be regularly elected a great many times. [Laughter.]

Suppose the Senate should decide, as it has once already decided and as both Houses have decided and as the President has decided by his approval of the bill, that there is no just ground upon which we can stand in respect of paying claims for damages from the outside cruisers; and I will not give the reasons for it and it may be that we cannot reconsider that point. There are strong moral equities, I admit. It may be that we can get over that difficulty; but we found once that we could not; we found once that we could not allow the war premiums. Great consideration was given to both those questions, and both Houses concluded that they could not properly be included. We found that we could not allow the claims of the insurance companies, to whom I have not yet alluded, who made money out of the premiums they had taken growing out of this very state of rebellion and belligerency on the high seas, and who, having filled their pockets with premiums, now come in to take the dividends. That is another class. The Senate was very evenly divided upon that point, but a majority of the Senate were of the opinion in passing the law that that sort of claim would not stand. But of course since that time the Senate has very considerably changed its membership.

All these questions have to be discussed and considered carefully by this body, because they are important and in some degree intricate. They have been considered by the House of Representatives, and the House of Representatives has sent us a bill which embraces the outside-cruisers people, if you may call them so, and the war-premium men, and drops the insurance men. A good many gentlemen in the Senate for whose opinion I have very high respect believe sincerely, and give very strong reasons for their belief, although I do not concur in them, that the insurance companies are those who are first entitled, and I do not know but exclusively entitled. There are others who think that the outside-cruisers people have the best right, and that neither of the others have any, and there may be some, probably there are, who believe that the war-premium men are entitled and that theirs is the best right. When speaking of them I ought to say that it is due to the war-premium men that the Senate should know that a firm of enterprising attorneys in this town, undoubtedly from the most patriotic motives, have sent a printed letter to all the war-premium men who could be heard of calling upon the war-premium men to write to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and to every one of the rest of the Judiciary Committee and to each one of their own Senators and Representatives a particular letter and to bring pressure to bear—I believe I quote the very words, "pressure to bear"—in order that the just claims of the war-premium men might be duly considered; and, in response I suppose to that invitation, I have received, much to the advantage of our good friend the Postmaster-General who gets the postage, a good many letters that follow with scrupulous fidelity this invitation that has emanated from this city. There cannot be any doubt that that class of people who prey upon a fund, if you call it a fund, who pray for it and get it usually, are rather plentiful about the capital at this time. I think it would be wholesome for public morals, if nothing else, that on the principle that this commission now exists it should terminate at once; and if Congress at the next session chooses to consider, as undoubtedly it will and ought, what ought to be done with the sufferers by the outside cruisers and with the war-premium men and with the insurance companies, we shall do it in a pure atmosphere and with a fresh start.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I do not know anything about the merits of the different claimants for this money. I have not sufficiently examined the question to make up any opinion or express any opinion in reference to the equitable claims of the insurance men or the war-premium men. But one thing is certain, the Government of the United States demanded from Great Britain payment of certain losses sustained by the people of this country and obtained fifteen and a half million of dollars, which is now in the public Treasury. The commission that is in existence has awarded something less than half that amount to claimants upon that money. The residue is in the public Treasury. That commission will terminate within a few days unless it is extended. The proposition of the Senator from Iowa is to extend it to the 1st day of November in order that it may adjudicate and pass upon the claims now filed before it. It seemed to me—and the reason I offered the amendment was this—that the 1st of November is so near the period when Congress will again assemble that we had better continue the commission, if we continue it all, till Congress can take action. If we extend its time to the 1st of November we had better extend it until the 1st of January, when the Congress of the United States may consider the propriety of extending the jurisdiction of the commission so that they may include other claims than those of which they have jurisdiction at present. I think that while it may cost a few thousand dollars perhaps to continue the commission two months longer, we had better do it rather than to abolish the whole machinery for ascertaining and determining the rights of claimants upon this money. We had better incur a little additional expense so that the machinery by which the adjudication of claims against this money may be taken into consideration shall be kept up. I therefore think that there will be great propriety in the adoption of the amendment which I have proposed to this bill, and I hope the Senate will so regard it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President——

Mr. MERRIMON. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired. The river and harbor bill is the unfinished business.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator having that bill in charge is not present, and I suggest that this debate go on until he enters the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas. The Chair hears none. The Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

AMENDMENT OF PACIFIC RAILROAD ACTS.

Mr. WEST. With the consent of the Senator from Massachusetts, I wish to say that there is a bill lying on the table upon which there is a question of reference, as to which committee it shall be referred to; and I should like to see if we cannot have an understanding as to whether that question cannot be fixed for some definite time; not by making it a special order, but by an understanding of the Senate that that question of reference shall be taken up and submitted to the Senate upon the conclusion of the river and harbor bill. I make that suggestion to the Senate, and I believe that will be accepted by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will in substance, most decidedly. I have endeavored to get this railroad measure in such an attitude as that it would receive consideration in some way, and I shall be very glad indeed if the Senate will consent to take it up in order that we may find out what the judgment of the Senate is about it, whether of reference to one committee or another or no reference at all, in order that we may get action and be free from any imputation of negligence in respect to this important subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to making this matter a special order after the conclusion of the river and harbor bill. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. I object. I want the post-route bill to follow this.

Mr. WEST. I can only say then, as the objection defeats any arrangement, that I will make an effort to test the sense of the Senate as between the two questions.

COURT OF COMMISSIONERS OF ALABAMA CLAIMS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 983) to extend the duration of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong this debate, and I hope I err in the inference I draw from the remarks made by the Senator from Iowa, and also from the remarks made by the Senator from Vermont, that they on the whole are in favor of retaining this money in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have made no such intimation at all and have expressed no opinion. I have stated the difficulty that surrounded the subject and the two views of it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I said I hoped I erred in the inference I drew. I find in regard to the Senator from Vermont that I was in error, and I presume also, as I see that my friend from Iowa rises, that I am in error in regard to him.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I am sure I uttered not one sentence from which he could infer that. I said expressly that extending the jurisdiction was a matter for subsequent consideration, but taking the present jurisdiction I thought it advisable to close it at present; but on the question of extending the jurisdiction I expressed no opinion.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, I am not in error perhaps in supposing that the remarks of the Senator from Iowa were very guarded in that particular. But I am quite sure that, independently of anything that has been said by any honorable Senator, the effect of this proposition is one step, and a very long step, and a very important step, in favor of the position that this money is not a fund in trust for anybody, but is the property of the United States and to be held by the United States unless we can find those so indigent or so deserving that we can take it from the Treasury and endow it upon such persons as a gift.

I should feel that the country was dishonored if in the end it should become the judgment of the Congress that there were not persons or parties, whose rights and interests were represented at Geneva by this Government, to whom this money could be paid either upon legal or equitable grounds. If we have, either by misrepresentation as to the extent of losses or by superior skill in the management of what has been called the greatest lawsuit of modern times, overreached a rival and in the main a friendly country, and taken from the people and the government of that country millions of money without right as matter of law and without equity as matter of justice, and put that money in the Treasury of the United States, disagreeable as the admission must be, I should hold that the Government was irretrievably disgraced. Therefore I am in favor of continuing this commission as an assertion that we still recognize that there are parties whose rights have not been considered fully by the Congress of the United States to whom this money is due and to whom it is ultimately to be paid. For one I had rather, if in the end there be no parties to whom this money is properly due either as matter of law or equity, vote to return it to the government of Great Britain upon the ground that there was an error in the trial of this cause.

There are, however, parties, in my judgment, who have legal rights, and who, if they could go into the courts of the United States upon well-settled principles of administration that have been recognized in this Government from the first and have been recognized in the government of Great Britain through all time where the law has a history, could have those rights established. There is no doubt about that. Then there are other persons who have equitable claims. I cannot now consider the extent and much less the nature of those claims; but there are persons who have equitable claims upon this money whose rights should be considered. As a mere matter of convenience, this money should be paid to the parties having just claims for it. Consider to what extent the Government of this country has been troubled by the spoliation claims, and we and our successors for two generations shall not hear the last appeal that will be made from persons and parties who will consider themselves to have been wronged if we hesitate to do that which the law and justice require us to do in behalf of those who suffered by the depredations of cruisers for which Great Britain was made responsible.

It is not to me an argument that, because we have two commissions, one upon Spanish claims and one upon Mexican claims, which the honorable Senator from Vermont intimates are of no service and which there is not power enough in Congress to abolish, therefore we should apply the hand of the Government to a commission that has done faithful service, and close their doors and end their powers.

Between the 1st of November and January there are two months. The expense of maintaining this commission cannot be great. If we close it in November, it is a substantial declaration that there is no further work to be done. Let it continue until January; there will be a month of the session of Congress that will intervene after the close of this session. In that time, if nothing be done during this session with the bill from the House, there will be an opportunity for the Senate to consider it; and I say in the presence of our responsibility to Great Britain, in the presence of our responsibility to those who have claims upon this fund, in the presence of our responsibility to ourselves, who as agents of the people of this country have received this money upon the declaration and upon proofs that it was due to our citizens, that we should not take one step which indicates that we have either erred or been guilty of something worse in the course we have pursued.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order, being the river and harbor bill, is before the Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust we may have a vote. I think we can get a vote on this question and get it out of the way.

Mr. WINDOM. If the Senate is ready to vote, I will not insist on the river and harbor bill until a vote can be taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection, the consideration of the bill called up by the Senator from Iowa will be continued. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] to strike out "November" and insert "January."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

A division was called for on the passage of the bill, and resulted—ayes 34, noes 4.

So the bill was passed.

PETITION.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of Rufus H. Waite, of Portland, Maine, praying for the passage of an act authorizing the change of the name of the schooner-yacht Captain Charles Robbins to that of Minnie; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. HAMLIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 992) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a register and change the name of the schooner Captain Charles Robbins to Minnie; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 373 and 374, in the following words:

For the improvement of Shrewsbury River, New Jersey, $5,000.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Shrewsbury River, New Jersey, is a river upon which there are a great many steamboats that ply constantly, taking produce to the city of New York. There is in that river a sand-bar, and the effect of it is that vessels are often detained there for many hours and lose their entire cargo which is perishable. I hope that this amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I shall content myself, in the absence of the Senator in charge of the bill, by simply stating the grounds upon which the committee struck it out. The reduced estimate said "omit." Practicing on the principle laid down on the other propositions, the committee recommended that this item be omitted. I have no other argument to make about it. I have no doubt the work is valuable. If the principle on which the Senate has acted should be carried out, this may as well go in as others.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is quite a valuable work, and this appropriation will relieve very much the steamers that navigate that river.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPENCER. Yesterday we passed over temporarily an amendment on page 12, the item for the improvement of Pascagoula Bay, Mississippi, $10,000.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator from Iowa has given much more attention to this bill than I have. I prefer that the Senator from Alabama should wait until he comes in.

Mr. SPENCER. Very well; it was passed over to enable me to prepare an amendment. I have now prepared it.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 376, to increase the appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Erie, Pennsylvania, from $40,000 to $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 378, to increase the appropriation for the improvement of the breakwater at Block Island, Rhode Island, from $20,000 to $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 383 and 384, in the following words:

For the improvement of Providence River, Rhode Island, $5,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am not surprised that my friend from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] deserted this side of the Chamber and went over there when this amendment came up. I can see at this distance the blush of ingenuous shame that overspreads his handsome countenance. This pitiful sum of $5,000 is all that is given to the State of Rhode Island, with its large littoral frontier with Narraganset Bay, which is the natural entrepot of the commerce of New England, which supplies not only the great manufacturing establishments of our State, but those of Western Massachusetts and part of New Hampshire and Vermont, which receives more coal than any other port north of New York; and all the House has given it is $5,000, and this it is proposed to strike out. True, the committee have increased the appropriation for Block Island, but this is a national appropriation, and New York is as much more interested in it than Rhode Island as the commerce of New York is greater than the commerce of Rhode Island. I am sure the Senate will not agree to this amendment. The amount ought to be $25,000.

Mr. WINDOM. That is the reason the committee recommended to strike it out. It should be a great deal more or nothing. I will content myself, however, with reading to the Senate a very brief note from G. K. Warren on this subject:

CHIEF ENGINEER UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, District of Columbia.

If reduced to one-third, leave out all I estimated for except Block Island and Saybrook Bar.

The committee left it out under General Warren's direction.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senate have overruled that in preceding instances, and I am quite sure they will in this.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 385 and 386, in the following words:

For the improvement of Otter Creek, Vermont, $5,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I can convict this committee of the greatest injustice they have done in any instance. [Laughter.] Otter Creek in Vermont has existed since the establishment of American independence, to begin with; and, to leave joking aside, this is an important small river. The city of Vergennes upon it is six miles from Lake Champlain, and of course everybody knows that Lake Champlain is the great water highway between Canada and the States, with the great State of New York on one side and the still greater State of Vermont on the other.

Mr. MERRIMON. How large is Otter Creek?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Otter Creek up to the city of Vergennes is six miles long. Its depth is not as much as it ought to be, but about ten times the depth of any river that I know of in North Carolina. [Laughter.]

Mr. MERRIMON. Then it would be from fifty to eighty feet.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir; fifty to eighty feet in spots. There are sundry bars in the river. Leaving joking aside—though this bill is getting to be rather a joke—there are sundry places in this river where sand and mud bars have formed that impede navigation. Lines of steamers have for a great many years run there. They have sometimes been discontinued in the early part of railroad operations, but have been again revived. It is a large and important manufacturing point, having property to receive and property to export, and of course communicates with the ports on the other side of Lake Champlain.

Mr. CONKLING. How wide?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should think at the head, at the city, it is four hundred feet wide. A steamboat line runs from this city to Fort Henry and to Westport and to Ticonderoga in the State of New York at this present time. These small sums of money are necessary, and so reported by the engineers, to clear out the mud-bars that have formed at its mouth. If the Senate thinks it is the case for standing by the committee, I have nothing to say.

Mr. WINDOM. The engineer's report upon this subject is as follows:

OTTER CREEK, VERMONT.

No appropriation was made for this work for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875. Under the appropriation of March 3, 1875, it is proposed to dredge about eight thousand cubic yards of material composed of sand, stone, clay, trees, and saw-mill débris from Vergennes Basin, between Brick-yard and Sharkey Bend. Contract for this work has been made with James D. Hancock, dated June 26, 1875. For completing the improvement of the channel the sum required will be $43,146.

We have before us a letter from Colonel Newton, of the Engineer Corps, making the revised estimate, saying that certain work should be done and that all others should be omitted. This one is omitted. It is evidently the opinion of Colonel Newton that it is unnecessary now to spend $43,146 for improving communication between Sharkey Bend and the Brick-yard. But if my friend insists that Sharkey Bend and the Brick-yard are so important points that they ought to be connected, I shall not make any opposition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I insist as I have said, and without any jocoseness, that this small sum of $5,000 is desirable, as has been shown by observation and experience there, to improve this channel for the commerce that does actually exist between the city of Vergennes on the one side and the villages and towns on the western side of the lake in the State of New York. If the Senate think this is not right, I beg them not to vote for it.

Mr. MORRILL. I rose at the same time that my colleague did, knowing his modesty and his inaptitude for extemporaneous debate, and believing that he would hardly feel it his duty to make the proper explanation of this matter. True, he has done so; but he has not said all that might be said in relation to the State of Vermont. We have not put in any claims here for any other river, nothing for the Ompompanoosuc, nothing for the Passumpsic, nothing for the Winooski, nor for the Black or White River, nor for the Lamoille River. We have not even asked for any surveys of these rivers. Under the circumstances, as this is for the accommodation of a city of great enterprise and the oldest city of our State, and I do not hope to be any more economical than are my friends on the opposite side of the Chamber, therefore I hope the appropriation will be made.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 389 and 390, in the following words:

For the improvement of Belfast Harbor, Maine, $8,000.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I trust that item will not be stricken out. Belfast is one of the most important harbors on our coast. It is a port of entry on which the city of Belfast is situated. I think I am accurate in saying that thousands of vessels go annually into and out of that harbor. There are at the mouth of the harbor some rocks which want to be removed. This $8,000 will remove them. I hope the Senate will not concur in this amendment.

Mr. WINDOM. I think this comes within the principle on which the Senate have adopted all the others. I make no opposition to it.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 392, to increase the appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Rondout, New York, from $30,000 to $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 393 and 394, in the following words:

For dredging Hudson River in front of Jersey City, $25,000.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Eccentric as I may appear, I think that item ought to be stricken out and the amendment ought to be agreed to, because the committee inform us that, on the eleventh page, "for the improvement of the Hudson River" the amount was made $66,000, instead of $25,000, to cover this same improvement.

Mr. WINDOM. That is the fact.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 397 and 398, in the following words:

For the improvement of the channel between Staten Island and New Jersey, $10,000.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That amendment ought not to prevail. There is not in the whole bill a more important improvement than that. The water between Staten Island and New Jersey, known as Arthur Kill, is the great avenue of all internal commerce between Philadelphia, and consequently a good deal of the West, and New York. The Delaware and Raritan Canal alone does a business transporting there 40,000,000 tons a year. It is not a matter in which New Jersey is particularly interested. Pennsylvania is interested; New York is interested; and I hope that the appropriation will be retained.

Mr. WINDOM. This does differ a little from a good many of those items which the Senate has voted to retain; but I desire that the Senate shall be informed in reference to its condition, and then I shall be willing to have the vote taken. General Newton in his special report says——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. What is the date of that?

Mr. WINDOM. December 18, 1875. After stating the facts quite fully, with reference to this improvement he says:

To sum up:

First. In the present condition and prospect of Elizabethport it would not be expedient to prosecute the works of permanent improvement designed in 1873 and commenced in 1874.

Second. The depth in the present channel being sufficient for the class of vessels using the canal, and for the barges and small class of vessels which, for the future, and until a change for the better, will continue to frequent Elizabethport, no apparent necessity exists for deepening or widening the channel.

Third. No increase in depth or width in the channel can be maintained, except by repetitions of the dredging process.

Three distinct reasons are given why it is wholly unnecessary. I hope the Senator from New Jersey will withdraw his request.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The work has been going on there.

Mr. WINDOM. Under an old appropriation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I know the character of this avenue between Staten Island and New Jersey and that the amount of commerce there is as great, probably, as on any waters of the United States. It is not a matter for Elizabethport; I should not think of asking for that; but it is a question which involves the commerce of Newark, of Philadelphia, and of New York.

Mr. WINDOM. That is all very true; but from the best information we can get there is water enough now for all the purposes of commerce in that locality; for all the purposes that the channel is used for or desired to be. I merely read the report of the Engineer's Office to show you how little they know about these matters!

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The statement is made to me, and it has been verified, that a great many vessels can only pass there at high tide, and have to wait and be delayed until the tide rises. I presume that is the fact.

The amendment was rejected, ayes 9, noes not counted.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 400, to reduce the appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Provincetown, Massachusetts, from $5,000 to $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 401 and 402, in the following words:

For the improvement of Ipswich River, Massachusetts, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 404, to increase the appropriation "for the construction of piers of ice harbor and removing obstructions at New Castle, Delaware," from $12,000 to $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 407, after "Michigan," to insert:

Including removal of the wreck of the City of Buffalo.

So as to make the clause read:

For the improvement of the harbor of refuge, Lake Huron, Michigan, including removal of the wreck of the City of Buffalo, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 411 and 412, in the following words:

For the improvement of the Osage River, Missouri, $25,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do trust that the Senate will not concur in this amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations. This Osage River drains a valley one hundred and fifty miles from east to west by eighty miles from north to south, embracing within its limits from fifteen to eighteen counties, with 150,000 inhabitants. In 1870 its assessed wealth was over $40,000,000. Its area is about eighteen thousand square miles. Its productions are very great; a million and a half bushels of wheat in 1870, 5,750,000 bushels of corn, a million and a half bushels of oats, 375,000 pounds of tobacco, 273,000 pounds of wool, with great numbers of cattle, horses, mules, hogs, and sheep, the timber (and the bottom lands of this river are heavily timbered) consisting of hickory, oak, walnut, ash, elm, sycamore; but its chief importance is its mineral wealth, consisting of iron, coal, lead, zinc, buhrstone, marble, grit, and kaolin. I read now from the engineer's report of the survey of this river:

The Osage Valley derives its chief importance from the richness of the vast mineral deposits. Professor Pompelly, in his geological report of 1873, spoke in very high terms of its mineral resources, though hardly one-tenth of the real value of its deposits was known at that time. Rich banks of iron and valuable veins of lead and coal are found almost every day. All this vast wealth is now unavailable for want of transportation, and it seems to be the province of a paternal government to assist in bringing these great necessaries of life, iron and coal, into market, whereby the whole country would be benefited. The principal minerals are iron, coal, lead, zinc, buhrstone, marble, grit, and kaolin.

The lead in this area exists in very great quantities. I will read an extract from a letter from Hon. Joseph W. McClurg, late a member of the House of Representatives and the last of the republican governors of the great State of Missouri:

There was almost no mining for lead ore when we built our furnace in the fall of 1871.

That fall, 1871, we shipped 336 pigs, 84½ pounds each; in 1872, we shipped 1,187 pigs, 84½ pounds each; in 1873, we shipped 594 pigs, 84½ pounds each; in 1874, we shipped 1,030 pigs, 84½ pounds each; in 1875, we shipped 3,033 pigs, 84½ pounds each; and to-day we have 391 pigs, 84½ pounds each, ready for shipment, with a furnace now running.

There are vast quantities of iron all over that country. This valley is situated between the Missouri Pacific and the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railways on the north and northwest and the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad upon the south and southeast. The Osage River is formed by the junction of the Marmaton and Little Osage two hundred and forty miles above its mouth, and eight miles below the city of Jefferson enters into the Missouri, and it meanders up through these twelve or fifteen counties and is situated midway between these two lines of railway, varying from twenty-five to thirty miles from either one of the roads on the north or south. Here is this vast country and its great and wonderful resources; and the only possible outlet for these minerals and products is the Osage River.

This river is two hundred and forty miles in length, and there have already been appropriated for its improvement $100,000 in appropriations of $25,000 a year; and we only ask a continuance of the work already begun. Now, to show the absolute importance of an appropriation to carry into force and effect the improvements already started and to remove the actual damage which these unfinished improvements have imposed upon the navigation of that stream, I will read from a letter of a very worthy gentleman, Mr. Lambert, living toward the mouth of the Osage River, at Castle Rock:

CASTLE ROCK, December 4, 1875.

DEAR SIR: This end of the Osage River is now in such a condition that boats cannot run, although there is sufficient volume of water if concentrated in the channel to make three feet of water at this low-water season for steamboats. The unfinished condition in which the river was left by the Government's agents has rendered the work done by them at Bolton's shoal a complete obstruction to navigation. There is now over three feet of water on the old shoal, and there is sufficient volume of water to make this depth all through the lower end of the river. The engineer so constructed the lower end of the trailing-wall at Bolton's Shoal by curving it to the right and leading the water to a ground bar on the left of and from the true channel, that the concentrated force of the water discharged against this bar is carried to a point below the trailing-wall, spreading and dissipating the force of the water, depositing the ground, and forming a complete obstruction to navigation.

Governor J. W. McCLURG,
Linn Creek, Missouri.

This is confirmed by the letter of Governor McClurg, from which I quoted before. Governor McClurg lives at Linn Creek, and he is probably more familiar with the Osage River than almost any gentleman, engineer or other, in the United States. He has lived there for many years since long prior to the war, and has used this river and knows its power and its value and knows its adaptability to improvement, and in view of his confidence and judgment the representatives of the people are willing to undertake this enterprise.

He says further:

We are (Draper, McClurg & Co.) now building a light-draught steamer here. We expect to run her at all times and to adopt a system of scraping the shoals in low water by steel scrapers, the bottom of the river in the shoals consisting of gravel. A freshet washes it back again, when another scraping is necessary. At the same time there should be some repairing of the wing-dams that were constructed some years ago under an appropriation by our State.

I do trust, in view of the great importance of this work, its practicability, and the absolute necessity of this appropriation in order to make former appropriations and work done under them of any force and effect, that this amendment will not be concurred in, and that this great valley of the Osage River will be given this $25,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. WINDOM. I am well aware that the discussions of this bill do not contribute to any public benefit, unless it be to a knowledge of the geography of various sections of the country. The geographical contributions may be of some value. Otherwise I think the debate is of none; but I desire to call the attention of my friend again to the ignorance displayed by the Engineer Department on this subject; and then I will submit the question to the Senate. I read from the last report. General J. H. Simpson sums up the case with reference to this improvement as follows:

The results may then be summed up as follows:

1. The Osage River is not susceptible of permanent or even satisfactory temporary improvement for navigation at low stages of water.

There is one important little item, that it is not susceptible of improvement at all.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Did Mr. Simpson make the survey or was he sitting back and commenting upon the survey made by another gentleman who recommends it?

Mr. WINDOM. I said in the start that I was reading this report to show the ignorance of the Engineer Department. I am arguing that General J. H. Simpson did not know anything about it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does he state whether he made the survey himself or whether it was made by another man?

Mr. WINDOM. I do not know about that. I suppose another man made the survey, but he is the supervising engineer, at least.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. Gordon made the survey, and he recommends an appropriation of $100,000.

Mr. WINDOM. General Simpson says:

2. It is susceptible of improvement to the extent of obtaining a ruling depth of four feet at all times, by means of locks and dams, twenty-two in number if of eight feet lift, and twenty-seven if of six and a half feet; the cost of the former estimated at $2,857,330.30; of the latter at $3,090,825.

An appropriation is proposed of $5,000 to commence a work that will cost $3,000,000. Undoubtedly the money will be used very economically.

Mr. COCKRELL and others. It is $25,000.

Mr. WINDOM. That is a little worse. He proceeds as follows:

3. If a ruling depth of four feet is obtained in the Osage by means of locks and dams, the same would be required over the bar at the debouchment of the river, and as far down the Missouri as its junction with the Mississippi, to utilize the improvement at all stages of water; problems not yet solved.

4. The Osage, since the introduction of railroads running parallel with it, and at no very great distance, is no longer a necessary link in the great current of trade westward.

5. Its navigable portion would be entirely within the State of Missouri, and though its improvement would doubtless be of value in developing the rich mineral and agricultural resources of the region through which the river passes, it cannot be regarded as one of national importance, and therefore requiring Government aid.

On this point I address myself to my honorable friend from Missouri on the question of strict construction and State rights.

6. Should the improvement be made—

I call the attention of the Senator again to this language particularly—

Should the improvement be made, the advantages resulting would be far from commensurate with the great cost, say $3,000,000.

For these several reasons I do not feel justified in recommending the project, and therefore do not advise that any further appropriation by Congress should be made for the work.

To recapitulate to my honorable friend from Missouri, I will say that in the first place it is impracticable; the improvement cannot be made; in the second place, $25,000 will not go very far on an expenditure of $3,000,000; in the third place, the ruling depth will require an improvement at the mouth, and the engineer says is an insolvable question yet whether it can be improved at all or not. The next point is that its constitutionality is very doubtful, at least in the estimation of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not at all.

Mr. WINDOM. I appeal to his conscience on that subject. I am a little more liberal in my views than he is generally on that question. The sixth point is that if the improvement were made at all, it would not pay when you are done with it. These are the little items of objection which the Engineer Department very ignorantly make to this appropriation.

Mr. BOGY. The report of the engineer is based upon the idea that a large improvement of the Osage River would take a sum of from $2,000,000 to $3,000,000 so as to obtain the depth of four feet of water. It is not our intention to ask for an appropriation for that object, but we ask for an appropriation of $25,000, which is the same amount that has been given every year; and each appropriation has done a very large amount of good. We do not need four feet of water for an inland river, but we do need a depth of from two to two and a half feet, which can be obtained and is obtained every year by these small appropriations.

The whole argument of my friend from Minnesota and the very assertion of the report read by him show an opposition to a large appropriation for this great improvement, because the river is perhaps not of that high national character to justify it; but it comes within the rule laid down by the House and by the Senate also to make appropriations for rivers within the States. The Osage River is more important than two-thirds of the rivers for which appropriations were made yesterday. It has a length of from one hundred and fifty to two hundred miles. It passes through a very rich country. An appropriation of $25,000 will enable the river to be cleared of snags and other impediments to navigation and be productive of an infinity of good.

I hope the amendment will not be adopted, and that the appropriation as it came from the House will be sustained.

Mr. WINDOM. This appropriation stands upon a little different principle from that which has been heretofore decided by the Senate. I therefore ask that the question be settled by the yeas and nays. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STEVENSON, (when Mr. MCCREERY'S name was called.) I desire to state that my colleague was called home by illness in his family.

The roll-call was concluded; and the result announced—yeas 16, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Conkling, Dawes, Hamlin, Kernan, McMillan, Morrill, Randolph, Saulsbury, Sherman, Wallace, West, Windom, and Wright—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Barnum, Bogy, Bruce, Caperton, Christiancy, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamilton, Harvey, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Kelly, McDonald, Maxey, Mitchell, Norwood, Paddock, Patterson, Robertson, Stevenson, and Withers—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Booth, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Eaton, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Hitchcock, Howe, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, Key, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Morton, Oglesby, Ransom, Sargent, Sharon, Spencer, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Whyte—30.

So the amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 418, to increase the appropriation "for the improvement of the Illinois River, Illinois," from $40,000 to $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 422, after the words "for the improvement of the Upper Mississippi River," to strike out "$20,000" and insert "$30,000;" and to add after the word "dollars," in the same line, the words:

And $7,000 thereof may be applied in constructing the necessary machinery used in Captain Edward Bell's process for building wing-dams and applying said process in the improvement of said river.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the necessity for the Captain Edward Bell's part of the amendment?

Mr. WINDOM. I will say in explanation that it was inserted on my motion and upon the very urgent request of the Chamber of Commerce of Saint Paul, who have seen the machine tested and its operation in the river. It has proved a great success at La Crosse, and they are very desirous, being exceedingly interested in the economical improvement of the river, that it should be tried. That is all there is of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The question I want to have answered is, why, if it is a good method of doing this work, it does not fall within the general discretion of the Department?

Mr. WINDOM. I presume it does. The amendment does not compel them to use the machine; it is merely suggestive if they should like to have it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My reason for the inquiry was that the last instance of the kind that I have known was in an appropriation bill where we authorized somebody to apply somebody's process for a pneumatic tube from the Capitol to the Printing Office, and I believe $50,000 was expended, was it not?

Mr. ANTHONY. Twenty thousand dollars. It was all thrown away.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We expended something of the kind. That little authority to apply the process resulted in the absolute squandering of $20,000 or $30,000, and that of course led me to fear that this would be construed as a command, although it does not read so, any more than did the authority in the other bill. If this matter is within the general authority of the Department, if it is agreeable to the Senator, I wish he would consent to strike out this clause.

Mr. WINDOM. I think it is within the general authority of the Department to use the machine, but the people at Saint Paul and the chamber of commerce there and also at La Crosse, where this machine has been tested, have been very anxious that it should be tried here. They believe that with $30,000 for the use of this machine an improvement can be made greater than double that sum without it; and as it will make no change in the law on that subject, as is suggested, I should like to have it stay in the bill. If the Engineer Department are satisfied it ought not to be done they will not do it; but I think we can convince them that it ought to be done.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I of course shall not interfere with my friend's wishes, but, to carry out without any possible doubt his meaning, I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "may," in line 423, the words "in the discretion of the Secretary of War." I believe all this is under his charge.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection to that amendment, for if we cannot convince the Department that it ought to be done we do not want to do it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to this amendment to the amendment?

Mr. WINDOM. There is no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be considered as agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to offer an amendment to come in after "dollars," in line 430.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations are to be acted upon first according to the practice of the Senate.

Mr. PADDOCK. Very well.

Mr. OGLESBY. After the amendments proposed by the committee shall be gone through with, I understand the text of the bill will be open to amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The text of the bill will then be open to amendment in committee.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 427, to increase the appropriation "for the improvement of Rock Island Rapids, Mississippi River," from $20,000 to $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert, as lines 438 and 439, the following:

For removal of a bar in the Mississippi River opposite Dubuque, Iowa, $18,000

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 442, 443, and 444, in the following words:

For examination and surveys of rivers and harbors, and for incidental repairs of harbors, for which there is no special appropriation, $50,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say in relation to this amendment that we strike out the appropriation here and insert it in another place.

Mr. WITHERS. It is a mere transposition.

Mr. ALLISON. It is a mere transposition of the clause; that is all.

Mr. WEST. We reserve it for the conclusion of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 466, to increase from $15,000 to $24,000 the appropriation "to ascertain in current and next fiscal years, as required by act of March 3, 1875, the depth of water and width of channel secured and maintained, from time to time, by James B. Eads at South Pass of the Mississippi River, and to enable the Secretary of War to report during the construction of the work the payments made from time to time and the probable times of other payments, and to report during the construction of the work all important facts relating to the progress of the same, materials used, and the character and permanency with which the said jettee and auxiliary works are being constructed."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 468, to increase the appropriation "for the construction of a canal around the Cascades of the Columbia River, in the State of Oregon," from $50,000 to $100,000.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment proposed by the committee. It does not increase the appropriation, but simply provides for giving the right of way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. EDMUNDS in the chair.) The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed after line 469 to insert:

Of which amount the Secretary of War is authorized to expend so much as, in his judgment, may be necessary and proper to secure title and right of way for canal and locks, not exceeding the sum of $10,000; and whenever in the prosecution of the said work it shall become necessary to obtain the right of way over any lands for the said canal and locks the Secretary of War shall take possession of and use the said lands, after having purchased the same, or in case the said lands cannot be purchased for a reasonable price, then after having paid for the same or secured the value thereof, which value may be ascertained in the mode provided by the laws of Oregon for the condemnation of lands for public uses in that State. The Department of Justice shall represent the interests of the United States in any legal proceedings under this act to obtain the right of way for the said canal.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not quite understand how this amendment appropriates the sum of $10,000.

Mr. MITCHELL. It does not increase the appropriation. It simply provides that so much of the appropriation reported by the committee may be employed for the purpose stated.

Mr. ALLISON. Of this sum?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir. There is no question about it. It does not increase the appropriation a dollar.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 470 and 471, in the following words:

For the improvement of the harbor at Racine, Wisconsin, $9,000.

Mr. HOWE. It will be noticed that this is an amendment in the wrong direction. This reduces the aggregate of that appropriation. I understand that this amendment was determined upon by the committee upon the supposition that it was the opinion of the Engineer Corps that no further appropriations were required at that point. Subsequent to the annual report it seems the engineer in charge there has made another examination, and has transmitted to the General-in-Chief a letter which I will ask the Clerk to read. It is very brief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) The Secretary will report the letter.

Mr. ALLISON. I make no objection to disagreeing to the amendment of the committee, in view of the action of the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator in charge of the bill says he has no objection to retaining this clause. I do not care, then, to have the letter read.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was at the end of lines 473 and 474 to strike out the words "to be expended between Red-fish Bar and Morgan's Point;" so as to make the clause read:

For the continuing of the work on the ship-channel in Galveston Bay, $100,000.

Mr. MAXEY. The amendment proposed by the committee does not at all touch the appropriation as embodied in the House bill, but strikes out the point of expenditure, between Red-fish Bar and Morgan's Point. I stated to the Senator in charge of the bill, yesterday, that there is a difference of opinion or a controversy, if you please, between the commercial interests centered at Galveston and those centered at Houston as to the route that the channel through Galveston Bay should take to the points above Red-fish Bar. One of those places is represented in the lower House by one Representative and the other by another. This expression as it appears in the House bill was inserted upon a compromise between those two Representatives. It is inserted by agreement, and neither myself nor my colleague objects to the bill as it came from the House in this respect. It is an agreed matter on the part of all who have an interest in it, and I ask that the amendment be not concurred in and that the words proposed to be stricken out be restored.

Mr. ALLISON. The committee made inquiry at the Engineer Office with reference to this appropriation, and found, as the Senator from Texas has said, that there is a very great controversy going on there, locally, as to the method that should be adopted in making this improvement in Galveston Bay, and that the engineers have not absolutely determined that question for themselves. I have no doubt that our Texas friends have arranged so as to have this appropriation expended agreeably to themselves, but at the same time it seems to me it would be better to leave so large an expenditure to the discretion of the engineer in charge as to the point where the money shall be expended.

Mr. MAXEY. I will reply to what the Senator has said. I shortened what I had to say a moment ago as much as possible, for I do not want to take up time. I, personally, know all about this controversy. It was at my instance settled among the Texan delegation in the manner which I have stated. The Committee on Appropriations has made the very point that I suggested to the Representatives in the lower House and should satisfy all parties, that is to say, to let the Chief Engineer make a survey, and that survey will settle it; and the very survey which we asked for you have incorporated in this bill. That would settle the trouble.

Mr. ALLISON. I know that was an additional reason.

Mr. MAXEY. I will say in addition, that every dollar of this hundred thousand dollars ought to be appropriated between Red-fish Bar and Morgan's Point. It will not interfere with anybody, and by the time the survey can be made and the work begun there this controversy will be officially settled by the Chief Engineer, and we shall have no further trouble. As it is agreeable to everybody, I trust the amendment of the committee will not be insisted upon.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 476, to increase the appropriation "for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River" from $100,000 to $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 2, after line 2, to insert:

Three Forks of Kentucky River, to Savannah, Georgia, via Cumberland Gap.

Mr. ALLISON. Unless some Senator asks for a specific vote on these various amendments to section 2 the vote may be taken upon all. I will say that the committee adopted the rule of inserting all the surveys that they could find, as that seemed to be the rule adopted by the House. We have added such surveys as we found among the papers in the committee-room, and then at the end of the bill we inserted an amendment with reference to the method of conducting these surveys. I call the attention of the Senate to line 163 of section 2. Unless some Senator asks for a specific vote on these surveys, I ask that they be considered as agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN. I should like to inquire about a clause on page 27. I understand the Senator asked to have all the amendments included in section 2 voted on at one time?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KERNAN. The clause to which I call attention, page 27, line 149, reads in this wise:

The Missouri River, from the town of Saint Charles, to the mouth of said Missouri River, with the view to protect the owners of land on the banks of said river, in Saint Charles County, Missouri, against the deflection and abrasion of the current of said river by reason of the erection of the Saint Charles bridge.

I should like to know upon what principle we are going into surveys to protect private owners in this way?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think I can state any principle very distinctly upon which that is to be authorized.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator refer to the date of the act which authorized the building of that bridge across the river?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not remember the date of it; but I think it was passed in 1866.

Mr. KERNAN. Who built the bridge?

Mr. ALLISON. The bridge was built by a railroad company.

Mr. KERNAN. A private corporation?

Mr. ALLISON. A private corporation, and in the State of Missouri. When we are surveying nearly every river and bridge we can find, I do not think there can be any objection to surveying that point.

Mr. KERNAN. I can hardly conceive where we shall stop if we make appropriations to expend money to protect the owners of land along rivers whose lands by the railroads or somebody else have been injured by building bridges over the stream.

Mr. ALLISON. This is a House provision, I will state to the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What if it is?

Mr. KERNAN. I cannot help that. It seems to me this is not a provision that we ought to pass. A bill passed with such provisions as this has no sort of regard for the public welfare. It is not simply giving money to relieve individuals from the wash of a stream caused by nature, but, what is worse, caused by some company building a bridge. If there is any wrong done them, the company is liable. This clause has not the slightest relation to anything that I conceive of that this Government has a right to do.

Mr. EDMUNDS. At what town is the bridge?

Mr. ALLISON. Saint Charles.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is strange I cannot find the act authorizing the bridge.

Mr. KERNAN. If we go on in this way, to say nothing of some other things in this bill, we may bid adieu to the hope of ever paying our debts or ever reducing taxation. It seems we are paying the public money out without the slightest regard to the doctrines which have been held by all parties in times past as to the mode of applying the public funds. I had supposed that it was well settled that we would only apply the public moneys to works which are of national importance; not to clear out streams and blow up rocks, which we do ourselves in the State of New York by private subscription and sometimes by taxing adjacent land. Our appropriations are not to be applied to a work that cannot be said to be a national one. By the tail-end of this provision we are going to relieve some individuals who have got flooded in consequence of building a railroad bridge over a stream. I trust the amendments making surveys will not be agreed to in gross.

Mr. ALLISON. The clause to which the Senator refers is not an amendment, but a part of the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We shall have to strike it out by and by.

Mr. KERNAN. Can it be done now?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object to striking it out.

Mr. BOGY. Before that motion is made I wish to say that I think the wording of this section may not be very fortunate; yet I do not think it possible for any one to conceive that the bank of any river can be worn away without affecting individuals or the Government of the United States. This is the substance of this matter: A bridge has been built over the Missouri River, which is one of the large streams of this country. No matter by whom the bridge was built, it is there as a fact, and the navigation of the river is thereby afffected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question? Can he tell us the date of the act when Congress authorized this bridge to be built across the Missouri River?

Mr. BOGY. I am not able to say, but it must have been from six to eight years ago. The bridge, of course, was built by a private company under a law of Congress authorizing the Missouri River to be bridged. The bridge is a fact, and the effect upon the navigation of that river has been very great. It has caused an immense amount of abrasion or erosion of the banks below that bridge. Of course, if the banks are eroded individuals are affected; and that need not to have been expressed in the words of the act.

The object of this clause is to make a survey and ascertain to what extent the building of that bridge has affected the navigation of that river below the bridge. I do not commend the words of the clause; I do not think they are very fortunate; but anybody who will look at it with any care will see that the effect of building that bridge, and putting piers in the channel of the Missouri River, has been to create currents and counter-currents which may dam the width of the river below to such an extent as will make the river nearly impassable; that is the truth. The intention is not to benefit the owners although the effect of all improvements, no matter where, must necessarily be to benefit some owners. The object of this clause is not to give any appropriation for the work, but by a mere survey to ascertain the effect the building of that bridge has had upon the navigation of the Missouri River below that bridge. I repeat, it is of no consequence by whom the bridge was built. It was built under an act of Congress, by authority of Congress, and it is there an impediment to navigation. I hope my friend from New York will not move to strike out this particular clause because it is in my State.

Mr. INGALLS. Unless the object of this survey is to ascertain what damage has been inflicted upon certain riparian proprietors, with the purpose further of making an appropriation to indemnify them against any loss they may have suffered, then the provision of the bill is entirely nugatory and trifling; because it certainly cannot be supposed that Congress is going to authorize a survey for the purpose of indulging in an idle curiosity to ascertain whether these men have or have not suffered by the erection of this bridge, and to what extent they have suffered loss.

The town of Saint Charles is about twenty miles above the mouth of the Missouri River. The bridge erected at that point is one of the largest upon this continent. I think with its approaches it is more than a mile and a quarter long. It was constructed by a railroad corporation and is now operated by the North Missouri Railroad Company. If the principle is to be adopted of holding the United States Government liable for the losses that riparian proprietors may suffer by reason of the construction of bridges over navigable streams by private corporations, it is difficult to say where the raids upon the Treasury will end. There is a bridge across the Missouri at Saint Louis. This one at Saint Charles is the next. Above that the stream is bridged at Boonville and, I believe, also at Lexington.

Mr. COCKRELL. No.

Mr. INGALLS. It is to be bridged at Lexington, then.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not yet.

Mr. INGALLS. A few miles above that point several railroad corporations have a common bridge across the Missouri River at Kansas City. Forty miles above that point the Missouri River is bridged at Leavenworth. Twenty-five miles above that point it is bridged at Atchison. Twenty-five miles above that point it is bridged at Saint Joseph. There is a ponton-bridge authorized at Nebraska City. The last bridge, I believe, erected is at Omaha, or between Omaha and Council Bluffs, operated by the Union Pacific Railroad. It is certain that every one of these structures has resulted in some damage either to the navigation of the stream or to the land owned by the persons upon its banks. If the principle is to be adopted that the United States Government is to be held liable for every loss that may ensue by reason of the construction of bridges over that river, then it is certainly a matter of very grave importance to the Treasury of the United States. The object must be what the section itself contemplates, because it is not correct, as the Senator from Missouri says, that that river is now of any great value for the purpose of commerce or navigation. The utility of that river for navigation has long since ceased. There is a line of railroads upon either bank of the river, running from Saint Louis to the city of Omaha upon the west side and to Sioux City and perhaps above that upon the eastern bank. It is impossible for water transportation to compete with transportation by rail. Therefore below these points, as I said, the Missouri River is no longer useful for navigation. The object, then, of this clause between lines 149 and 154 of section 2 must be precisely what the language implies, and that is to ascertain what damage private individuals have sustained by reason of the construction of a bridge by a private corporation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to considering all the amendments making surveys together?

Mr. BOGY. I make a point of order. I presume that this whole discussion is out of order.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the consideration of the clause in regard to the Missouri River be postponed until the committee shall have finished its amendments.

Mr. KERNAN. I assent to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The suggestion made by the Senator having the bill in charge to consider all the amendments of the committee relating to surveys together. Is there any objection to that proposition?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont objects. The Clerk will report the pending amendment, being the first one relating to surveys.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert after line 3 of section 2 the words:

Three Forks of Kentucky River, to Savannah, Georgia, via Cumberland Gap.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear that explained. We all know what a survey means. It means money.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say with reference to these amendments providing for surveys that the committee did not make a careful examination into the propriety of the surveys. They found a large number of surveys in the bill coming from the House and a larger number of amendments for surveys sent to the committee by Senators. Inasmuch as the appropriations for surveys, as the bill came to us from the House, provided for $50,000, at the end of the bill we inserted that sum, with a provision that the Secretary of War should make an estimate of the cost of all these surveys and should only survey such rivers as are most important to commerce. If the Senator objects to any one of these amendments I will vote with him to strike it out. The committee had not time to go through a detailed examination of this bill to study the geography of this country sufficiently to ascertain whether the surveys sent to us from the House were such as should be made or not. It was perfectly evident, however, that the large number of surveys provided for could not be made with an appropriation of $50,000. Therefore the committee undertook to distribute the appropriations rather than make a critical and careful examination of the several rivers and harbors proposed to be surveyed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If there is any value in human experience, it shows that a provision for surveying a river is a provision for the appropriation of money. It is only the first step, and that is the one that costs, as the proverb has it, toward the taking of money from the Treasury. In addition to that, when you come to the last page of the bill it recites:

> And the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated for such examinations and surveys and for incidental repairs of harbors for which there is no especial appropriation provided for by law.

That covers all these amendments of the committee and a good many of the provisions of the House bill. That being the state of the case, it is proposed this year to go into new surveys and to take $50,000 from the pockets of the tax-payers for new surveys. The country has got along a hundred years now, and where is the harm of saving this $50,000 this year and letting these new works of survey, which do cost money and involve the expenditure of a great deal more, wait until the country is in a more prosperous condition?

We have heard in the newspapers and from the stump and in both Houses of Congress and everywhere else a great cry that has considerable foundation for it, that the finances of the Government are not in a particularly wholesome condition; that we cannot impose any more taxes, and that we ought not to do it; but that, in order to bring ourselves within our income, we must retrench, we must diminish salaries, we must diminish employés; but when it comes to a proposition to go roaming about somewhere to find a new opportunity for the expenditure of public money, then all our cry about reform and retrenchment and opposition to taxation suddenly dies out. This is a distinct proposition when you put it altogether—I know nothing about this particular case of course—to take $50,000 from the Treasury now for the mere purpose of making fresh explorations to find some river somewhere that you can appropriate money for hereafter to improve the commercial interests of the country. If there ever was a time when we are entitled to stop and to wait until we have money and have prosperity, it appears to me that an item of this character is the one to begin upon.

Mr. ALLISON. May I suggest to the Senator that this provision also requires the Engineer Bureau to repair such harbors as are not specifically provided for in the bill, so that the whole sum of $50,000 may be expended without surveying a single one of these rivers and harbors?

Mr. EDMUNDS. So it may; but will the Senator point out a harbor that we have not made any provision for where there is any urgent necessity for expending money this year? If he can, then it is left to the discretion of the Secretary of War to take $49,000 to hunt up some new river to improve, and put $1,000 upon the reparation of some harbor not now good. Mr. President, that is, to use a common expression, "a little too thin."

Mr. ALLISON. I know of no such harbor now; but we heard the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] yesterday glowingly describe a great storm that passed over that State, a cyclone, requiring a great expenditure of money; and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] made it a special reason for an appropriation for the Big Sandy River that a great storm had occurred since the reports; and probably another storm may occur in the Big Sandy or Louisa Fork or on Lake Champlain or somewhere, making it necessary to expend a thousand or two thousand dollars to keep a harbor in repair. Therefore this fund is provided for that purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has exhausted his time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend this amendment by striking out "Three Forks."

It is perfectly true that there may an occasion arise when some sudden calamity, a cyclone will strike a harbor and make it dry land and that it will be necessary for the Secretary of War to dig it out forthwith in order to save the nation; and perhaps we ought to provide a contingent fund for that purpose; but is it necessary, in order to prevent a cyclone and save a harbor, that we should survey the Three Forks of the Kentucky River?

Mr. ALLISON. The Senators from Kentucky think so, and we inserted it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I see; it is very logical indeed. In order to save the existing harbors and have money to protect them in case a sudden catastrophe should fall on any of them, we are to appropriate $50,000 that may be expended in searching for some river that can have a harbor, and when we do find it we may possibly have a storm that will fill it up, and in that case it will be desirable to have the money. That is reform and retrenchment. Very good. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall vote for the amendments of the committee. They do not increase the amount appropriated for surveys, but only add to the objects which the engineers may examine. If they increased the expense of the bill at all I should be inclined to vote against the amendments of the committee; but they do not increase the expense. They only add other items of survey so that the engineers may have a greater variety of rivers and creeks to examine, and they will determine where the $50,000 shall be expended, if it is not sufficient to cover all the objects named.

Mr. WITHERS. My idea has always been that the policy of the Government has been to extend the improvement of the rivers and harbors of this country so as to increase the facilities for securing access to market from different localities and to secure the protection of vessels engaged in commerce; and as it is in the nature of things impossible that this work can be accomplished in one, or two, or three, or five years, but must of necessity be progressive, I think the committee did exactly right in reporting in favor of these projected surveys.

So far as my own section of country is concerned, very few surveys have been made of the principal rivers. It is still more strongly the case in regard to sections farther south. The northern portions of the Union have been very generally examined and surveyed and reported upon and improved. It seems to me nothing but right and proper that this system of surveys should be continued, and that it should be applied to all streams and waters of any importance in order to ascertain whether the expenditure of a certain amount of money by the Government in improving these rivers could be worthily expended, and that the country would be repaid for it in the increase of its material wealth.

The policy adopted by the committee in reporting all these amendments was, in the opinion of the committee, in the interest of economy. It was manifestly impossible for the sum of $50,000 to secure all the surveys which are reported by the committee; and the object of the committee consequently was to leave it to the discretion of the Secretary of War and Engineer Bureau to spend that money at such localities as, in their opinion, would be most conducive to the public interest. I think, therefore, that I may well claim that this bill as reported by the committee is in the interest of economy in that direction rather than to vote a specific sum for every survey asked, the aggregate of which would be very much greater, judging from the disposition and views of the Senate as indicated by the votes which have been heretofore taken, than the amount which is appropriated by the bill before us.

Mr. SHERMAN. One observation has occurred to me in regard to this matter, and that is that when these reports are made by the engineers, who are supposed to be very skillful, graduates of West Point, educated at the expense of the Government, we do not pay much attention to their reports. Not a single opinion read from the engineers since this bill has been before the Senate has been regarded in the slightest degree.

Mr. WITHERS. Yes, I got the Mattapony in on the report of the engineers.

Mr. SHERMAN. In the case of the New River a report of an engineer was read opposed to the improvement, and I had some recollection of seeing the New River rushing through a mountain gap where all the power of man could not have prevented its pursuing the course marked out by nature, and yet upon the observations of the honorable Senator from Virginia a considerable sum—I do not know how much—was appropriated for the commencement of the improvement of the New River against the opinion of the engineer.

Mr. WITHERS. I beg the Senator's pardon, but I trust he will allow an interruption which I know his courtesy will permit.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WITHERS. The opinion of the engineer which was quoted here did not at all apply to the portion of New River for which I asked the appropriation, nor did the portion of the river which was surveyed so critically by my friend from Ohio come within the category of the appropriation which I supported.

Mr. SHERMAN. In other words, the engineer did not find the place where the New River could be made navigable. That was his misfortune. He ought to have known better; he ought to have examined the matter more carefully; and as an engineer trained for that particular business he showed his incompetence. Therefore I do not see any use in continuing the employment of a class of engineers whose reports we do not regard when they are made to us.

A more striking case is the case from New Jersey, where the board of engineers certified that a certain channel was amply sufficient and the water deep enough, and yet the Senator from New Jersey upon the statement of somebody whom he did not name induced us to overrule the opinion of the engineer and appropriate a considerable sum of money to open up a channel between New Jersey and Staten Island. I therefore do not see any object in paying $50,000 for the reports of engineers when we can overrule them so easily without their costing so much as that.

Mr. HAMILTON. I would inquire of the Senator from Iowa if this amendment means that the engineers must commence at the Three Forks of Kentucky River and survey by the Cumberland Gap to Savannah, Georgia? That is the way it reads.

Mr. ALLISON. If they can find the Three Forks of the Kentucky River, I suppose they will begin with one of them, and then go on via Cumberland Gap to Savannah, Georgia, and if they can reach that point, they will have surveyed the region proposed to be surveyed here. This amendment was inserted at the request of some Senator, or taken from some amendment proposed in the Senate, and was not examined as to its phraseology by the committee.

Mr. HAMILTON. It is evidently a jumble. There can be no object in such a survey. It goes in a direction where no stream runs at all.

Mr. WITHERS. I will state without any specific knowledge on the subject that the impression on my mind is that one of the great connecting interior water-lines recommended by the Select Committee on Transportation was through the State of Georgia, making a connection between the Tennessee River and the Coosa River by the way of the Etowah, in order to make a water connection from the Northwest to the South; and the object of this survey, I take it, is to include the Cumberland River and its tributary, the Kentucky, in this survey. I do not know what else it is, because I say frankly the committee did not examine critically all these proposed amendments for surveys which were suggested, but presumed they would all be left better to the discretion of the Secretary of War and the Engineer Bureau to select such as in their opinion would be most important to expend the money appropriated upon.

Mr. DAVIS. After diligent inquiry from members from Kentucky and persons who ought to be familiar with this locality, I am told that they know no such river. One gentleman says it is five hundred miles from the locality where my colleague of the committee thinks it may be.

Mr. WITHERS. I know nothing about it personally.

Mr. SPENCER. I would suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that there must be some mistake about this amendment. It could not have been in earnest. You cannot connect any watercourses as indicated there.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is to make water-courses.

Mr. DAVIS. The object of my rising was to move that the Senate non-concur in this amendment. It is a misprint or something else.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment can be rejected. The question is on the amendment to insert lines 4 and 5 in section 2.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert as line 6 of section 2:

Cumberland River, above Cumberland Falls, Kentucky.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was in line 7 of section 2, between the words "Virginia" and "Danville," to strike out the word "to" and insert "via;" and in line 8 to insert:

To Danbury, North Carolina; and Stanton River, from Roanoke, Virginia, to Brookneal, Virginia;

So as to make the clause read:

Dan River, from Clarksville, Virginia, via Danville, Virginia, to Danbury, North Carolina; and Stanton River, from Roanoke, Virginia, to Brookneal, Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as lines 14, 15, 16, and 17 of section 2:

Etowah River, in Georgia, from Cooper's Iron Works to Canton; and the south branch of said river, known as Little River, from its junction with the Etowah above Cooper's Iron Works to the mouth of Cooper's Sandy Creek.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 47 of section 2, to strike out the word "Head" before "Haven Creek" and insert "Tread;" so as to make the clause read:

Tread Haven Creek, at or near Easton Point, Talbot County, Maryland.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as lines 49, 50, 51, 52, and 53:

Slaughter Creek, near the mouth of Little Choptank River, Maryland.
Brown's Creek and Southeast Creek, Maryland.
Corsica Creek, Maryland.
Harbor at Leonardstown, Maryland.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was to insert as lines 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, and 60:

Duck Creek, from its mouth to Smyrna Landing, Delaware.
Dover River, or Saint Jones's Creek, Delaware.
Murderkill Creek, Delaware.
Mispillion Creek, Delaware.
Brandywine River, Delaware.
Broad Creek, emptying in Nanticoke River, from its mouth to the town of Laurel, in the State of Delaware.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say that these are short creeks or rivers running up from the Delaware Bay, all except the last one, to important towns in my State, upon which there is considerable commerce. They are very short; for instance, Duck Creek is only about seven miles from the town of Smyrna to the mouth of Delaware Bay. There is considerable commerce upon it, and at one time Smyrna was one of our principal places of business in the State. Dover River runs from my own town to Delaware Bay; is a river of about fifteen miles in length, upon which there is considerable commerce and where several vessels run. Murderkill Creek runs from the town of Frederica to the Delaware Bay, and is about seven miles. Mispillion Creek runs from Milford to the Delaware Bay, and is about seven miles long; and at that point I will say there is a ship-yard at which there are a number of vessels built, sometimes for New England trade, and this is a very important point. The Brandywine is near the city of Wilmington. My colleague is not present, but it is a matter in which the people of his city feel some interest. Broad Creek is in the lower part of the State. I have had a letter from a gentleman in that place saying that there are twenty vessels plying on that creek. It is a short creek of some fifteen miles, and they desire to have a survey, so that some obstructions may be removed.

I referred these amendments to the committee, and they have been adopted in the committee. I hope the Senate will allow them to remain in the bill.

The question being put on the amendment, there were—ayes 9, noes 16; no quorum voting.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Delaware has explained the importance of these rivers and creeks, and I think there ought to be no objection to having them surveyed.

Several SENATORS. Let us vote again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will submit the question again to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It appears that there is not a quorum. I ask the Chair to count the Senate and see whether there is a quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (after counting the Senate.) There are forty Senators present. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say that I have no personal interest in the matter, and no very special wish to gratify. I believe, however, these are as important as many other points named in this section of the bill. I am willing to strike out the whole section, but if you put in everybody else's amendment I see no reason why amendments for my State should not be concurred in. I am perfectly willing to strike out the entire section, and I say furthermore, that I am perfectly willing to vote this whole bill down, though it has some appropriations for Delaware, but I believe there are many unwise appropriations of money in this bill. I believe it is contrary to the intent and spirit of our fathers in reference to public improvements; and if you bring this question to a test vote, I think I shall vote against the whole bill, but I do not see why these items should not be voted for Delaware.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment inserting the items as to Delaware in the second section.

The amendment was agreed to—ayes 27, noes not counted.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert as lines 65, 66, and 67 of section 2:

McKenzie River, Oregon, with a view of ascertaining the most practicable steamboat channel from the mouth of said river to the mouth of Mohawk River at Yarnels.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as lines 70 and 71 of section 2:

Songo River, and the channel leading from Long Lake to Sebago Lake, Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as lines 90, 91, 92, 93, and 94 of section 2:

A survey of that portion of the Monongahela and Allegheny Rivers lying within and along the boundaries of the city of Pittsburgh, which portion of said rivers is hereby placed under the direction of the engineer in charge of the Ohio River.

Mr. HAMLIN. I should like a little information in relation to this matter before I vote. I propose to use all alike. According to my recollection the State of Pennsylvania has made very extensive improvements by locks and dams on that river. I passed over it some years ago and that is my recollection. Now what I want to know is if the design of this clause is to transfer the State works to the Government?

Mr. WALLACE. There is no such intention. The Senator from Maine is right in the fact that the Monongahela has been improved by locks and dams and slackwater navigation; but this amendment does not reach to that part of the Monongahela. This is intended simply to give a police power for navigation rights over the two rivers in front of the city of Pittsburgh, as I understand it. The engineer in charge of the Ohio is there, and there is a necessity for allowing him to have control over the fronts of the rivers on the city which form the Ohio at their junction. It comes from the members representing Pittsburgh and is desired by them.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand that there is a large river front on the two rivers at Pittsburgh, and that coal-barges coming down those rivers when the water is low are tied up at different places along the wharves and along the banks, and in some cases very much to the interference of regular commerce. It has been desired, as explained to me, that the wharves and banks of the rivers should be put under control of the Government so as to make some general regulation and serve commerce as well as the coal-boats. That was the object of the clause.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, or rather the gentleman who has this bill in charge, where he gets the authority to put the shore of the Allegheny and the Monongahela Rivers in the city of Pittsburgh under the charge and direction of the engineer. What become of the rights of the State of Pennsylvania to exercise jurisdiction over that shore?

Mr. ALLISON. I think I will turn that question over to my friend, the Senator from Pennsylvania, who has charge of this amendment.

Mr. WALLACE. The power of the engineer in charge of the Ohio River is to be extended over the portions of the rivers Monongahela and Allegheny that lie around the city of Pittsburgh. Control is not taken away from the State further than is necessary to regulate the exercise of navigation and the passage of commerce there.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If that is good democratic State-rights doctrine, I am for it. But this amendment says that these rivers at their junction are put under the direction of the engineer in charge, and if "direction" is not complete and absolute control, if he cannot say to this boat "go" and to the other "come," or to this officer of the State "go" and to the other "come" or certainly "go," then I do not understand the use of language. If this provision had said that these improvements there were put under his direction it would be one thing, but to put those two rivers into the absolute control and direction of the engineer who happens to be in charge, it appears to me is to set up a kind of king there.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think the power given by this provision of the bill will allow the exercise of any such autocratic authority as the Senator supposes. No interference, it seems to me, need be feared with the right of the State. It would simply be under the power to regulate commerce, taking care that steamboat navigation was not interfered with. I should be the last person to agree with any interference by the United States with rights of individual property or with State authority; but I do not think that can be reasonably inferred from the use of these words.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert as lines 95, 96, 97, 98, and 99 of section 2:

For continuing survey of the Youghiogheny River, to continue the slackwater navigation up said river to the headwaters at the foot of the Alleghany Mountains, thence by canal to Cumberland, intersecting there the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I want to make another inquiry, and I am not doing it for the purpose of fun, but I wish seriously to be informed. This river, if I am correct in my supposition, the name of which I cannot pronounce, is wholly within the jurisdiction of the State of Pennsylvania. It does not lie between two States, does it?

Mr. WALLACE. It does not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And here you propose to continue slackwater navigation "up said river to the headwaters at the foot of the Alleghany Mountains." That is to say, the river naturally is not a navigable stream in the public and constitutional sense. Now I wish to know whether Congress has any authority to pick up any brook it chooses in the State of Pennsylvania or in the State of Vermont and call it slackwater navigation, and oust the State authorities from their control over the very same subject. I am not speaking of private property; but suppose the State of Pennsylvania has already provided or chooses to provide for arranging that river so that logs may be floated down it or otherwise, or to say that a dam shall be here and shall not be in another place, and Congress undertakes out of its own supreme power to control commerce to say, "We will take that brook from the State of Pennsylvania and have it ourselves so far as any use of it is concerned, and we will direct by our supreme power where dams shall be put and where they shall not be put;" can it be possible that we have any authority to do a thing of that kind?

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, in justice to myself and to those by whom this clause was put in the bill, it is proper to state that this proposition comes from the engineers in charge, and is to continue surveys already commenced. I agree fully with the Senator from Vermont as to the constitutional and legal doctrine involved in this subject. We have no legal right to appropriate money as proposed to be appropriated here, and I will go with him to the fullest extent upon that theory and doctrine. But this is simply to continue surveys already commenced, and at request of the member of the House the committee put in this item, although it was considered as one of those least necessary. I am entirely content that the Senate may do with this proposition just what it pleases.

Mr. ALLISON. In furtherance of what is said by the Senator from Pennsylvania, I will say to the Senator from Vermont that I think Pennsylvania will find no fault with this amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I dare say; but that is not the point.

Mr. ALLISON. As far as the Monongahela is concerned, the State of Pennsylvania has already improved that river very largely. I think she has built, through a company chartered for the purpose, six or seven locks and dams, whereupon the United States has taken hold of that same improvement, and has now built, I think, two. Last year we appropriated a considerable sum, and in this bill there is found an appropriation of $25,000 to begin a new lock and dam on the Monongahela River, which is wholly in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That does not prove that it is constitutional.

Mr. ALLISON. I was merely explaining that probably there would be no difficulty from the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to make an inquiry of the Senator from Pennsylvania as to what is the intent and meaning of the latter part of this amendment:

Thence by canal to Cumberland, intersecting there the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.

Does that mean that after you have found the headwaters of this stream you are then to construct a canal from there to the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal?

Mr. ALLISON. That is the idea.

Mr. WALLACE. I understand that to have been the original purpose of this survey, with which I had nothing to do. It originated, I believe, in 1874.

Mr. HAMLIN. I supposed that was the meaning, but it seemed a little obscure.

Mr. DAVIS. This is a continuation of a survey that has been in progress for three years. It was originally intended, and is now by those who favor it, to ascertain the practicability of connecting the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal that starts at Georgetown, and is now finished as far as Cumberland, with Pittsburgh. The river Youghiogheny and the river running from this side of the mountain, which is Savage River, have been surveyed roughly. The intention of this additional survey is to allow the engineers, who are now at work, as I understand, if upon the judgment of the Secretary of War he can do it out of the $50,000, to continue that survey at least long enough to get a report. There is no money appropriated for it specially.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the Senator from West Virginia if he supposes that is within the constitutional authority of Congress?

Mr. DAVIS. As much so as many others.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But that does not answer the question. Will the Senator tell me, if he is willing, whether the thing in itself is within our constitutional power according to his view?

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from West Virginia would prefer not going into that argument now.

Mr. SAULSBURY. This is certainly objectionable, and is liable to the objection suggested by the Senator from Vermont, as an attempt on the part of Congress to make a survey looking to the appropriation of money for an artificial highway, which I do not believe we have any constitutional power to do. I shall therefore vote against the amendment. While I have stood by the committee usually, I shall vote against this amendment.

Mr. WHYTE. If this was a new proposition I should say that the Senate ought to vote it down; but on the 23d of June, 1874, Congress ordered these surveys to be made, and they are not yet completed. This amendment is simply to complete the surveys which by the act of June 23, 1874, Congress authorized, and about which we have a report made by Major Merrill, showing the requirement of an additional small appropriation to complete the work already begun. This is a proposed survey to see whether such a continuation can be practicable of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, intended to connect the waters of the Ohio with the waters of the Chesapeake.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert as lines 114, 115, 116, and 117:

A survey to ascertain the practicability and cost of a water-route from head of tide-water on the Patapsco River, Maryland, to head of tide-water on the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River, near the town of Bladensburgh, Maryland.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask my friend from Maryland, for whose opinions on constitutional law I have a very great respect, whether he believes that this provision for a survey for a canal from the headwaters of the Patapsco to the headwaters of the Eastern Branch of the Potomac, wholly within the State of Maryland, is within the constitutional power of Congress?

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, the United States is a stockholder in this company, holding two millions and a half out of eight millions of stock; and I do think that if the United States can open up any route which will yield a revenue to the people of the United States on the money invested in this canal it is a legitimate and proper work, and is an exception to the general rule, with which I agree, as stated by the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as lines 118, 119, and 120 of section 2:

To ascertain the practicability and cost of cutting a deep channel from the lower anchorage of the bay of Mobile to the city of Mobile, Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as lines 121 and 122 of section 2:

A survey to ascertain the cost and practicability of removing the obstructions in Withlacoochee River, Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as lines 123, 124, 125, 126, and 127 of section 2:

An examination and survey to ascertain the cost and practicability of removing the obstructions at the entrance of the harbor of Pensacola, Florida, and of deepening the channel of Blackwater River between Pensacola and Milton in said State.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 161 of section 2, after the word "near" to insert "and between;" so as to make the clause read:

Delaware River, near and between Petty's and Smith's Islands.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I have some amendments to offer for additional surveys.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Are the amendments reported by the committee all disposed of?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL.) There is one undisposed of from line 163 to line 172 of section 2.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I insist on the regular order. Let us have the vote on the fifty-thousand-dollar appropriation, and then we will put in the other rivers.

Mr. ALLISON. I submit whether the committee cannot make the amendments in their order. I offer a list of surveys which we have picked up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the amendment of the Senator from Iowa will be in order coming from the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order so as to make the law for the Senate, (I do not care which way it is decided,) because the committee has no more right than anybody else, that we cannot consider any other amendments than those reported with the bill until they are disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In order that the point may be well settled, the Chair will submit it to the Senate.

Mr. WEST. I hope the Senate will understand that pending debate on this bill other amendments have been submitted to the committee, and the amendments now offered by the Senator in charge are supplemental to amendments already offered, but they are objected to by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. ALLISON. Many of these amendments were submitted to the committee before the bill was reported, and were omitted by accident.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope I shall not be misunderstood. I am not objecting to the amendment the Senator from Iowa wishes to offer. I am only asking that we follow the law of the Senate and go through with the amendments that are reported and in the bill, of which there is a single one left. That is my point of order, and, as I say, I do not care which way the Senate decide it. It was never disputed before, and after it is decided if the Senator has any special object of course I shall not make any objection.

Mr. ALLISON. The committee had no special object. If it satisfies the Senator any better to vote on the printed amendment, I will waive offering the other for the present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All I want now is to know what the rule of order is, for on some other bill it may be important.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will make this statement: All the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations and in the printed bill, with the exception of two, have been agreed to or disagreed to by the Senate, pending which the Senator from Iowa offers another amendment from the committee. The question is whether that is in order. This the Chair will submit to the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would ask the Chair if the Secretary remembers any precedent or any rule on the subject?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that it is simply a practice of the Senate; that there is no definite rule on the subject.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understood the Senator from Iowa to consent that it should go in the way the Senator from Vermont wanted.

Mr. ALLISON. I did propose to waive it, but my honorable friend from Vermont wanted a ruling on this point.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not want any ruling if the Senator waives it, because that leaves it where it is. The simple point is—and it is of no consequence in this particular bill, but it is of consequence that we preserve some order—that going through the bill according to law we have come to a fifty-thousand-dollar amendment. Now the gentleman representing the committee proposes to go back and put something else into the body of the bill before we vote upon this amendment. That I insist is not in order, but I do not care anything about it on this bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well, I waive it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the last amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add at the end of the second section of the bill:

And the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated for such examinations and surveys, and for incidental repairs of harbors for which there is no special appropriation provided for by law: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall make an estimate of the total cost of the examinations and surveys herein provided for; and in case the sum herein appropriated shall prove insufficient to complete said examinations and surveys, only such rivers and harbors shall be examined and surveyed as in his judgment are most important.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I now ask the Senator from Iowa if he will allow me to turn back to pages 1 and 2 of the bill?

Mr. ALLISON. I want to add a few surveys.

Mr. CONKLING. I know that, but as we have taken the order of finishing the bill as it stood, I have a suggestion to make.

Mr. ALLISON. Go on.

Mr. CONKLING. The committee under its policy reported to strike out several items in the bill on pages 1 and 2 relative to the State of New York. I think I have the acquiescence of the committee in saying that those provisions as they stood in the House bill are quite as urgent and meritorious as the average provisions standing in the House bill, and therefore I ask that the vote may be reconsidered by which these amendments were agreed to and these provisions stricken out; I will read them:

For the improvement of the harbor at Dunkirk, New York, $18,000.

Since the vote of the Senate I have received by telegraph and by letter urgent expostulations from people there remonstrating against the propriety of dropping that work.

So too we find on page 2, lines 15 and 16:

For the improvement of the harbor at Olcott, New York, $6,000.

Again in line 19:

For the improvement of the harbor at Pultneyville, New York, $5,000.

And at line 21:

For the improvement of the harbor at Great Sodus Bay, New York, $5,000.

For varying reasons, but for truthful reasons in each of these cases, these provisions as they stood in the House bill, assuming that the Treasury is in condition to make such appropriations as the Senate has considered it fit to make now, should be where they are. I ask that the vote striking them out be reconsidered and that the amendment be non-concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the motion covering these several amendments? If not, the Chair will put the question on the motion to reconsider them all at once.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. Now I ask that the amendments be non-concurred in, the vote being taken together.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question in reference to all these amendments, there being no objection. The question is on the amendments reported by the committee as stated by the Senator from New York.

The amendments were rejected.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask now to insert the omitted surveys. After line 162 of section 2 I move to insert:

Survey of the Potomac River, from Georgetown, District of Columbia, to the new outlet-locks constructed on the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.

Survey of the Red River above the raft to western boundary of the State of Arkansas.

Little River, from its mouth to the western boundary of Arkansas.

Examination and survey of the Missouri River immediately above and at Nebraska City, Nebraska, with a view of determining what measures, if any, are necessary to be adopted to preserve the landing for steamboats and other vessels at said port.

Roanoke River, from Weldon, North Carolina, to Clarksville, Virginia.

Survey, estimate, and report of the cost of a dyke from the upper north end of the island known as Bloody Island, Mississippi River opposite the city of Saint Louis, to the wing-dam opposite Brooklyn, Illinois, and of the practicability and usefulness of such dyke for improving said river and its harbor and for protecting the lands on the east bank of said river against overflow and the deflection and abrasion of the current of said river.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARVEY. Among the surveys I notice a topographical error on page 22, line 26 of section 1. "Kansas City" should be "Arkansas City."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to that amendment, and it will be made.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have two little amendments, and I want to offer both.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that there is an amendment reported by the committee not yet acted upon on page 12. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The committee reported to strike out lines 263 and 264 of section 1, as follows:

For the improvement of Pascagoula Bay, Mississippi, $10,000.

Mr. SPENCER. I hope the same course will be taken with that as with the others, and then I have a proviso to offer to perfect the paragraph.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to strike out the clause.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPENCER. Now I offer the following proviso to that appropriation, to come in after line 264:

Provided, That the State of Mississippi shall secure from the owners of the Noyes Canal a release of all the claims the latter might have against the United States were the United States to proceed with works of improvement without such release.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does that mean?

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Iowa can explain what it means. He has the book there with the reports of the engineers. It appears the canal is owned by some private parties.

Mr. LOGAN. Let us understand what the question is.

Mr. SPENCER. I will endeavor to explain the amendment so that the Senator from Illinois shall understand it. The Engineer Department reports that such a proviso is necessary. The Senator from Iowa can read the recommendation, if the Senator from Illinois desires.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the state of facts that makes this proviso necessary?

Mr. ALLISON. Some private parties own a canal, called the Noyes Canal, at the point where this improvement is to be made. The engineer recommends that any appropriation made shall be upon the condition that the State of Mississippi shall release whatever interest it has in this canal.

Mr. SPENCER. That the State of Mississippi shall indemnify the Government of the United States against any damages which the owners of the canal might claim.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Secretary to read what I have marked in the report which I send to the desk.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before that is done I wish to say that the substance of it taken together is that we are to appropriate money to improve a canal now owned by private parties; but before we can do it safely we must buy the canal. I think that is a good thing; we ought to buy it before we go at it.

Mr. ALLISON. We must be released from damages that might occur from our improvements to this corporation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is another way of stating the same thing.

Mr. LOGAN. We are to improve their canal, and if they are damaged any we are not to pay damages.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. CONKLING. Let me make an inquiry. I ask the Senator from Iowa whether I understand it right. An improvement is proposed. The engineers say that an impediment or contingency standing in the way is the possibility of objection or claim by a private corporation that they are interfered with and they say that the assent or indemnity of the State in which the improvement is to be made should be obtained before the work proceeds. Now, the Senator from Alabama offers an amendment requiring that condition-precedent suggested by the engineers to be complied with. Am I right in my statement?

Mr. SPENCER. Entirely right.

Mr. CONKLING. Then really I do not see why it is not a case somewhat familiar. I know nothing about the merits of this work, whether it should be done or not; but it is a very familiar thing where an improvement is to be made which the law-making power adjudges to be proper, and private rights intervene, to require a relinquishment of those rights. Not only the records of the Senate, but the decisions of the Supreme Court will abundantly support me in saying that that is not unusual in legislation. If there be no other objection to that amendment, if the work be meritorious, I do not think the fact that a Senator offers an amendment complying with the recommendation of the engineers by cutting off any possibility of claim against the Government for damage or trespass hereafter, should disparage or defeat it.

Mr. LOGAN. No; the point I make is that I want to know if this money is for the improvement of private property.

Mr. CONKLING. Not at all. As I understand, improving this water-way, in the estimation of the engineers, may have the effect to impair certain vested rights of a private corporation. They say, therefore, that either those rights should be relinquished or the State should indemnify the General Government against any claim for damages which, in consequence of these rights, may hereafter be preferred. The Senator from Alabama offers an amendment providing as a condition-precedent to the expenditure of this money that the Government shall be saved harmless, indemnified against the possibility of claim in that regard.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DENNIS. I ask that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the committee in lines 49, 50, 51, 52, and 53 of section 2 were non-concurred in. I was not aware at the time that it concerned all the streams there named.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment to insert as lines 49 to 53 in section 2 what will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Slaughter Creek, near the mouth of Little Choptank River, Maryland.
Brown's Creek and Southeast Creek, Maryland.
Corsica Creek, Maryland.
Harbor at Leonardstown, Maryland.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have two amendments that I wish to offer to this bill. I propose on page 15, after line 331 of section 1, to insert:

For the improvement of the harbor at Fort Madison, Iowa, $10,000.

The question being put, it was declared that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask whether the committee considered the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WRIGHT. The amendment is in accordance with an estimate that has been made by the Secretary of War and was referred to the Committee on Commerce. I offer the amendment in pursuance of this recommendation. It may be an objection that it is founded on an estimate, for many have been passed not founded on estimates; but I have one founded on estimate made by the Secretary of War after two examinations of the harbor by persons deputed to make the examination.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not know anything about the amendment. My attention was called off at the time, and although it comes from the colleague of the Senator who has charge of the bill, yet I think the Senator is bound to take care of his bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. What objection is there to the amendment either in point of order or anything else?

Mr. NORWOOD. I raise the point of order that the amendment has already been adopted.

Mr. WRIGHT. This amendment is offered in pursuance of an estimate made by the War Department; and that, I understood, comes within the rule.

Mr. WEST. I should have been very glad as a member of the committee to have raised a point of order against this amendment; but, under my reading of the rule, that point cannot be made. It does come here in pursuance of an estimate from the head of a Department.

Mr. DAVIS. Where is the estimate? Is it in the Book of Estimates?

Mr. WEST. There is a special estimate.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand that this amendment has been adopted, and unless there is some question of order made or some reconsideration of it, I do not wish to make any point, but I am sure I am in order under all the rulings made here before.

Mr. DAVIS. If the amendment has been adopted, I move a reconsideration.

Mr. NORWOOD. My understanding is that the amendment was voted upon and adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would inquire of the Senator from Iowa if this estimate is in the regular Book of Estimates?

Mr. WRIGHT. The amendment is recommended by a special letter of the Secretary of War on a communication made to him, which I will send to the Clerk to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the individual opinion of the present occupant of the Chair that it would be in order; but the precedents have been otherwise. The Senate ruled against the present occupant of the Chair on this precise question at the last session, that in order to be in order an item moved as an amendment must either be reported from a committee or be in the regular estimates.

Mr. DAVIS. The regular Book of Estimates. It has been so decided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Following that precedent, the present occupant of the Chair would sustain the point of order made by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. ALLISON. The point of order of the Senator from Georgia was that this amendment had been agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that the point of order was that it was not reported from a committee and not in the Book of Estimates.

Mr. NORWOOD. My point was that the objection came too late; that the Senate had already adopted the amendment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. There were no yeas and nays taken, no division called, and nothing else intervened.

Mr. WEST. It is not a material matter, but I shall appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Delaware are both under misapprehension. The Chair had not announced the result.

Mr. WRIGHT. Allow me to say one word. I trust my friend from Georgia will make no objection. There being a recommendation for this special work, the matter being referred to the War Department and having sent an engineer there who made the examination and that engineer having made a report, I do not think the point of order is well taken. I trust he will not press it as against this amendment.

Mr. NORWOOD. My point of order was in favor of the amendment.

Mr. WEST. I shall take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, the decision of the Chair being that estimates must be in the regular Book of Estimates. The whole action of this committee has been upon revised estimates. Are you to come to the conclusion that when, in November, the Departments make up their estimates and send you here the regular book, it is not discretionary with them, pending the action of Congress, to revise those estimates and throw them out? Most assuredly an estimate is good for us whether it is in the regular book or whether it is the after reflection and the sober second thought of the head of the Department; and, following the rule as it stands, clearly the Senator has a right to offer it. What does the rule say?

Or moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or in pursuance of an estimate from the head of some of the Departments.

Is there anything there said about the regular Book of Estimates? Do you intend to shut out your heads of Departments that they shall not have the opportunity to revise their estimates?

Then take the other proposition, that the Senator had the opportunity of giving notice of this amendment. He did give notice of it; he referred this amendment to the Committee on Commerce and it should have been transferred; but possibly in the transfer from the Committee on Commerce to the Committee on Appropriations it has been lost sight of. It is not a matter of any great moment, but there is the principle laid down in your text and your law, and you are bound to adhere to it.

Mr. ALLISON. This amendment was considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and under the rule adopted by the committee we did not insert it. But the Senator from West Virginia says I ought to take care of this bill. I have been endeavoring for two days to take care of this bill, and the Committee on Appropriations have been voted down again and again, until at last we had but seven votes in favor of the action of the committee on this bill. Now my colleague offers an amendment with reference to an appropriation for a harbor in my own State of $10,000. The report of the engineer shows that this harbor has been obstructed by the action of the United States itself by means of building the improvement below the city of Fort Madison, and thus in a degree diverting the channel of the Mississippi River from the city to the opposite shore. The object of the amendment is to close up one of the chutes on the opposite side of the river in order to throw this river again into the canal now being constructed by the Government of the United States and for which there is an appropriation of $275,000 in this bill to complete. Therefore, if there is an appropriation outside of what the Committee on Appropriations have reported, I think the amendment suggested by my colleague is a proper one. The Committee on Appropriations did not report it, because they desired in good faith to postpone for this year absolutely every appropriation that they did not believe essential to the existing commerce of the country; but the Senate has over and over again by the votes of every section of this country, from the south to the north, the east to the west, rode this bill down so that it has now over $900,000 more appropriated for the rivers and harbors than it had when it came from the Committee on Appropriations; and I shall not stand here in my place and oppose a just and worthy appropriation, and especially, too, when the cause for that appropriation was made by the action of the Government.

Mr. ANTHONY. I admire the virtue of those Senators who, having overrode the committee and got everything they wanted for their own sections, now oppose——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator allow the Chair a moment? There is a misapprehension on the part of the Chair. He now understands that the Senator from Georgia really did not make the point of order at all; consequently there is no question of order before the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. That has spoiled my speech; I was going to speak to the point of order. Clearly, I think, the amendment is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to understand the rule. I have no doubt, in fact I hear of several similar amendments to be offered now upon this ruling. If a recommendation from the Department is an estimate, not an estimate coming in the regular Book of Estimates, but a letter, printed or otherwise, from the Department makes an amendment in order, then of course the request of the Senator from Iowa is in order in the Senate. But the Chair asked the Senate to rule on it so that there would be no misunderstanding whether or not the present amendment is in order under the rule the Senate has heretofore generally acted on.

Mr. WRIGHT. Allow me to make one inquiry. I wish to ask the Senator from West Virginia whether he makes the point of order on this amendment?

Mr. DAVIS. I make it on all, because I understand there are half a dozen.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator must make his point on this.

Mr. WRIGHT. This is the only one before us now.

Mr. DAVIS. Of course it must be made on some one.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Senator makes it on this?

Mr. DAVIS. Of course, and I ask the Chair to rule on it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the Senator from West Virginia to point out the rule which requires that an amendment to the river and harbor bill shall be according to the estimate of the head of a Department. If he will do so he will point to a rule I do not know of. All the general appropriation bills require as a condition of an amendment that it shall be from a standing or select committee of the Senate or upon the estimate of a Department; but this rule does not apply to the river and harbor bill, for it is not a general appropriation bill. The river and harbor bill is not a general appropriation bill; it does not go to the Committee on Appropriations, although it has for special reasons in this case been sent there this session, but goes to the Committee on Commerce.

And in like manner notice of amendments to bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors shall be given and referred to the committee to which such bills shall be referred.

But nothing is said about requiring an estimate from the Department. Amendments have always been made to river and harbor bills without the recommendation of a Department.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not understand that this amendment has been referred to the committee at all.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is another question. I understood the chairman to say it had been referred to the committee and rejected by the committee.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand it to be the case that it had been referred.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then there is nothing in the point.

Mr. DAVIS. I withdraw the point of order. I am satisfied now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have one other amendment based on the same estimate made by the Secretary of War to follow the amendment I have just offered:

For the improvement of the Rush Chute of the harbor at Burlington, Iowa, $10,000.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to know if my understanding was right of the remark made by the Senator who has this bill in charge a few minutes ago. I understood him to say that the Senate had put $900,000 on this bill above the amount reported by the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. About that sum. That is, the committee struck out about $900,000 and it has all been re-inserted.

Mr. THURMAN. How much did the committee add to the House bill?

Mr. ALLISON. The committee added $36,000 to the House bill; the committee changed the bill to the extent of $36,000. The committee struck out provisions in the House bill to the amount of $945,000 and added $980,000.

Mr. THURMAN. So that the committee of the Senate increased the House bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Thirty-six thousand dollars.

Mr. WITHERS. The action of the Senate has restored all the House bill items stricken out by the committee.

Mr. THURMAN. The action of the Senate has added $900,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Nine hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

Mr. MERRIMON. Has that been referred.

Mr. WRIGHT. It is in the same situation as the other.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORWOOD. I offer an amendment to come in after line 205 of section 1:

For the improvement of the harbor of Brunswick, Georgia, $10,000.

I hold in my hand a letter from the Secretary of War dated May 10, 1876, communicating to the Senate, in response to a resolution introduced by my colleague, the estimate made by the Chief of Engineers, General Humphreys, for the work for which I ask that amount. He says:

The town of Brunswick is situated about eight miles above the narrows formed by Saint Simon's and Jekyl Islands, upon a branch of the main stream which flows around Buzzard's Island. In this branch, near its lower confluence with the main channel, and below the town, there is a shoal, upon which there is only 10 feet soundings at mean low water, which ought to be removed.

He then proceeds:

If a channel be cut through the ten-foot shoal one hundred feet wide at bottom and fifteen feet deep at mean low water, vessels drawing over twenty-one feet can pass through at high tide and reach the deep anchorage near the city. At twenty-five cents per cubic yard of dredging the cost will be:

For 50,000 cubic yards, at twenty-five cents per yard	$12,500
Add 20 per cent. for contingencies	2,500

It is estimated that they can probably accomplish that work with $10,000, or that amount can be expended during the present fiscal year, and if not sufficient, a small additional appropriation will accomplish the work. The town of Brunswick in the year 1874 had in port three hundred and four vessels with a tonnage of 77,800 tons, and the value of the exports of that town during that year was $691,000. Vessels that draw over ten feet of water cannot reach the city on account of that shoal, and it is for the purpose of removing that shoal that I ask this appropriation. It is based, as I have stated, on the estimate of the Chief of Engineers, and that estimate is communicated by the Secretary of War and the appropriation is recommended by the head of the Department.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to inquire whether this amendment has been submitted to the Senate and referred to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. NORWOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WITHERS. The amendment was referred to and considered by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in order.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, we have been for the last two or three days distributing the money of the people with as much generosity as if it were our own, and I now propose an amendment to this bill by which we shall get some money back into the public Treasury, and I should like to see how the sense of the majority of the Senate will appear upon this proposition. It is to insert on page 6, after line 123 of section 1, the following:

For the improvement of the Potomac River west of Cumberland, including the purchase of sites for dams and locks, $150,000.

This amendment I proposed on the 4th of May, and it was sent to the Committee on Commerce and thence transferred to the Committee on Appropriations with the bill.

I desire to put myself right because I am afraid my friend, the Senator from Vermont, may appeal again to my constitutional views in regard to this bill.

This amendment is for the purpose of aiding in the extension of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal from Cumberland (its present terminus) to Savage River by the north branch of the Potomac, so as to reach the coal-fields of George's Creek. This is really a work of national importance and national concern. As I stated awhile ago the United States is a stockholder in this company to the extent of two and a half millions of dollars. Originally, I think, the United States subscribed to the capital stock $1,000,000, Washington and Georgetown subscribed $1,500,000, making a total of $2,500,000. These amounts so subscribed by the cities were subsequently assumed by Congress, and the United States now holds $2,500,000 in a capital stock of $8,226,593.67. The Government also holds an amount of the preferred bonds of this company for the benefit of the Indian trust fund.

This canal was one of the very first lines proposed between the West and the seaboard.

The Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, in their report at the first session of the Forty-third Congress, page 234, speak highly of this water route, and thus refer to it:

Its construction was begun in the year 1828, and it was completed to Cumberland, Maryland, on the eastern slope of the Alleghany range, in the year 1851, at a cost of $11,071,000. This route, in its topographical features and in the commercial results which it is expected to subserve, is quite similar to the James River and Kanawha route.

Congress last year appropriated for the Kanawha route the sum of $300,000, and a similar amount is appropriated in this bill.

The same reasons which induce these appropriations for the Kanawha route apply to the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.

The canal company has been quite successful of late in paying off the accumulated interest on the bonded debt, and is approaching a period when it may be remunerative to the stockholders and the United States among them; but it is necessary to extend the canal to the coal-fields so that some competition with the railways between Cumberland and the coal region may be afforded to the canal. This extension would save twenty-eight miles railroad transportation. The act of Congress of March 3, 1875, provided for surveys for the continuation and completion of this canal, and under that act Major Merrill has made his report which is found in Executive Document, H. R. No. 137, of this session, on page 32. He states as follows:

This North Branch canal has been treated as a local extension to the coal-fields of the existing Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, and therefore its dimensions and draught have been made the same as those of the canal already built. It is, therefore, a smaller canal than the one projected as the Will's Creek through-transportation route.

From the mouth of Savage River to the guard-lock at Cumberland the distance by the canal-line is thirty and one-half miles, and of this distance nearly two miles is the slack-water of the Cumberland pool, leaving twenty-eight and one-half miles of canal proper. The fall is 335.3 feet, and is overcome by 43 locks, the average lockage being 7.8 feet. The canal is assumed to be of the same size as the Cumberland division of the existing canal, namely, 62 feet width of water-surface, 32 feet width of floor, and 6 feet depth of water, with locks 100 feet long and 15 feet wide.

The estimated cost is	$2,656,558
If we omit the upper two miles, whose estimated cost is	418,314
We have as the cost of the canal from Cumberland to George's Creek	2,238,244

The original surveys for this canal were made by engineers of the General Government, under the direction of the United States board of internal improvements. The first division, from Washington to Cumberland, a distance of one hundred and eighty-four miles, has been completed, and this amendment is intended for the preparation of the Potomac River for the construction of the second division of the canal, from Cumberland to the coal mines. And after that we may hope to see it carried on its last division, to the Ohio River, as a great water-line from the Mississippi River to the Atlantic Ocean.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I ask that the vote by which the Senate agreed to the amendment striking out lines 56 and 57 be reconsidered. That clause is for the improvement of Menomonee Harbor at the mouth of Menomonee River.

Mr. ALLISON. I believe that is pretty nearly the only amendment the committee reported striking out appropriations that has not been disagreed to. I suppose we might as well disagree to that also.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee striking out lines 56 and 57 of section 1, in the following words:

For the improvement of the harbor at Menomonee, Wisconsin, $10,000.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is one left of $8,000 for the harbor of Swanton, in Vermont. I believe that is the last one of the committee's amendments that were agreed to. I voted for it, but I am bound to say that the appropriation is just as necessary and more so than most of those the Senate has put on. Therefore, to have equality all around, I ask the Senate to reconsider that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLISON. It seems to me that ought not to go in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is just like all the others.

The motion to reconsider was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. I propose an amendment which is according to the estimate and the recommendation of the War Department, notice of which was given, and it was printed and referred to the committee, and I think that the chairman of the committee will not object to it. The amendment is for the improvement of Little Narraganset Bay, Rhode Island and Connecticut, $10,000.

Mr. ALLISON. It is a meritorious improvement, and the committee, under the rule established, do not object to it.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is necessary to an improvement that has been going on for four years, which is comparatively useless unless this appropriation is made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

For the improvement of Little Narraganset Bay, Rhode Island and Connecticut, $10,000.

Mr. MERRIMON. I want to say to the friends of this bill that if they expect to pass it they are getting it into very bad condition.

Mr. ANTHONY. If my friend from North Carolina objects we can go back and take a little out of the French Broad or some of those rivers. Here is the only local appropriation, except the pitiful sum of $5,000, that has been given to the State of Rhode Island; and after the liberality we have shown to everything in North Carolina, I do not think it becoming in my friend to make the objection.

Mr. MERRIMON. Will my friend vote for the bill with this amendment on it?

Mr. ANTHONY. Will I vote for it because it gives an appropriation to my State? I cannot tell how many other amendments will be put on. I cannot tell whether I shall vote for the bill until it is completed; but if there is anything that would make me vote against the bill it would be some of the absurd amendments put on for improvements in the State of the Senator from North Carolina. This amendment will strengthen my disposition to vote for the bill very much indeed.

Mr. MERRIMON. My opinion has been, and that was the suggestion I meant to make to the friends of this bill, that a warfare that is legitimate will now be made upon it with a view to crush it, and to heap up appropriations to such an amount as that nobody in the Senate will support it. It is rapidly approaching that point now.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think if anything will imperil this bill it will be the rejection of such amendments as those offered by my friend from Iowa, and this that I offer now, after amendments of the kind advocated and insisted on by my friend from North Carolina were put on the bill.

Mr. MERRIMON. My friend does me and the river that I insisted upon yesterday great injustice. There seems to be a false idea prevailing that no river in the mountains is fit to be improved by the General Government. If the Senator could know that river, if he could know the public want and necessity for the improvement that is proposed to be made there, we should hear no such complaints from him. Because it is away on the mountains two thousand feet above the level of the sea, a beautiful river passing through a rich country that is to be developed, Senators suppose therefore that no money ought to be appropriated for it, but that we ought to appropriate money forever only to improve the seaports and large rivers down in the flat country. When it is proposed to ask a few dollars to improve a river in the mountains it is shocking!

Mr. ANTHONY. I voted for the Senator's river.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am very much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. ANTHONY. Perhaps if the Senator knew Little Narraganset, and if he would give as much favor to my improvements as I give to his, we should get both through. I propose now, as each of us has been ignorant of the needs and necessities of the improvements proposed by the other, to introduce Little Narraganset to the French Broad River, and that the two may go in arm and arm together.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OGLESBY. I desire to move an amendment to a clause on page 19 of the bill, and I hope the Senate will concur in it. From line 431 to line 437, inclusive, the sum of $200,000 is appropriated in the bill as it came from the House and in the bill as it came back to the Senate from the Committee on Appropriations of this body. In the $200,000 appropriated for the improvement of the Mississippi River there are two exceptions specified in the only paragraph on the subject. I wish to get the consent of the Senate now (and I think the Committee on Appropriations of this body will not object to it) to strike out "twenty" in line 434 and insert "thirty;" so as to read:

For the improvement of the Mississippi River between the mouths of the Illinois and Ohio Rivers, ($15,000 of which are to be expended between the mouths of the Illinois and Missouri Rivers and $30,000 of which are to be expended to prevent erosion and destruction of its banks between the foot of Dickey Island and the mouth of the Ohio River,) $200,000.

I offer the amendment for this reason: This paragraph appropriates, as I have before said, $200,000, $20,000 of which are to be expended to prevent erosion and destruction of the banks between the foot of Dickey Island and the mouth of the Ohio River. That is manifestly below what is necessary for any practical good. The sum ought to be $50,000 or $60,000. Twenty thousand dollars was appropriated by the House bill and the Senate committee have agreed to it. It is so manifestly below what is necessary that I hope the Senate will consent that we increase it from $20,000 to $30,000, not interfering with the aggregate appropriation of $200,000.

Mr. MERRIMON. Was that amendment referred to the committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not increase the appropriation, and therefore would require no reference to a committee.

Mr. ALLISON. It is a mere change. I think there will be no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OGLESBY. I have another amendment to offer in the same paragraph and in exactly the same condition. It is very short and will conclude all I have to say on this bill. After the word "rivers," in line 434, I move to insert:

And $5,000 of which is to be expended to prevent erosions of its banks between islands 14 and 15, near the town of Kaskaskia, Illinois.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the object of that amendment?

Mr. OGLESBY. The Mississippi River approaches the Kaskaskia about a mile or a mile and a quarter above the town of Chester, on the Illinois side, at one bend of the river. It has been making such erosions as have been wearing away the bank rapidly at the rate of six hundred feet a year, and unless something is done to prevent it, it will cut through into the Kaskaskia River and throw off a large body of most elegant land, many thousands of acres, and take the bed of the river away from Saint Mary's, on the Missouri side, which would be quite disastrous. I am not able to go into details or minutiæ about it. Five thousand dollars of this $200,000, though it is not enough, can be judiciously expended to resist the wearing or the abrasion or erosion. For one, I at least say that hereafter there may be revetment or other work laid down to stop this wearing. It is a very small sum, and if the Senate will give us $5,000 out of the $200,000 we will let the bill go.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand it does not increase the appropriation.

Mr. OGLESBY. Not at all.

Mr. BOGY. It does not increase the appropriation at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The only objection I have to this amendment—I do not know whether it will apply in fact or not—is that it raises the question as to whether it is the duty of the United States to expend public money to prevent rivers from wearing into the lands of States as distinguished from improving them for the purposes of commerce and navigation. It is no part of the duty of the United States, I take it, to keep the river banks of the navigable rivers of this country from wearing in too far on either side. If it were a part of our duty, of course we should have our hands full, because a river does wear something on one side, more or less, all the time. If the object of the amendment is to protect the land intereat, not to protect navigation, then I cannot vote for it on principle; but if the object of this particular thing is to keep the river in proper limits for navigation, I can go for it, so that it will not spread out over the land and be lost entirely, and then it would fall within the general principle of the bill.

Mr. OGLESBY. I do not know that I can say anything to satisfy the Senator from Vermont on this subject. Of course as the banks of the Mississippi are worn away above or below any particular bend, the effect is to fill up the channel parallel with the current of the stream and to obstruct and impede navigation and to hinder it in every way. What is the use of permitting a river to do this when it is going with great force and velocity in one direction, if it can be stopped from that washing away by running it in its regular sweep along the lines of the States? The people of the States and of the United States, I believe, are perfectly willing it should continue to run in its accustomed channel. It would be exceedingly inconvenient to all concerned if it should take a notion to run somewhere else. It is the interest of all to keep the stream where it has been going, in its natural channel, and to keep the washings of the banks of the river from filling up and obstructing the navigation. Certainly the Senator will see that it will be beneficial to commerce and beneficial to navigation, and stop what is a very increasing injury and impediment to navigation.

That is about the best I can say for this amendment. Of course we do not want the Mississippi River to break loose from its natural boundaries and run over into Illinois. We are trying to keep it off all we can. It would bring great damage if it were to do so. If this expenditure of $5,000 out of $200,000 shall be put along there and judiciously used under the direction of the engineers, the inhabitants on both sides of the river will be protected. Although this is a small sum, the people believe that good will result from it and the river will be kept more naturally in its natural channel. That is about all I can say. It is in the interest of free and uninterrupted navigation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARNUM. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the committee striking out lines 76, 77, and 78 of section 1 was agreed to, in the following words:

For the improvement of the harbor of New Haven, Connecticut, by constructing a breakwater, $10,000.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee striking out these words.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to amend the paragraph just retained by striking out the words "by constructing a breakwater," if the Senator from Connecticut will consent to it. Ten thousand dollars will not make a breakwater at New Haven.

Mr. BARNUM. I have no objection to the amendment which the Senator proposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARNUM. I now move to reconsider the vote by which lines 82 and 83 were stricken out, as follows:

For the improvement of the harbor at Milford, Connecticut. $5,000.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the recommendation of the committee striking out this clause.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BARNUM. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the committee was agreed to striking out lines 84 and 85, in the following words:

For the improvement of the Housatonic River, Connecticut, $5,000.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on concurring in the recommendation of the committee striking out this clause.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ROBERTSON. On page 12, line 273, I move to strike out "ten" and insert "fifty;" so as to increase the appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Charleston, South Carolina, from $10,000 to $50,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I will venture to enter a protest against my friend. General Gillmore, who has charge of this harbor, only recommends $10,000. I do not see very well how more than that sum can be expended.

Mr. ROBERTSON. General Gillmore estimated for one channel only. There are two channels in the harbor of Charleston. One is Beach Channel, and the other is Pumpkin Hill Channel. There seems to be a difficulty between the engineer of the United States Government and the engineer of the city. General Gillmore ignored entirely Pumpkin Hill Channel. The engineer of the Government in charge there recommended $10,000, while $50,000 is considered necessary by the city engineer. I ask for a vote upon the amendment.

The amendment was rejected—ayes 7, noes not counted.

Mr. HOWE. On page 4 an amendment was agreed to in the sixty-first line striking out "$15,000" and inserting "$5,000" "for the improvement of the harbor of Two Rivers, Wisconsin." I did not object to that amendment, feeling for one inclined to accept such recommendations as the committee felt bound to make. The Senate has not imposed that duty upon itself. The engineer asked for this harbor for the next year $25,000. The House appropriated $15,000, but a part of what the engineer asked for. The Senate committee, for reasons which seemed good to them undoubtedly, proposed to reduce it to $5,000. I think I am abundantly justified, in view of the action the Senate has already taken, in asking the Senate to reconsider that vote. I move the reconsideration of the vote by which that amendment was agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WALLACE in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee striking out "$15,000" and inserting "$5,000."

Mr. HOWE. Which I hope the Senate will not agree to.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPENCER. I move on page 20, line 450, to strike out "three" and insert "five;" so as to read:

For the improvement of the Tennessee River, $500,000.

This is a work of national importance, one of the great works which we are engaged in at the present time. The engineers asked for $750,000 for this year. I propose that we shall give them two-thirds of what they asked for.

Mr. MERRIMON. Has that amendment been referred to the committee?

Mr. SPENCER. The amendment was offered by me in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It was not acted upon by them. This is a work of such great importance that I think every Senator understands it. I will not detain the Senate by making any further remarks upon it. I hope that the amendment which I have offered will carry. It is a matter of justice.

Mr. THURMAN. I see that this is an old acquaintance of mine. There is an appropriation in the House bill, a part of this same item, of $285,000 to be expended upon Muscle Shoals in the Tennessee River. Thirty-one years ago the House were appropriating for Muscle Shoals in the Tennessee River, and they have been appropriating for Muscle Shoals ever since, I suppose.

Mr. SPENCER. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I will correct an error. It is true that thirty-one years ago they did appropriate for it; but they ceased appropriating money about thirty years ago. They commenced in the last three years to appropriate money again, and they are now going on to complete this great work.

Mr. THURMAN. There are two works of internal improvement in this country which I should like to see finished before I die, although I have not much hope of seeing that result. One is for the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers and the other is Muscle Shoals.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator that I want to see the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers improvement completed before he dies.

Mr. HOWE. I want to say for the encouragement of my friend, the Senator from Ohio, that there is one way in which that hope of his can be gratified. The Government of the United States has but recently undertaken to open that great channel, worth more to the East and to the West, as I solemnly believe, than any artificial water channel proposed in the United States. The Government has but recently undertaken it, and although he, like myself, is somewhat advanced in life and cannot hope to linger through another century at all events, yet there is one way in which he can hope to see that work completed, and that is by saying to the Government of the United States to take hold of it as a business matter, appropriate the money that is required for the completion of it, and have it done within his life-time. I do not know of any other way by which he can see it done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama to increase the appropriation for the improvement of the Tennessee River from $300,000 to $500,000.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$500,000" and inserting "$750,000."

Mr. SPENCER. This is a matter in which the people of my State are deeply interested. I hope the Senator will not kill my amendment by his kindness. I voted to give him $50,000 for Charleston Harbor.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I got so much for Charleston that I want to help my friends out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina insist on the amendment to the amendment?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I do.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was rejected, ayes 4, noes not counted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have now got apparently to the end of perfecting this bill, and we find ourselves in this attitude: The bill as it came from the House of Representatives appropriated $5,872,850. The Committee on Appropriations, after a most careful and intelligent examination of the bill, endeavoring to do their fair and impartial duty, reduced that in House respects by about $900,000 and increased it by nearly a million dollars, so as to make the total increase $46,314.

Mr. ALLISON. Thirty-six thousand three hundred and fourteen dollars is the exact increase.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I took it from the chairman yesterday, and I thought it was $46,000. Now, then, we have gone through with this bill in committee. After going through a page or two we deserted the committee and left everything there was in the bill, right or wrong, in it, and have added everything that the committee recommended, wise or unwise, so that we have got a bill now that comes up to almost $7,000,000. We have done that in spite of the revised estimates of the engineers in respect to what could be got along with this year and what could be dispensed with, merely because gentlemen from various States wished it.

This can be said without discrimination, for we have all done it, although I will say for myself that I stood by the committee as long as they had any friends to stand by them and until we were reduced to what would form a Parliament of Great Britain or a masonic lodge, as I am told, so that there was no use to hold on any longer. The question is whether we have a right in performing a duty as guardians of the public Treasury and the public interest to let a bill of this character pass in spite of the examination of the committee, in spite of the reports of the engineers in respect of the fitness of any particular work or how much it would cost, and in spite of the paramount necessity of having the least appropriations possible this year in the time of our distress and necessity. Should we be justified in sending a bill of this character back to the House of Representatives? It appears to me that we should not, and I move to strike out all after the enacting clause of this bill and insert what I send to the Chair.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont offers a substitute. The Chair will state that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK] sent up an amendment some time ago to the original bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg pardon. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. PADDOCK. Before the amendments of the committee were fully through with I offered an amendment which lies on the table. It costs nothing to anybody and is a mere act of justice relating to the distribution of an appropriation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make no objection. I supposed the whole thing was through.

Mr. PADDOCK. I forbore to offer it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "dollars," in line 430, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That $45,000 of said sum shall be expended for improvements on the Missouri River.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think there is any objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I ask that my amendment be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That the sum of $4,000,000 is hereby appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, to be expended for the repair, extension, preservation, and completion of works for the improvement of rivers and harbors under the direction of the Secretary of War: Provided, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to cause such expenditures to be made so as best to subserve the interests of commerce; and he is required to report to Congress, at the opening of its December session, all expenditures made under the appropriations of this act up to that time, in detail.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The effect of this amendment will be to reduce the sum of money taken from the Treasury from about $7,000,000—it is not quite that—to $4,000,000, and to have the responsible officers of the War Department, (we know who they are and with what fidelity and purity they have always exercised their trust,) the Corps of Engineers, take this $4,000,000 and apply it in this year of retrenchment and of strict economy to those works of public improvement that the general interests of the nation most imperiously demand, in the way of construction and to carrying on those already ordered by way of preservation and repair, in order that, in the responsible judgment of the Secretary of War, (which means, as we all understand, in law and in fact, the responsible judgment of the Corps of Engineers and its Chief,) he may apply this money to the objects where there is the greatest necessity.

This is not a time, as it appears to me, when we can improve our rivers and harbors as we would do if our Treasury were overflowing and our people were abounding in prosperity; but it is the time and the occasion where, economy being demanded, it can be most usefully employed without serious detriment to public interests.

This proposition is not without a precedent. The provision is an exact copy, except as to the sum and the dates of course, of the act of the 10th of April, 1869. In the sixteenth volume of the Statutes, page 44, is found this act:

That the sum of $2,000,000 is hereby appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and the year ending June 30, 1870, to be expended for the repair, extension, preservation, and completion of works for the improvement of rivers and harbors under the direction of the Secretary of War: Provided, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to cause such expenditures to be made so as best to subserve the interests of commerce; and he is required to report to Congress, at the opening of its December session, all expenditures made under the provisions of this act up to that time, in detail.

It will be seen therefore that the amendment which I have proposed is an exact reproduction of that act except in respect of the sum. I think myself this sum ought to be smaller; but to meet the views of gentlemen who have asked extensive improvements and appropriations, I have made it as large as I thought I could possibly vote for under the circumstances. I have for the reasons I have stated offered this amendment, believing it the best public interest, both of improvement as well as economy, to leave it to the responsible Corps of Engineers to take all the money we can now spare and apply it where the interests of commerce and the general interests of all the States most require it.

Mr. FERRY. I am sorry to say that all who have voted for the amendments to this bill do not prove themselves to be the friends of the bill. I am driven to say this by the proposition made by the Senator from Vermont. I do it in the best of spirit, with a desire to have some bill passed. Certainly this body does not wish to have a bill of this kind rejected. I can foresee by the substitute proposed by the Senator from Vermont that the wish is to kill the bill and have no river and harbor bill for this year. Why I take the ground I now propose to is that I think I have been logical in this, that I have sought to avoid an increase of this bill beyond the amount it contained when it came from the House. I had amendments, and had taken the regular course to submit these amendments by print and reference, but refused to offer them because I saw and felt in the progress of consideration that the bill would in the end be seriously loaded and perhaps be defeated. I first proposed to the Committee on Appropriations in behalf of the delegation of Michigan that we would consent to a modification of the House appropriations for that State to the reduction of $40,000, yes, $41,000, as I am reminded by my colleague.

Considering as the committee has, and as Congress hitherto had, that the appropriation for the Sault Ste. Marie of $200,000 and for the harbor of refuge of $100,000, and repeatedly made, were recognized as of national character and importance, it left us more especially for the State of Michigan but $225,000; and of that we were disposed to assent to a reduction by the Senate of $41,000 as an earnest of our desire to co-operate in the policy stated of economy.

This proposition was declined for good reasons, doubtless, on the part of the committee, and in that refusal I acquiesced with proper spirit.

When the bill from the committee was under consideration there were certain amendments made by the committee which I deemed to be unjust, and accordingly I asked the Senate for non-concurrence. In the non-concurrence of all of them I did not persist. All of the appropriations of the House which the committee rejected have not been non-concurred in by this body. The amount agreed upon by the Senate is less for Michigan than the House bill appropriated. On the principle of economy so assiduously asserted my course has placed me squarely, fairly, and justly. I have been disappointed, to say the least, with the character of some of the amendments offered by other Senators. To a certain extent I coincided, but as soon as I discovered that the object of putting amendments on the bill was to burden and defeat it I opposed further amendments. Now, because the bill has swollen by such means to a million of dollars over the report of the committee, the Senator from Vermont who also has voted to load the bills now submits a substitute to appropriate $4,000,000 to be distributed as the Engineer Department shall adjudge, instead of $5,800,000, as provided by the House bill.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in the judgment of the Senate committee who have had charge of this bill they have deemed the House bill substantially the proper amount upon which the Senate could justly stand; for I think their report did not advance it more than $40,000. Hence in the aggregate it is substantially the amount of the House bill.

Mr. THURMAN. And nearly a million more has been added.

Mr. FERRY. Not as recommended by the committee.

Mr. THURMAN. As recommended by the Senate.

Mr. FERRY. I referred to the bill as coming from the committee to the Senate, as confirmatory in amount of the judgment of the House. I think I am correct in the statement, because I interrogated the committee in the opening of its consideration, and the Senator in charge of the bill stated that the increase as proposed by the committee was between $30,000 and $40,000. I now appeal to the Senator in charge of the bill whether I am correct or not.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator is quite right about that, but the effect in the Senate has been to increase it more than $900,000.

Mr. FERRY. I am aware of that; but not with the assent of the committee, but by the Senate and materially aided by Senators who avowedly intended by their concurrence to so increase as to effectuate the defeat of the bill.

Mr. GORDON. I want to ask the Senator from Ohio, with the permission of my friend from Michigan, whether he understands the committee to say that the amendments made by the committee of the Senate increased the appropriations made by the House a million of dollars?

Mr. THURMAN. I say this, and it is the simplest thing in the world——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. FERRY. I yield.

Mr. THURMAN. Our committee struck out $945,000 of the appropriations made by the House, inserting appropriations in the aggregate to the amount of $980,000, increasing the appropriation made by the House bill $36,000. The Senate has defeated the committee on almost every proposition, thus keeping in the appropriations made by the House. The Senate have also concurred with the committee in adding the appropriations recommended by the committee, and they have adopted divers amendments offered neither by our committee nor coming from the House. The consequence of this is that the bill as it now stands instead of being a bill of about $5,800,000 is a bill to appropriate in round numbers nearly $7,000,000.

Mr. FERRY. Now I will come back to what I was stating.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Michigan has expired. Is there objection to his continuing. ["Go on."]

Mr. FERRY. I am not disposed to trespass on the time of the Senate, my intention being to warn the friends of the bill that its fate was now the issue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan will proceed.

Mr. FERRY. I stated that the bill as coming from the Senate committee did not increase substantially the House bill save about $40,000. In the judgment of that committee, therefore, by their amendments to the bill, they deemed the House bill in amount substantially correct. In the distribution of that amount they have stricken out paragraphs and inserted amendments. In respect of my own State they have added in two or three cases and stricken out in several others.

Now that it appears obvious that the object of those who have supported later amendments is to load down the bill for the purpose of its defeat, I ask of the friends of the bill that we waive all individual interest in special appropriations, and that we plant ourselves upon the judgment of the committee of the Senate in amount and rest on the House bill. As the two do not in the aggregate materially differ, we cannot by taking the House bill be much astray, since we have the confirming judgment of the Senate committee. Then we will have a law, if approved by the President. We will have a bill that appropriates $5,800,000, which the House of Representatives has passed, and this, remember, is the body of the people. We will then have affirmed their judgment, and indirectly shall have confirmed the judgment of our own committee, who have declared here by their report that the House bill in amount is about the just sum to be appropriated by this body.

I know that this may strike unfavorably in some localities, yet I believe, and I appeal for support to the friends of this bill, that it is the only way by which we can arrest concerted defeat and secure a river and harbor bill at this session. I dismiss all declamation that the Government cannot appropriate for the river and harbor bill. No better use of the public money in a moderate way can be made than in this direction. I am prepared here to say that the bill as passed by the House is not extravagant and no more than is demanded by the commercial interests of the country. I fully believe that the people throughout the country will support us in this action. I am ready to cast my vote upon it. I am willing to submit to the people that we have approved a measure sent here by the House of Representatives, which, while it did not satisfy each Senator, did meet the necessities of commerce in the main. I am willing to face the country on this approval rather than let the knife be plunged into the life of this bill. Let us, then, friends of the measure, unite upon this proposition. I am ready to support the House bill, as it seems we can do no better. Let us non-concur in this substitute; let us non-concur in every amendment of the committee; and let us fall back on the House bill and concur in that, and, with the President's approval, we shall have a river and harbor act.

Mr. THURMAN. The substitute offered by the Senator from Vermont proposes to place the sum of $4,000,000 in the hands of a single officer of the Government, to be expended substantially at his discretion. I do not say that I would not vote to do that if the proper officer were designated rather than to vote for the bill in its present condition, but if that proposition is to be adopted, the officer selected ought to be one who is not, in common parlance, a political officer; he ought to be one who is wholly removed from politics. I have certainly nothing to say against the Secretary of War; I have no imputation whatever to make upon him; but he is of that class of officers who are called political officers, and I do not think it would be wise to intrust this large sum of money in the hands of a political officer.

If, therefore, the amendment of the Senator from Vermont is to be pressed, I shall move to amend by striking out "Secretary of War" and putting in "Chief of Engineers," so as to put this money under the disposition and control of General Humphreys, the Chief of Engineers, an Army officer wholly removed from politics.

Mr. CONKLING. Let me ask the Senator a question, if I may?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there any officer in the Government, except the Commissioner of Patents, not the head of a Department, who has a right to report, and does by law report to Congress? And, if not, would it not be rather odd to commit to the head of a Bureau or a division in a Department a discretion of this sort and direct him to report to us?

Mr. THURMAN. I see no difficulty in directing any officer, whether he is the head of a Department or a subordinate officer, to report to us. My object in rising to these preliminary remarks on that subject was to show that I do not wish to be forced, if I can avoid it, to the adoption of a proposition that puts so large a sum of money under the control and within the discretion of any one man.

I therefore now move, and upon that I have a word or two to say, that this bill with the pending amendment be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to cut down the appropriations to a sum not to exceed in the aggregate $4,000,000. That motion I submit, which is in order now, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, sir. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to recommit the bill with the pending amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to say a word on this motion.

Mr. FERRY. With instructions?

Mr. THURMAN. With instructions.

Mr. FERRY. What are the instructions?

Mr. THURMAN. To cut down the appropriations to a sum not exceeding in the aggregate $4,000,000.

Mr. President, there is a cry all over the country for economy. There is a cry all over the country for reform. There is a cry all over the country that this people are taxed beyond endurance. There is a belief all over the country that the weight of taxation that rests upon the people is one of the greatest obstacles to a return of prosperity. This is a belief and in my judgment a well-founded belief. I do not think, in view of these facts, that it is right and proper for us to appropriate in this river and harbor bill a larger sum than ever has been appropriated in the most prosperous times of the Republic, for I think it will be difficult to find a bill of this character that ever passed Congress, even in the most prosperous and flush times of the Republic, that appropriated a sum of money equal to that appropriated by this bill as it now stands.

I have heard it said that it is a good distribution of the public money; that it will afford aid and relief here and there where the country is suffering. That is an argument in favor of paternal government. That is an argument that the Government must afford employment to everybody who is out of employment. If you once begin with that, pray where will you stop? If it is the interest of the Government, if it is the duty of the Government to take the taxes drawn from all classes of the people, but which in the end are drawn from the consumers, however poor they may be, and then undertake to dole out charity or afford employment to everybody who is in necessity in the country, if this General Government is to become a common almoner for all who are in want throughout the length and breadth of the land, I want to know what kind of a republican government you will have and what kind of a pure, economical, and reformed government you will have?

I want to vote for a fair and reasonable river and harbor bill. I want to vote for one which will go just as far as under the circumstances of the case we can go at this time; but I do not want to preach economy in one breath and expend $7,000,000 as this bill proposes to expend it.

Mr. FERRY. I will move an amendment to the instructions proposed by the Senator from Ohio, that the committee be instructed to report the House bill immediately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. FERRY. This will bring us directly to a vote on the House bill substantially. The issue comes squarely upon that question. I may err in judgment, but I consider that we stand now upon the life or the death of the bill. The Senator from Ohio has spoken of economy. I am not here in my place as a Senator in this body disposed to criticise the judgment of the House when the question is whether we take the House bill appropriating $5,800,000 or the Senate modifications swelling it to $8,800,000, and doubt long which is in the interest of economy. I am willing to measure my estimate of economy as between the two by supporting the judgment of the House. It is the people's body, composed of men who represent the different congressional districts, and who by force of which are doubtless more conversant with the commercial necessities of the various localities. Therefore in such support I am not intruding alone my own judgment. For in fact I am fortified by the judgment of the House and by the judgment of the Committee of Appropriations of the Senate, for, as I said in the remarks I submitted before, I now repeat both House and Senate committee came to the same amount substantially.

I appeal to the friends of this bill. Let us drop special interests. Let us consider the vital condition of this bill; that it is this or nothing. Instead of agreeing with my friend, who says, "Drop the whole bill," I say, "No; I am opposed to dropping the whole bill, because I believe the people demand a bill of this kind." We are differing upon the amount. I will rest upon the House and upon the original judgment of the committee. After having expressed ourselves here and consumed three days in the consideration of the bill, we have increased it by something like a million dollars. Some who have aided in this increase now seek to defeat the bill. Let us then go back to the point we started from, to the bill as it came from the House; and then, as I said before, with the President's approval we will have an act providing for the preservation and development of the harbors of the States, and in this way stimulate the growth of commerce and add largely to the prosperity of the nation.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I am opposed to the recommittal of this bill either with the instructions proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] or those proposed by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY.] The Senator from Michigan is quite correct perhaps in a constitutional sense when he calls the other House of this Congress "the people's body;" but if they are that this year, they have always been that. They may stand nearer the people than we do; they are no more responsible than we are. They undoubtedly in the aggregate know more of the commercial wants of the country than we do; there are more of them to know. [Laughter.] But, Mr. President, there never has been an appropriation bill of any description which passed the other House of Congress which was acceptable either to the Congress of the United States or to the people of the United States. The Constitution of the United States meant that this body should have a voice in legislation, should have something to say about the expenditures of money. Do not expect that in this year of our Lord the Senate will retire from that office. The mere fact that the House of Representatives has approved the bill which came to us for the purpose of improving your rivers or your harbors is not conclusive in my mind that the bill is the best it might be.

I therefore am not prepared to take the House bill. As an individual, I do not believe that that is the wisest way in which the aggregate amount appropriated could be expended. I am strengthened in this conclusion by the report of the committee of this body, which has considered the subject and which has reported to this House a variety of amendments. I will not agree to the recommittal of this bill under the instructions moved by the honorable Senator from Ohio. He suggests two things: first, instead of letting the aggregate amount be expended according to the amendment moved by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] under the direction of the Secretary of War, whom he is pleased to call a political officer, he asks that it should be expended under the direction of a Bureau officer. I have no less confidence in the judgment or in the integrity of the Chief of Engineers than has the Senator from Ohio. I have not a doubt that, if the money be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, as proposed by the Senator from Vermont, or, according to the terms of the amendment, under the direction of the Chief of Engineers, the Chief of Engineers will substantially direct the expenditure; but I will not agree to cashier by my vote the Secretary of War. He is at the head of that Department, happily or unhappily; I believe happily, and not unhappily; but until he has been tried and is found wanting I will not agree by my vote to cashier him; and while he holds that place I will not by my vote agree to put any subordinate of his above him. Therefore I should entirely disagree to the proposal of the Senator from Ohio upon that point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is a general question. I do not think the rule ought to apply to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. CONKLING and Mr. INGALLS. The rule does not apply to this question at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not apply to a motion to recommit at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is a fact. The Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. HOWE. I have one word of criticism to make upon the amendment moved by the Senator from Vermont. He proposes an expenditure of $4,000,000 during the current fiscal year for the purpose of improving the channels of commerce throughout this broad continent. Certain Senators seem to start back affrighted at the idea that the bill as it stands proposes an expenditure of nearly $7,000,000. It would be a great deal of money for me to pay, I admit; the payment of it would embarrass me; but if you mean honestly to devote yourselves to the improvement of your channels of commerce throughout the continent, stretching from one ocean to the other and from the lakes to the Gulf, the sum of $7,000,000 is not a profligate sum; the sum of $4,000,000 is a pitiful sum. O, says the Senator from Ohio, we are in danger of exposing ourselves to the charge of being a paternal government. A great many accusations could be hurled against the Government that it could not stand up under so well as that, I think. If a government should happen to have in its administration a little paternal feeling, slightly tinctured with charity, I could even forget an offense so monstrous as that. Is it treason to the Constitution for the Government of the United States to be even at times a little charitable? Were you never? When cities are burned you have sent charity to those cities, and when foreign peoples have hungered you have freighted vessels carrying your own flag and at your own cost to carry them food. I do not think it the most disreputable work in which the Government of the United States could ever engage.

There was years ago a Napoleon who reigned in France. It is a commonly received opinion that he was not a mean statesman nor a very vulgar politician; and we know, for history tells us, that more than once when the people of France hungered for food because they could not get work he inaugurated great works of public improvement for the express purpose of giving employment to those who could not find employment elsewhere. The policy of that may be doubtful here. It might have been doubtful there. It is a policy which I do not commend to the Senator from Ohio, and it is a policy which I do not commend to the Senate of the United States. It is a policy not expressed in this bill, and not suggested by this bill.

Mr. THURMAN rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator from Ohio wants me to yield, I do.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to state to my learned friend that he will find a much more striking example in Roman history when the party in power in Rome gave to the people bread and shows, panem et circenses.

Mr. HOWE. If I was half as well read in history as my honorable friend from Ohio, I know I could give a better example than I did here. I was speaking upon the exigency of the moment, and I ventured to suggest to him such instances as occurred to me at the moment. I say that the policy to which I referred is not the policy of the bill before us. It is not the policy which I commend. I do not ask that a dollar should be appropriated during the current year for work that will not yield to the people more than the dollars you expend upon them. I have not asked it. I know as surely as I know I stand here that you might expend even in the districts with which I am acquainted personally, not merely the amount of money asked for in this bill, but double the amount the very next year, and instead of making the people of the United States poorer thereby you would make them richer thereby. I know that. It is because the wants of your internal commerce call for these appropriations that I champion them.

I am not prepared to say but that there may be appropriations in the bill as it stands which it is not wise to make, which are not careful. I have listened to the explanations from time to time of the honorable Senator who has charge of the bill, and I have thought sometimes that the evidence adduced did not justify making all these appropriations, and I have voted against a large portion of them. Notwithstanding, pass the bill as it stands, and I am firm in the belief that instead of the people of the United States being made poorer by the appropriation they will be made richer by the appropriation.

Sir, I did not mean to trespass upon the time of the Senate. I am as much in favor of an honest, sensible economy, I think, as any man on this floor. I am as much opposed to that sort of economy which is merely fabricated for the month of November next as any man who was ever born. I have not any stomach for that sort of thing. I want appropriations made when good judgment justifies them, and not at any other time. There may be, I say again, appropriations here which I would be glad to strike out. I know there are appropriations here, and a great many of them, which I voted against; but those whom I could not control have ingrafted them upon the bill, and the question which seems to be presented to me at this moment is, shall we sacrifice the bill because of those objectionable features? I would not myself object to agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont if he would increase the amount to be distributed from $4,000,000 to $6,000,000 or $5,500,000; but to propose the bare sum of $4,000,000 in the name of commerce to meet the wants of this country is such a beggarly kind of legislation that I cannot for one assent to it.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I think the object aimed at by the Senators who have spoken upon this bill is the same with each, to economize; and yet between what is necessary for the improvement of these rivers and for the preservation of the works which have already been begun I apprehend that there are things in this bill which ought not to have been here. I apprehend that there are amounts given to certain works too large, greater possibly than the necessities of the case require; but I apprehend that that has been the truth with regard to every such bill that has ever passed the Congress of the United States. I am quite sure that the Senator from Ohio, my friend on my right, [Mr. THURMAN,] is mistaken, if I understood his assertion that this bill provides for an appropriation larger than has ever occurred before in the history of this country—I mean the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. THURMAN. I did not say that. I said the bill as it now stands.

Mr. GORDON. But the proposition submitted by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] is to non-concur in all the amendments made by the Senate, and I apprehend upon that proposition a large majority of this body will agree. The House bill, as it comes to us, provides, according to my estimate, for about $6,000,000 of appropriation; probably a little under that.

Mr. COCKRELL. Five million eight hundred and sixty thousand dollars.

Mr. GORDON. That is less by a million, if my recollection serves me aright, than the appropriation bill passed at the last session of Congress. There is not, so far as my knowledge goes, in the limits of my own State, one single appropriation which has been made in this bill which might not, with an eye single to true economy and the real development of the country and the ultimate paying of the national debt, have been doubled and trebled. Take the case of a river in North Georgia, the Coosa River, to which is appropriated the paltry sum of $40,000. It traverses a region of iron which would furnish enough metal to bind up this entire continent almost, with coal enough in the mountains in immediate contiguity to this iron to smelt every ton of iron in it, and the engineers call for an appropriation of between $300,000 and $400,000; and yet so great has been the stretch of economy by the House that they have refused to give to that river over $40,000.

Take the case of the Ocmulgee River, in Southern Georgia, which my colleague appealed for yesterday, which was stricken out by the Senate committee. Over that river passes not only 100,000 bales of cotton per annum, but one-fourth of the entire lumber that is exported from the whole United States. Think of it, sir. One-fourth of the entire export of lumber from the United States passes down this river, which was stricken out from any appropriation whatever by the Senate committee. I say, sir, when you come to analyze each particular appropriation as I am doing—but I will not consume the time of the Senate longer—a kindred state of facts will be found with reference to every one of them.

The Senator from Michigan struck the key-note when he said that the members of the House were fresh from the people and they were acquainted with the local wants of the people; they know the condition of these rivers, the necessity for improvement; and I apprehend we can make no mistake if we recede from our position and stand by the House bill; and as that seems to be the object of the friends of the measure to get at the House bill in the shortest and most expeditious manner, I want to appeal to my friend from Michigan to withdraw his amendment and let us come to a vote upon the motion of my friend from Ohio. If that should be voted down, then we can come to the proposition made by my friend from Michigan to nonconcur in all the amendments made by the Senate committee and ask a vote directly upon that question when we get into the Senate. I hope therefore my friend will withdraw his motion.

Mr. FERRY. As my object is the same that is now suggested by the Senator from Georgia and the reason why I offered my amendment to the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] was because the motion to recommit has precedence of my first proposition that we non-concur in all the amendments and take the House bill, which we could do on the bill being reported to the Senate by non-concurrence in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole, I will withdraw, at the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia, my amendment to the motion of the Senator from Ohio, to instruct further the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn, and the question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words in reply to what has been said; I do not want to take up the time of the Senate. I do not believe that any Senator on this floor can sit down and coolly reflect upon the condition of the country and say that we ought to appropriate $4,000,000 on this bill. It is useless to say that this country affords a wide field for improvement. Certainly it does; so wide a field that you might appropriate a thousand millions of dollars instead of four or seven millions, and still there would be much work to be done to make this country what some ardent enthusiastic lover of improvement thinks it ought to be. There is no end to improvement. It has been said that a man can bury the national exchequer in the improvement of a tract of land of one hundred and sixty acres, and so he can; and when you go into this work of improvement, improvement such as every local neighborhood shall demand or desire, or such as every interested person or set of persons shall promote, there is no end to improvement. The question with us is how much can we afford to give. Under the present circumstances, at a time when we are cutting down everywhere, when we are proposing to cut down the salaries of clerks whose salaries were fixed twenty years ago and who are living at starvation wages now or nearly so, when you are cutting down everywhere, reducing everywhere, it is proposed that on the other hand you shall extend your internal improvement appropriations beyond what they ever amounted to before.

Mr. President, upon this subject I must say that the world moves faster than I do. I cannot help it; it may be my misfortune. I can recollect the time when not a man in all the Senate of the United States or the House of Representatives would have ventured to defend appropriations that are in this bill; when not a man in either branch of Congress would have said that appropriations that I can point out in this bill were within the competency of Congress to enact. We know the long struggle on the question of internal improvements; we know how finally the strict constructionists came to agree that, in respect to what Mr. Calhoun called inland seas, the Mississippi, Missouri, and the like, the power should be conceded; but to go into every little sunfish creek, to go into every raccoon fork, wholly within the bounds of a State and make appropriations of $10,000 or $20,000 to improve canoe navigation is a thing which no man thirty years ago, when I had the honor of a seat in the other House, ever dreamed could be constitutional.

Where are we to end? I say it with some satisfaction that to the best of my knowledge and belief not one dollar was ever appropriated by the Federal Government for the improvement of a river that lies wholly within the State of Ohio. She has asked, through her representatives, that her ports on her great lake in the north of the State should be improved. She would have been extremely content to take 10 per cent. of the customs received at those ports for the improvement of the ports. She has asked that the great river that bounds her on the south, and that runs between five or six States, shall be improved; and no one has gainsaid the justice or propriety of that; but to ask that her little rivers and creeks within her own boundaries shall be made navigable for some petty steamboat that runs thirty or forty miles is what that State never has asked, and I trust in God never will.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I trust whatever else may be done with this bill that it will not be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Appropriations undertook an earnest and honest work with reference to this bill. They found the bill appropriating $5,872,000 of money. They examined in detail every item of the bill, and undertook to sift from it such appropriations as were not absolutely necessary for the continuation of great works of national improvement and for the preservation and protection of harbors of general usefulness in the commerce of the country. They brought in this bill with amendments striking out $945,000, and inserting, it is true, about the same sum; but I call the attention of Senators to the character of the amendments proposed by the Committee on Appropriations. For the great harbor of New York, at which is concentrated almost the entire commerce of this country, there was found in this bill an appropriation of but $200,000 for carrying on the improvements in the East River at Hell Gate. We increased that appropriation $150,000. For the great river the Mississippi, threading, as it does, some ten or fifteen States of this Union, with its tributaries, there was but $100,000 appropriated for the improvement of its mouth, when the Engineer Department of the Government said that was not enough. So of various great harbors in this country. The Committee on Appropriations undertook to take the advice of the Engineer Bureau of this Government in order that the appropriations made in this bill might be of utility. We increased, therefore, the appropriations at the great harbors and upon the great rivers of the country.

When this bill came back into the Senate every item of appropriation struck out by the Committee on Appropriations was re-inserted in the bill, and the Senator from Ohio who now favors a reduction of the total appropriation to $4,000,000 voted for the increase of every appropriation in his own State above the recommendation of the committee, and notably so in two instances where the engineer officer in charge of the very work stated to us that the amount suggested by the committee was sufficient to carry on that improvement for the present year.

And the Senator from Michigan—I am just beginning to understand this bill—the Senator from Michigan now comes in open Senate and appeals to what he calls the friends of this bill to stand by the House bill because the appropriations there made were made by the immediate representatives of the people. Does the Senator from Michigan mean to abdicate the rights of the Senate to judge of an appropriation bill, and turn it over, with reference to this bill and all other bills, to the absolute exclusive judgment of the House of Representatives?

Mr. FERRY. Does the Senator want a reply?

Mr. ALLISON. Of course I have no objection to hearing one.

Mr. FERRY. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the proposition of the Senator from Michigan with reference to this bill; that we shall take it verbatim et literatim as it came from the House, without dotting an i or crossing a t; without putting in a semicolon or a comma, and pass it through, when the debates on this measure in the Senate disclose that very many of these appropriations as passed by the House are absolutely worthless, and notably two of them in the State of Michigan, which by his proposition would remain in this bill. One of them is McCargoe's Cove, a place which no man in this Chamber, so far as I have understood, has yet been able to ascertain the existence and location of—"no fellow can find it out;" that is one of the things that cannot be discovered. Yet, McCargoe's Cove is in this bill for $15,000, and the Senator from Michigan appeals to the Senate to pass this bill as it came from the House in order that McCargoe's Cove may be improved. [Laughter.]

I know it was the misfortune of the Committee on Appropriations that we did not increase the appropriations for the State of Michigan to any great degree. We did increase the appropriations in the State of Michigan to the extent of fifteen or twenty thousand dollars; $8,000 at Saint Joseph, Michigan, because it was stated by the Senator from Michigan and others that this was a harbor of refuge, and it was necessary to have a larger appropriation than that provided by the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But you reduced them on the whole, so that they will get more on the House bill than on your recommendation.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir. So again of that great lumber harbor of Saginaw; that harbor we increased from the House appropriation $15,000, and increased over the estimates of the Engineer Bureau $15,000.

Mr. MERRIMON. Why so?

Mr. ALLISON. Why? We did it because it was said that if we would increase that appropriation $15,000 we could get another foot of water in this harbor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Who said so? You said the engineers did not recommend it.

Mr. ALLISON. The Engineer Bureau did state that an additional expenditure would give another foot of water at this harbor, but they said furthermore that it was impossible to state how many vessels that would benefit. They have there now thirteen feet of water, and the proposition of the Engineer Bureau was to create a depth of fourteen feet of water. We inserted that appropriation, which was a new appropriation, recognizing the fact that this was a great lumber harbor and that there was a great trade there. We recognized that fact and increased the appropriation at that particular place in order that they might get an additional foot of water. Now the Senator from Michigan appeals to this body not to stand by what they have done heretofore, but to take this House bill without amendment and without inserting what the Engineer Bureau of this Government say is absolutely necessary to carry on the great works of national importance which are now being conducted by that department with reference to the commerce of this country.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will my friend tell me what amount the bill as passed by the House appropriated for works in the State of Michigan?

Mr. ALLISON. In answer to that I will state that the Committee on Appropriations did not know State lines or State boundaries. The State of Michigan has in all in the bill as it came from the House about $525,000 or $530,000; but I will not go into a question of arithmetic with my friend from Michigan on that point.

Mr. FERRY. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but on a question of fact let me say a word. I stated that, except the $200,000 for Sault Ste. Marie and the $100,000 for the harbor of refuge, which the Senator himself had declared to be a national work, there was left $225,000 in the House bill. I think I am correct.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly. I do not go into a controversy with the Senator from Michigan as to whether Michigan has its proper share. I do not look upon this bill as a bill of plunder. I supposed it was a bill initiated and passed, if it ever does pass, for the purpose of extending and improving the commerce of this country, and whether Michigan gets $200,000 or the half of this appropriation did not enter into the calculation or the consideration of this committee. We did not figure up any State. I do not know what Michigan has in this bill; I only know it as I have gathered it from this debate. But what I object to is that, according to the proposition of the Senator from Michigan, the Senate is to abdicate its authority, surrender absolutely to the House. Why is this bill of such an extraordinary character? These amendments have all been put on in this bill by a majority of more than two-thirds of the body, increasing the appropriations, and almost every Senator has voted for one or more of the increases made in the bill. I do not see that we are in such an extraordinary condition that we cannot go on with this bill as we go on with other bills; but, if we cannot do that, then let us do something else; but above all things do not recommit this bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, I would not rise for another word, only I cannot pass what has been stated by the Senator from Iowa. In defense of the bill the Senator has carried the impression that I had for my State a special interest in falling back on the House bill, and I rise for the purpose of correcting that impression and verifying the position I took, which was that to save a bill of some kind, I suggested we should have the House bill inasmuch as it was palpable that the Senate was determined to kill the bill as now modified. I do not say that that is the object, although we cannot tell yet whether the Senator who has proposed the substitute reducing the amount to $4,000,000 will vote for the bill then. I cannot say. I take it for granted that he would. But aside from that, the object of some who have voted for amendments in the latter part of the bill has confessedly been to so increase the bill as to thus justify more in voting against it and thus kill the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. May I interrupt the Senator a moment? There has not been added to this bill $40,000 except what was proposed by the Committee on Appropriations and corresponding reductions made on the House bill.

Mr. FERRY. I stated that in prior remarks.

Mr. ALLISON. I beg pardon; I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. FERRY. I then put the question to the Senator in order to verify my statement, if I was not correct that the report of the Senate committee increased the House bill only some $40,000. The Senator now states that it is $40,000. He has forgotten that I put the question to him in the early consideration of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator does not understand what I mean. I mean to say that there have been no additions to this bill as it stands, made by the Senate, except additions amounting in the aggregate to $40,000; so that there has been no riding down of this bill as it came from the Committee on Appropriations except by agreeing to our provisions.

Mr. FERRY. I understood from the Senator from Vermont that the bill had been increased now over a million; that it came from the House $5,800,000 and was now $7,000,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not say anything of the kind. I said that as it was reported from the committee it was increased $36,000. I said according to the votes of the Senator and his confrères, and I resisted them as long as I could, they had carried it up to the point I named. Now the Senator wants to keep it there by sticking to the House bill.

Mr. FERRY. What is the amount?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is now $6,858,000, with all you have stuck on it.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from Vermont states that the bill now stands, as modified by the Senate in Committee of the Whole, $6,800,000 and over. That is not very different from the statement of my recollection of what he had put it at, $7,000,000. As it came from the House it was $5,800,000 and over. So that the Senate and the committee of the Senate have increased the bill something like a million of dollars. Now, my proposition is to fall back upon the House bill as it came from the House, which would be $5,800,000. I reply to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] that I do not differ with him upon his statement of the increase made by the Senate committee to be but $40,000, and have so said. The large increase of a million has been made by the Senate.

Let me not be misunderstood as to why I propose as I have. I am willing to vote for the bill as the Senate has now shaped it; but I see by indications that there are enough who are disposed to kill the bill with the present amendments; and, convinced of that, I have fallen back upon the House bill, rather than have no bill at all. I prefer to take the House bill rather than nothing, as the result evidently would be from present apparent intentions.

Now I come back to the State of Michigan. The increase proposed by the committee on the House appropriation for the State of Michigan was $14,000 for Saginaw, and $8,000 for Saint Joseph. That the Senate have concurred in. In the case of Saint Joseph, last year $35,000 was appropriated. In the House bill, instead of appropriating as was done last year for harbor and river, they left out "river" and therefore Benton Harbor was not provided for, a work already commenced by the Government. I am not disposed to take up time to go into details, but will say in explanation that there is a bridge that has been built over that river that has interfered somewhat with navigation, necessitating the development of the river inside so as to protect Benton Harbor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Who authorized the bridge?

Mr. FERRY. The State of Michigan, I suppose; but that is not the particular point to which I am inviting attention. As long as that bridge remains, the entrance is obstructed more or less, to obviate which the Government has appropriated money to open a fitter channel by which Benton Harbor can be reached. That was appropriated last year under the phrase "harbor and river." The House committee omitted that by accident. The Senate have restored that and given $8,000, in order to provide for Benton Harbor which was not provided for by the House, and have given in all $20,000, instead of $35,000, as appropriated last year.

Now in regard to Saginaw. One moment's attention to the paragraph will show that the appropriation of the House applies simply to the river of Saginaw; nothing for the harbor.

Mr. PADDOCK. How much for it?

Mr. FERRY. Eleven thousand dollars for the river and nothing for the harbor. I think I have the liberty of saying that it was accidentally omitted by the House; a communication of which fact has been sent to the committee of the Senate; and it was in view of that that the amendment of $14,000 additional was made to provide for the harbor. So that, if the House bill is adopted, Michigan loses that $22,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How much does she lose on the whole?

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from Vermont asks me how much Michigan loses on the whole if we take the House bill to-day. I say she loses the two amendments offered by the committee, $22,000, less appropriation for McCargoe's Cove of fifteen thousand. If the bill of the House is adopted that will be restored. But aside from that, Michigan will stand $22,000 less; and had I followed the example of other Senators and asked to reconsider that amendment which was concurred in and replace what had been rejected, this $15,000 for that cove would have been concurred in by the Senate.

But notwithstanding this example and that my amendments were pending before the committee, I refused to offer any; nor have I moved to reconsider any that have been passed over. The proposition that I now suggest to the Senate is to non-concur in the amendments of the committee, simply that and nothing else. I waived amendments, and waived reconsideration of rejected appropriations, and stand upon the House bill if it is proposed to defeat the bill as it now stands. If failure is to attend this by the votes of supposed friends, then I am for falling back to the next best thing, and that is the House bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FERRY. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator says he loses by his proposition, taking the House bill just as it came from the House, simple and pure, as distinguished from what he would get if we take the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. FERRY. With the exception of McCargoe's Cove.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But on the whole if we take the House bill how much money is appropriated to the State of Michigan?

Mr. FERRY. If we take the House bill, we appropriate for the State of Michigan, including Sault Ste. Marie and the harbor of refuge, $525,500.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, if you will take the House bill as reported by the committee with its amendments, how much is appropriated for Michigan on the committee's report?

Mr. FERRY. Forty-one thousand dollars less than the House bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the way I understood it; which makes it $40,000 the other way.

Mr. FERRY. The Senate committee's report is $41,000 less than the House bill. I stated that in my remarks; but the Senator has not forgotten that the Senate non-concurred in several of the amendments of the committee striking out various appropriations to Michigan, so that the bill as it now stands I prefer and am ready to vote for it. The Senator, however, with others, shows a disposition to defeat it. To prevent this, I urge the adoption of the House bill.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, what is the question now pending before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to recommit the bill with the pending amendments to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to cut down the total appropriations to $4,000,000.

Mr. WHYTE. I believe that yesterday I was the first Senator that called the attention of the Senate to the road upon which they were going, and I warned them that they would haul up at a very uncomfortable place before they got through, and I think we have reached that now, Mr. President.

I was educated in that school of politics, of which I am not ashamed, that used to incorporate as a plank in the platform that the Constitution does not confer upon Congress the right to commence or carry on a general system of internal improvements. I was brought up from the cradle to believe in that doctrine. I stood by Franklin Pierce when he vetoed the river and harbor bill in 1854, and I believe that veto was a well-considered message to Congress. As time has rolled on we have become as extravagant in our appropriations for these purposes as we became during the war in almost everything relating to private expenditure. When I yesterday called the attention of the Senate to the fact that by restoring the appropriations which the Committee on Appropriations had stricken out, and adding the increases which they had suggested, we should have a larger sum total of appropriation than had ever passed through both Houses of Congress for the improvement of rivers and harbors, I heard "O, no; O, no," all around the Senate Chamber, and I presumed that in my bad eyesight I had mistaken the figures. But I assert it to-day now as a truth, as I asserted it yesterday, and I challenge contradiction of my figures, that if this bill passes as it is now in Committee of the Whole, it will be the largest appropriation for rivers and harbors that ever has passed Congress since the foundation of the Government; and in this time of trial to the American people, it is a shame and a reproach to the representatives of the people. I have made up my mind that I shall vote against this bill. Whether as it came from the House or as it has been doctored by the Senate, it never shall receive my support.

Mr. President, anterior to the war, when the country was in great prosperity, and we were upheld in the eyes of all nations, growing richer and richer day by day, and more powerful as a nation, we were satisfied to appropriate less than half a million dollars for those great works of public improvement which would promote the commerce and navigation of the whole country. Many men who had serious doubts as to the constitutional power of Congress to appropriate at all, yielded their constitutional scruples, and voted frequently for appropriations that were for the improvement of navigable rivers, such rivers as Congress under the judiciary act gave to the courts of the United States jurisdiction over, and afterward, when the old judiciary act was increased in its spread and growth by the act of 1845, we went a step further and appropriated money for those rivers and harbors of the coast and the great inland seas because it was in the interest of that commerce which was being carried on between the States. But our fathers would have raised up their hands in horror if they had seen us making appropriations for Accotink Creek and French Broad River and New River and these various rivers inside of States upon which you might float an ordinary batteau and nothing more. No, Mr. President, the last appropriation, as I remember, before the war was only over $300,000, the appropriation in 1860, and then in 1871 we began again with $4,834,000; in 1872, $5,401,000; in 1873, $6,321,000; in 1874, $5,511,000; in 1875, $6,293,000, and now, in the days of economy and retrenchment, we propose to launch a bill for rivers and harbors amounting in its appropriations to $6,700,000 or $6,800,000.

No, Mr. President, I will not vote to curtail the salaries of the clerks in your Departments; no, I will not vote to cut down the salaries of your clerks and your collectors in the custom-houses of the country; no, I will not vote to cut down my own salary, in the interest of economy and retrenchment, and then pour out in a torrent like Niagara the public money at the expense of $7,000,000 to the tax-paying people of this country. Others may do it and may do it conscientiously; but educated as I have been, I cannot in a day or an hour change the course through which my political life has been running.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. KERNAN. To what hour will it be if we adjourn?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Till eleven o'clock. That is now the regular hour of meeting.

The question being put, there was on a division—ayes 32, noes 17.

So the motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and forty-eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 15, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXPENDITURES IN THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. BEEBE. On behalf of the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, I ask unanimous consent that the testimony taken by that committee be printed.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the unfinished business, the report of the Committee on Texan Border Troubles. Pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that the speeches be limited to fifteen minutes each and the entire debate in committee to an hour and a half.

Mr. EDEN. Are we not entitled to the morning hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not if the House chooses by a majority vote to adopt the motion of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. SCHLEICHER.]

Mr. EDEN. Can a majority suspend the rules of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour may be postponed by a majority vote. That is within the power of the House.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS.]

RELIEF OF GENERAL CUSTER'S FAMILY.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for present consideration two bills. Before they are read I wish to say a few words to indicate their character and the reasons why I ask this prompt action on the part of the House. They refer to the condition of the family of General Custer, consisting at present of his wife and his aged father and mother, whose three sons, one grandson, and one son-in-law fell in the recent sad disaster on the Little Big Horn.

One of these bills proposes to give to Mrs. Custer, the widow of General Custer, $50, the sum that was given to the widow of General Canby, who fell in the Modoc war, and has been given to families of other superior officers who fell under like circumstances of peculiar sacrifice.

The other bill, Mr. Speaker, which is for the benefit of the aged couple who have already, I understand—indeed, I know—passed the age of three score and ten, provides they shall be paid $80 a month during their lives, and the survivor $80. At most, these people cannot long survive, and certainly a grateful country owes to parents so situated and in dependent circumstances this small relief.

I hold in my hand a letter signed by the most eminent people in Monroe, where this couple reside, from which I will read an extract:

> We need not formally acquaint you with the tragic and terrible event which robbed the State and nation of one of its bravest and noblest soldiers; his worth and general excellence of character are well known to you, a brother officer; but we desire now to bring to your notice the sad fact that in this fell blow his worthy, respectable, and aged parents are deprived of their only means of support. In fact, we have the knowledge that the financial affairs of General Custer are left in such a condition that the family are about penniless. We feel that we have but to mention this to you to secure your prompt and vigorous action toward securing from the present Congress an act for a special pension for these afflicted people during the remainder of their lives, which at the longest can be but for a few years—this venerable couple who have thus seen their three sons sacrificed in the service of the Government. Even their little home is so heavily incumbered that they must lose it unless material aid is extended to them.

They were dependent, Mr. Speaker, upon these noble, I may say heroic, sons, who have fallen in the service of their country. I ask that the bills may be read and put on their passage.

Mr. TERRY. I desire to say only a word on the bills now sought to be introduced by my friend from Michigan.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As soon as the bills are reported for the information of the House the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Virginia. The Clerk will read the first bill.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS. I ask to introduce, by unanimous consent, a bill (H. R. No. 3894) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Custer, widow of the late George A. Custer.

The bill, which was read, provides that a pension at the rate of $50 a month from and after the passage of this act be granted to Mrs. Elizabeth Custer, widow of George A. Custer, late lieutenant-colonel of the Seventh United States Cavalry and brevet major-general, during her widowhood, and that the Secretary of the Interior be directed to place her name on the pension-rolls, subject, except as hereinbefore provided, to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now read the second bill for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill granting a pension to Emanuel H. and Maria Custer.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, except as hereinafter provided, the names of Emanuel H. Custer and Maria Custer, his wife, the father and mother of the late Lieutenant-Colonel and Brevet Major-General George A. Custer and the late Thomas W. Custer, captain and brevet lieutenant-colonel, both of the Seventh United States Cavalry, and to pay to the said Emanuel H. Custer and Maria Custer, and to the survivor of them, a pension of $80 per month from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Michigan whether it is so drawn that $80 is to be paid to the whole family or for each member?

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS. Only one $80 to the father and mother, and one $80 dollars to the survivor of them.

Mr. GARFIELD. I should like to ask the gentleman whether it cannot be construed to mean $80 to each one?

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS. O, no; only one $80.

Mr. RUSK. The question before the House is whether unanimous consent shall be granted to the bill being now considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the question before the House.

Mr. RUSK. I say this is a most extraordinary bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope there will be no objection to the passage of the first bill for the relief of the widow of General Custer. The facts of the case are well known to the House. I think if we follow precedents we may safely say—certainly we may hope—that no such precedent as the death of General Custer under the circumstances is likely to occur again. I believe, in the three or four great slaughters in history from the days of Thermopylæ down, there has never before been a total and absolute slaughter of the whole command as in the case of General Custer. I do not inquire in the question of fault in carrying out orders. His unexampled gallantry and heroic death answer all controversy. I hope the bill will pass without objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio has not the floor for remarks. The gentleman from Virginia holds the floor. There is no question before the House but asking unanimous consent. The Chair holds that in all such cases the bill asked to be introduced by unanimous consent should be read first for the information of the House. If there is no objection to the bills at this time they can be considered. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. The inquiry applies to both bills?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the Chair will confine it to the first bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the introduction of the first bill for the relief of the widow of General Custer?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. RUSK. I wish to have the provisions of the first bill read, as I was not in and do not know exactly what they are.

The bill was again read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There being no objection, the bill is now before the House for consideration.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. TERRY. I do not think it just to allow this occasion to pass without saying a word in support of the bill which has just been read. It comes before the House with the informal approval of the Committee on Military Affairs, with which committee I have the honor of serving, and is unanimously indorsed by that committee, and as a member of that committee I do——

Mr. RUSK. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. Is this report from the Committee on Military Affairs? It is irregular if it is.

Mr. TERRY. I will say to the gentleman, if he will allow me to explain, that this bill was mentioned privately in the Committee on Military Affairs and has its indorsement, although it is not the formal report of the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That does not affect the position of the bill. It has been properly introduced.

Mr. TERRY. I was proceeding to say that the name of Custer is familiar to the people of this country not less by his death in the peculiar circumstances under which it occurred, which will eternally throw a halo of glory around his name, but on account of his brilliant career in the late civil war, in which he displayed a gallantry which scarcely any equaled and none surpassed. I hope this side of the House at least will be unanimous in paying this just tribute of respect to the gallant and brave man who has fallen at the head of his brave followers.

Mr. COX. The gentleman who is now near my seat [Mr. RUSK] has surmised that this proceeding was somewhat irregular. Indeed this whole proceeding with respect to General Custer partakes of a sad irregularity. His death was irregular in many sad ways. Whatever we may think, Mr. Speaker, of the origin of this Indian war in which he fell as a sacrifice, whatever we may think of the action of the War Department or of the commanders over him, or whatever may be our thought otherwise, it seems to me this House should not hesitate a moment in giving this relief by both bills to his widow and family and to his father and mother who were dependent upon him and upon his relatives who fell with him in this terrible massacre. I therefore appeal to the gentleman from Wisconsin not to impede the progress of the passage of these bills. It is better than a monument to Custer. It is kinder and more becoming the American Congress and more in consonance to-day with the feeling of the American people. And it is a proud thing to see a gentleman like my friend from Virginia, [Mr. TERRY,] who was in our civil war against Custer when he gained his loftiest plaudits, urging this House to make no obstruction to the passage of these bills. I knew General Custer for many years. He was born in Ohio. He lived near its border. His honor is shared not only by Ohio and Michigan, but by the whole country to-day. He was a man of rare cultivation; a literary man in many elegant ways. He was a man of rare generosity of character and liberality. He gave away all that the country gave him in the shape of money. These families were dependent upon him; and when his brothers and others of his connections fell with him, this House can do no less than pass both bills, even though it may seem a little irregular to the gentleman from Wisconsin. I hope the objection will be withdrawn, and that the bills may be put upon their passage by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEVENSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York if any provision is to be made for the pay of pensions to the families of other officers and privates who fell?

Mr. COX. I have not named any names in that connection. I hope those cases will be properly considered.

Mr. RUSK. I have not the least objection to the bill for the relief of the widow of General Custer by paying her a pension of $50 per month. That has been the custom heretofore. But gentlemen will recollect that in the last Congress the Committee on Invalid Pensions presented a bill allowing a pension of $50 a month to the widow of Captain Thomas, who fell in the Modoc war, and who was slaughtered in the same way as General Custer. That proposition was rejected, and she was only allowed a pension of $30 a month. I merely speak of this now to show that the House was not so liberal in that case as it proposes to be in this. I asked that that pension be granted by unanimous consent in that case, but the proposition was rejected.

In regard to the second bill I will say that when a pension has been granted it has been the custom that each person whose loss may be represented by a pension shall be represented by one representative only. The second bill proposes, as I understand it, to place on the pension-rolls at $80 per month three representatives, the wife, the mother, and the father.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Eighty dollars covers the whole.

Mr. RUSK. I do not so understand it.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Eighty dollars a month covers the whole pension granted by the second bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would remark that the second bill is not properly under discussion at this time. The question is on the first bill introduced by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. RUSK. I have no objection to the first bill, and will give it my heartiest support, though I think it should have come from the Committee on Invalid Pensions; and as one of the committee I would have been cheerfully ready to report it at the earliest moment.

The bill (H. R. No. 3894) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Custer, widow of the late George A. Custer, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now report the second bill.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS. I wish to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will wait till the bill has been reported at the Clerk's desk, because it is still a question whether the House will consider it at this time.

The bill was again read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. RUSK. I hope the gentleman from Michigan will consent that it shall go to the Committee on Invalid Pensions; we will give it an early consideration.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS. It is very late in the session, and I have consulted some of the members of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, who approved of the bill.

Mr. RUSK. If the gentleman will consent that it shall be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I am willing that that committee shall have leave to report it back immediately or at any time.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS. Allow me to state a fact or two in connection with this matter. Here were three sons of the parties for whose benefit this bill is intended killed. Two of them were not married, and of course no pension results from their death. For that reason these pensions should go to the dependent parents. They lost also a grandson in that massacre.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. AINSWORTH and Mr. RUSK objected.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will withdraw his objection. The Committee on Invalid Pensions will undoubtedly be ready to report a bill at any time, and it seems ungracious to delay the matter.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I intend to introduce a bill to cover all these cases.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I arise to a parliamentary inquiry. I heartily agree with the bill to pension the widow of the late General Custer; but I would go further. In many a humble home in the United States the widow and orphans, or perchance aged parents of private soldiers who fell under the lead of the gallant Custer, mourn the loss of the dead one. These less noted ones are apt to be overlooked. Would it be in order to offer a resolution instructing the proper committee, either the Committee on Military Affairs or on Invalid Pensions, to report a bill at an early day to place such representatives also upon the pension-roll, thereby covering the whole case?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can be done at this time by unanimous consent.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be referred, together with all the facts relating to the persons killed, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, with leave to report at any time.

Mr. LUTTRELL. And what in the mean time is to become of these old people who have been deprived of their means of living?

No objection was made, and the bill (H. R. No. 3895) was read a first and second time, and, with all the facts relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

CORRECTION.

Mr. TERRY. I rise to make a correction. I observe on the vote taken yesterday on the amendment of the minority of the Committee of Elections in the case of Abbott vs. Frost I am on the record as not having voted. That is an error; I responded to my name and voted "no."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The correction will be made.

Mr. SCHLEICHER obtained the floor.

PROTECTION OF IMMIGRANTS.

Mr. HEREFORD. I was instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report a bill, which I do not propose to report at this moment, concerning the arrival of emigrants in the city of New York and in other ports of the United States. As every member well knows, it has been decided that the various State laws on this subject are unconstitutional, and it is very important that a bill should be passed by Congress so that all the emigrants shall be taken care of in a similar manner as they were taken care of by the various State organizations. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report a bill covering that ground, and I ask that after the disposition of the bill in relation to the Texas border the committee shall have leave to report the bill for immediate action. It will only take a few moments, I think, to dispose of it, and it will save hundreds of thousands of dollars, and it is also in the interest of humanity to the thousands of immigrants arriving at the various ports of the United States by steamers and other vessels.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia?

Mr. HEREFORD. It is that immediately after the disposition of the Texas bill the Committee on Commerce have leave to report a bill for the protection of immigrants arriving at the various ports of the United States.

Mr. CONGER. I object to that motion, and I object to the bill. I want it to come up when we can discuss it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not a matter for debate now.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the joint resolution (H. R. No. 96) to provide for the protection of the Texas frontier on the Lower Rio Grande.

Pending that motion I move that all debate be limited to an hour and a half, and that speeches be limited to fifteen minutes.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I presume that that motion only applies to the general debate, and would not cut off five-minute debate.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. It refers to all debate in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. Ah! But the gentleman cannot cut off the five-minute debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The five-minute debate will of course occur after the general debate closes, and it cannot be cut off by a motion of this kind.

The question was taken on the motion to close debate, and it was agreed to.

The question was then taken on Mr. SCHLEICHER'S motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and it was agreed to.

PROTECTION OF THE TEXAS FRONTIER.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. MONROE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 96) to provide for the protection of the Texas frontier on the Lower Rio Grande.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate upon this bill is now limited to one hour and a half, and all speeches are limited to fifteen minutes. When the committee rose the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to occupy the whole time assigned me, for I think I shall be able to express my views on these resolutions in less time. I suppose it will be admitted that the facts in this report upon which we are acting are substantially true. I am not disposed to doubt any portion of this report. But if I were to admit it to be wholly true, yet I am unable to see my way clear for voting for any other than the first of these two resolutions.

It is true that we have had troubles upon the Texas frontier for some time, serious difficulties, largely growing out of the unfortunate condition of affairs in the republic of Mexico. Yet these disturbances I think should not wholly be charged up against the government of Mexico. We know the history of that republic, its various struggles and the difficulties with which it has had to contend, and especially the difficulties with which it has had to contend since the present liberal party of that republic came into power. For one I think the Government of the United States should proceed very cautiously and kindly in its legislation whenever the republic of Mexico is in question.

We have rights, to be sure, that ought to be protected, and the citizens along the Texas frontier should not be forgotten in our legislation; they ought to have the protection which this first resolution proposes to give them. But when we propose to give all the needed protection, we ought to be very careful that we do not violate any treaty stipulations that exist between that republic and our own.

These troubles are to be admitted and are to be regretted. I am unable to discover any good reason why, if we adopt this first resolution, we should go beyond that in legislating upon this question. By the first resolution we propose that there shall be a force of two regiments of cavalry detailed to protect that frontier. It is the protection of the frontier alone that we have in view. The gentlemen representing that region of country ought not to ask Congress to go beyond that. They will not undertake to say that this force which is provided by the first resolution is not sufficient to give them protection. It is protection simply that they desire; protection alone that they need.

I am unwilling to vote for this second resolution because of its exceedingly doubtful and hazardous character. As was well said by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRISON,] the other day, by passing this second resolution we will be putting into the hands of the officer, it may be a colonel of a regiment or any officer whatever, power to determine the question whether or not he shall pass over the line and pursue these murderers from Mexico. It will be seen at once that this is a very great power to confer upon the officers of these regiments along the line. In the heat of an engagement, under the circumstances in which they may be placed many times, they may pass beyond and go into the territory of a friendly republic and attempt the punishment of these maraunding bands. I think it would be exceedingly dangerous to allow them to do so, where we do not desire to court a war with the republic of Mexico. She has her history, she has her identity, she has her individuality and place in history as we have our place in history. She is a republic in all her essential characteristics; she has no other tendencies than toward a republic. Therefore, I think we should consider that we have no other desire in dealing with that republic than to protect our own citizens. I ask the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. SCHLEICHER,] whom I very much respect, whether there is any other thing than protection to be desired on the part of this people who are thus injured by these bands from Mexico?

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Nothing but protection.

Mr. DUNNELL. Now, if it be true that in this first resolution providing for two cavalry regiments we give what is deemed to be a sufficient force for protection, why should we be asked, in addition to that, to allow them the liberty to pass over the line? They will be more powerful for the purposes of protection so long as they keep this side of the line. So long as they remain upon American soil they are a mightier force for protection than if they were divided up into pursuing bands here and there along and over the line and within the republic of Mexico.

The gentleman says it is protection they want; that they want nothing else. We want nothing else for ourselves, and we certainly ought not to ask that this force be intrusted with any discretionary power whatever. I do not think there is a single gentleman on this floor who does not sympathize with the portion of the State of Texas that is thus afflicted. We are not divided upon that issue. There is no political issue involved here. Our own defense stands out prominent. We are bound to take care of the people of Texas and to prevent these marauding forces from Mexico. But I insist that the very moment you intrust our forces with the right to go beyond our lines within the territory of Mexico you entangle us in a war.

It ought not to be forgotten that there has been a correspondence between our own Government and the Mexican minister of foreign affairs. Whenever this condition of things has been brought home to the Mexican government it has always replied that it regretted the condition of things and that to the extent of its ability it would seek to remedy them. We admit that there is a concession of weakness on the part of the Mexican government. We should not take advantage of that confession. As a humane republic it is our duty to regard that concession when we reply to our sister-republic that we must and will protect our own citizens.

In a letter that appears in this report, from Mr. Foster, our minister to Mexico, is to be found this statement:

> The remedy which I would propose is permission for the regular troops of the United States to follow the raiders across the border when in close pursuit, or, what would be still more efficacious, permission to temporarily occupy certain points on the Mexican side where the raiders are accustomed to cross the river. I was of the opinion that then the troubles would soon cease. But Mr. Lafragua said the executive has no authority to grant such permission without the consent of congress, and it would not be prudent to ask for this consent; the sentiment of the country would not approve it.

Our Government is informed at once of the feeling of Mexico. At the request of Mr. Fish the proposition was made to the Mexican government that our troops should be allowed to go across the line and pursue these bands of marauders. The Mexican minister says in reply that the sentiment of the country will not permit it; that the executive authority has no right to grant it; that the congress would not grant it. Now, in the face of this declaration coming from the Mexican government, shall we, a friendly republic, going beyond the necessities of the case which are those of protection alone, clothe this force of ours with authority to rush here and there into the republic of Mexico? If this be permitted we have trouble at once; we have war at once. We do not desire any of the territory of Mexico. We have territory enough of our own. We desire not an inch of Mexican territory. But it is our bounden duty to respect the republic of Mexico, to cherish her in her weakness, rather than strike at her, to encourage her in this declared purpose to take care of these marauders when the time shall come.

Mr. Chairman, I have had some little acquaintance in Mexico, having lived there a while. I have some idea of the struggles that have been going on there. I know something of the liberal party that is now in the ascendancy there. I was acquainted with the late president of the republic. I know that there are internal struggles there which would move the heart of every lover of republican liberty, no matter in what section of the country he might be. We are not at liberty, therefore, to strike at this republic, but should be content in securing simply the protection that we are able to give by the passage of this first resolution. Let us pass the first, but by all means reject the second.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, for the few minutes that I am allowed to occupy the floor, I ask the attention of the House upon a single point in this discussion. After the very full discussion of the general merits of these resolutions by the chairman of the select committee, [Mr. SCHLEICHER,] by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT,] and by my colleague, [Mr. CULBERSON,] I should feel it an unnecessary trespass upon the attention of this House to undertake to go over the general grounds of this bill, especially in view of the fact that the testimony upon which we are called to act has been drawn out by an able and impartial committee and printed and laid upon the tables of members for two months or more.

I know how difficult it is for members to get time to read a volume of testimony like this; yet I feel quite sure that if they could have examined this testimony and ascertained its purport, there would be no great opposition to the adoption of these resolutions. The testimony is as full and complete as testimony in such a case could be expected to be. It is the testimony of many citizens of all shades of opinion; it is the testimony of public meetings of an imposing character grouping together the facts which make up the grievances intended to be met by these resolutions; it is the testimony of the Legislature of the State of Texas; it is the testimony of the constitutional convention of that State; it is the testimony of the revenue officers of the United States and of our military officers on duty there; it is the testimony of the adjutant-general and the governor of the State of Texas; it is the testimony of the Secretary of State and of our minister in Mexico. This testimony makes out the case which we have asked this House to consider; and upon the consideration of this case we ask for that relief which the testimony shows is necessary to the frontier settlements in Texas.

I need only refer to the fact that in 1859 General Cortina, at the head of an armed military band of marauders, crossed the Rio Grande River, invaded American soil, took possession of Brownsville, released from jail prisoners charged with theft and murder, shot down the sheriff, assaulted, wounded, and I believe killed one or two others in releasing these prisoners, bid the town defiance, marched off up the river and remained for some time upon American soil, being finally driven back into the Mexican territory.

This state of things, a condition of war, went on until it was interrupted by the recent war between the States. A condition of things then grew up which made it more to the interest of the Mexicans to trade with the people on the north of the Rio Grande who crossed the river for cattle and other commodities than to steal their property and murder their citizens. Thus there was a partial arrest of these depredations until the close of the war.

This testimony discloses that from the close of the war until now a condition of war has prevailed for some hundreds of miles along that frontier. I say a condition of war, because this testimony shows it; not only the testimony to which I have referred from various general sources, but the testimony of the military authorities of the United States stationed upon that frontier and charged with the duty of protecting its people. This proof shows that many American citizens have been killed; that houses have been burned; that two United States postmasters at least have been killed and their families robbed; two revenue officers killed; others assaulted and driven from their duty. Altogether it is shown by indisputable and conclusive testimony that more than one hundred American citizens have been slaughtered there since 1865. In addition to that, this testimony shows that between one and three million dollars' worth of property has been taken from the people of Texas and carried across the Rio Grande, often by men wearing the military uniform of Mexico, and by men known to be in the service of that government. The proof shows that Cortina, who has defied his own government as he has defied ours, was a participant in the plunder and murder of our people.

Mr. DUNNELL. If he has defied his own government would you hold his government responsible?

Mr. REAGAN. The main object of my remarks is to answer the very question presented by the gentleman from Minnesota. I have made these preliminary observations for the purpose of saying that the only object I have in view in addressing the committee is to call their attention to the policy and necessity of adopting the second resolution; for there seems to be a general concurrence that it would be proper to adopt the first resolution.

It was assumed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. STEVENSON,] who moves to strike this out, that to authorize our troops to cross the Mexican border is a virtual declaration of war; that the crossing of the Rio Grande in pursuit of marauders would be an act of war, and that it would be unjust and impolitic in a great government to make war in an irregular way without a formal declaration of war for just cause.

The same general views underlie the remarks of my friend from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] who has just taken his seat, as well as of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] who addressed the House yesterday. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] put this question repeatedly to the House, "If these people come upon American soil, murder the people, take their property from them, why not arrest them and punish them by civil law?" That question is answered most fully by testimony before you, and especially by the testimony of Major-General Ord, United States Army, now in command of that border. I will refer to one communication at this point, and I ask the attention of the members of the House while I read it:

> HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF TEXAS,
> San Antonio, Texas, August 23, 1875.
> SIR: Inclosed please find letters from Hon. J. E. Dwyer, State senator; Mr. P. Marcedi, sheriff of Starr County, Texas, and others, Nos. 2588, 2589, 2592, 2646, 2683, 2711, 2745, 2834, 3450. I beg to call especial attention to statement of Hon. J. E. Dwyer.
> Having examined the country and visited many of the ranches and places named, I find, from best sources of information, that the within statements are generally reliable; and that, while there are quite a number of useful and peaceable Mexicans settled on the east side of the Rio Grande, like all Mexicans not jente de razon, they submit docilely to any power or force that chooses to override them, so that, the country being now overridden by the Mexican raiders, civil authority overawed or elected by peons in their interest, the military powerless for the reason that while really it is a time of war and public danger no proclamation to that effect has been made by the president, and the aforesaid civil authority (Mexican) is paramount, and every judge and sheriff of the state, knowing the facts, assured me it was impossible to convict any raider, murderer, or offender who may be connected with or under the protection of the raider bands.

Mark his language; he calls it a time of war.

> The circumstances are almost identical with the piracies on our commerce once committed by the Algerines, who fled in safety with their prizes to their own ports. There the offenses were committed on the open seas; here they are committed, with the same ease and atrocities, on the open plains. In both cases the pirates found a ready sale for their captures in the ports where their expeditions were fitted out, namely, Algiers and Tripoli, for the Moors, and Matamoras, Reynosa, Camargo, Mier, and Guerero, for the Mexicans, and in both cases the pirates were rewarded by promotion. The leader of the band that murdered Lovell in May last and plundered the custom-house at Carizo is now captain of the guard at Mier.
> I have to ask that these papers and this letter be referred to the Secretary of State.
>
> Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
> E. O. C. ORD,
> Brigadier-General U. S. Army, Commanding.
> ADJUTANT-GENERAL, U. S. ARMY, Washington, D. C.

The evidence fully bears out the statement of General Ord that Mexicans are promoted who signalize their skill in murder and plunder.

Now, then, if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] were in his place, I would ask him, with this and the other testimony corroborating it all through the case, what he means by saying to the people who have suffered the calamities of war for ten years, lost hundreds of lives, had the custom-house and post-office of the United States plundered upon their own soil, the military defied, two millions of property stolen, what he means by saying to them in the face of such testimony as this, "Protect yourselves. Why do you not arrest and punish the offenders?" It seems to me, and I say it with all respect that it is a cruel wrong to a people outraged, plundered, murdered, as these have been, powerless to protect themselves by civil authority, having surrendered all their military authority in this respect to the Government of the United States, to turn upon them now and say, "Why do you not protect yourselves?" It is tantalizing them in the hour of their calamity, in the hour of their helplessness.

But I must pass from this, and I have only time to read another statement of General Ord, which perhaps I can refer to at once. I cannot take time to read as I ought to, but I will read a single sentence from the testimony of General Ord:

I satisfied myself that the only way to protect the property of the people on that frontier and to prevent these raids was to cross the river whenever the troops struck a trail with the prospect of overtaking the cattle-thieves.

I refer further to his testimony that, owing to the peculiar condition of the country, being dense chaparral for twenty miles back on the northern line of the river, some two hundred miles in length, where the ralders can penetrate without being seen and go back one hundred miles from the frontier into the interior to rob and murder the people, he has stated that it would require a very large force, occupying a defensive position, to protect the people there. I do not remember his words, but he shows that it will take a larger force than this Government can afford. Captain McNally, comparatively a young man, is yet a skillful, brave officer and an earnest, able man, and he says that 10,000 men posted there within that border, with that peculiarity of population and country, without authority to cross the river, would be insufficient.

Here I wish to say to the House, and I fear I will not get an opportunity to say the main thing for which I rose before I close, and if I do not I will ask the House for a few moments longer—I wish to say to the gentleman from Minnesota, as well as to the gentleman from Illinois who proposed the amendment to strike out the second section, that I agree with the feelings they express, and I concur with the sentiments to which they give utterance that it is not our policy to cause war between the United States and Mexico. We wish their friendship, we wish their commerce. We do not desire to violate their territory or to wound the pride or national honor of the Mexican people. There is no man representing Texas here who feels and expresses any other sentiment. To-day I say to you if the country on the south side of the Rio Grande was tendered to our people as a free gift, with the present population upon it, I would vote against its annexation.

So I think most of the people of Texas would do. It is not conquest, it is not war we want. We sympathize with the present president of Mexico, President Lerdo, because we believe he is trying to establish civil government on a broad, popular basis; because he has extended education; because he is extending railroad and telegraph lines; because he has aided in making a final separation between church and state; because we believe his views are liberal. We have no desire to harm him and to wound his feelings of kindness which we believe he entertains toward our country. Why, then, you say, do we propose to authorize our troops to go upon Mexican soil? Now let me call your attention to the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. REAGAN. I should like to get the consent of the committee to have ten minutes more.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. I move that the time of the gentleman be extended ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the committee is acting under the order of the House; that general debate on this bill has been limited to an hour and a half, and that each speaker has been confined to fifteen minutes. Strictly speaking the Chair supposes the committee has no power to extend the time.

Mr. REAGAN. Cannot the committee by unanimous consent extend my time?

The CHAIRMAN. A motion that the committee rise for the purpose of obtaining from the House an extension of time would be in order.

Mr. COX. I move that the committee rise to obtain from the House an extension of time, and also for another purpose, that a bill for the relief of the Custer family, which has now been prepared by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, may be brought before the House.

The motion that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having taken the chair, Mr. MONROE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 96) to provide for the protection of the Texas frontier on the Lower Rio Grande, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. RICE. I move that when the House shall again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole the time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] be extended for fifteen minutes, and also that the original limitation of an hour and a half for general debate be extended to an hour and three-quarters.

There was no objection, and the motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 1807) for the relief of Anthony Lawson, surviving partner of the firm of Lawson & Brewis, of Alexandria, Virginia;

A bill (H. R. No. 3486) for the relief of James F. Buckner; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3490) for the relief of James W. Love, postmaster at Patriot, Indiana.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution and a bill of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Joint resolution (S. No. 17) authorizing Lieutenant Theodorus B. M. Mason, of the United States Navy, to accept a silver medal from the King of Italy; and

A bill (S. No. 983) to extend the duration of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims.

RELIEF OF THE CUSTER FAMILY.

Mr. RUSK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3896) granting a pension to Maria Custer and Emanuel H. Custer; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the names of Maria Custer and Emanuel H. Custer, dependent mother and father of Brevet Major-General George A. Custer, Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas W. Custer, and Boston Custer, who were killed on the 25th day of June, 1876, at the battle of the Little Big Horn, and pay them a pension at the rate of $50 per month each for the two last-named sons.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to inquire if both the Custers last named were in the service? One was.

Mr. RUSK. Boston Custer was not an enlisted man, but was under the command of Major-General Custer, and comes within the rule.

Mr. KASSON. I think, if it does not affect the amount of pension, the name of Boston Custer should be left out. I think the name of a civilian should not be recognized in a pension bill.

Mr. BANKS. No one would like to object to the passage of the bill now before the House; but I desire to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. RUSK] whether it is not necessary to give some consideration to the families of the others who were slaughtered in that battle, and who are left as dependent as those here named? Should not the bill go to the Committee on Invalid Pensions in order that proper provision may be made for all the cases?

Mr. RUSK. I will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that while he was not in the House a bill similar to this was introduced this morning and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. We have not had time to have a meeting as a committee; but as a member of the committee I have consented to this, and I believe the majority of the committee will agree to it. The general law will provide for the families of those who fell in this battle other than the father and mother of these three officers. General Custer has a widow. We passed a bill for her relief at $50 a month. This is to relieve the aged father and mother. They had three sons killed in that disaster, and I think the bill is just and proper and ought to pass.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman, if it does not affect the amount, to leave out the name of the civilian. As the bill now stands it seems to state a ground of liability which the United States has never assumed; liability, namely, for the loss of a civilian.

Mr. RUSK. The United States has invariably, where a man was lost in battle, recognized its liability when he was acting under orders, under the command of any officer.

Mr. KASSON. I understand that Boston Custer was a civilian.

Mr. RUSK. He was not an enlisted man. But that makes no difference, when he was acting under the orders of the commanding officer.

Mr. KASSON. I think the gentleman is mistaken in his views. I move to amend the bill by striking out the words "and Boston Custer."

Mr. BANKS. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin should allow the bill to be referred to the committee of which he is a member, that the committee may give us a report on the facts relating to the entire case.

Mr. RICE. The facts are pretty generally known; and the reason for asking the passage of this bill now is that it may go through both Houses of Congress before the adjournment. The whole country is acquainted with the facts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] moves to amend the bill by striking out the name of Boston Custer.

Mr. RUSK. I have no objection to that at all.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RUSK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. In connection with that measure I desire to move that the Committee on Invalid Pensions be directed to inquire into the facts and report a bill for the relief of the families of others who also perished in this battle.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the motion of the gentleman from Michigan at this time?

Mr. JENKS. I object to the motion at present, because the general law provides for these cases.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. The general law applies to Custer's case too.

Mr. JENKS. It did not so far as the last case is concerned.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I have a bill prepared for this very purpose which I would like to introduce.

Mr. CONGER. Is my motion objected to?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is objected to.

TEXAS BORDER TROUBLES.

Mr. SCHLEICHER obtained the floor.

Mr. YOUNG. By leave of the gentleman from Texas I desire to submit this motion to the House, that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be authorized by unanimous consent to extend the time of any speaker in the discussion upon the pending bill without the committee rising and the Speaker taking the chair for that purpose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield for that motion?

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the Texas border troubles.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to introduce this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection has been made two or three times for the introduction of any further bill, and the question now is upon the motion of the gentleman from Texas that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with the understanding that the time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] be extended fifteen minutes, and that fifteen additional minutes shall be allowed for the time of general debate.

The question was taken on Mr. SCHLEICHER's motion, and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. MONROE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 96) to provide for the protection of the Texas frontier on the Lower Rio Grande.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted in the course of my remarks I was about to call the attention of the committee to the second section of the resolution presented, and I invoke the attention of the House to the particular wording of that section, and the attention of all those who have read the testimony to the fact that the wording of that section conforms to the spirit of the testimony upon which it is predicated, and from which it will be seen that the committee did not mean to do what would necessarily be an act of war or lead to war, but meant simply to meet the case presented to them by the testimony.

The second section of the resolution reads:

That in view of the inability of the national government of Mexico to prevent the inroads of lawless parties from Mexican soil into Texas, the President is hereby authorized, whenever in his judgment it shall be necessary for the protection of the rights of American citizens on the Texas frontier above described, to order the troops, when in close pursuit of the robbers with their booty, to cross the Rio Grande, and use such means as they may find necessary for recovering the stolen property and checking the raids, guarding, however, in all cases against any unnecessary injury to peaceable inhabitants of Mexico.

What I call attention to is the language, which shows that the federal republic of Mexico is unable to restrain these raids, that the purpose of the pursuit and the state of facts when pursuit will be made are shown by the resolution to be when the troops are in close pursuit of the robbers with their booty. This language shows what the purpose was. What are the facts upon which this resolution was reported? I have to make the statement very briefly, trusting to the knowledge of the members of the House of the facts stated in the report of the committee. They are that for ten years past the state of Tamaulipas has been nearly all the time acting in open defiance of the authority of the Mexican Republic. I call attention to the correspondence between our minister and the secretary of state of Mexico, and especially to the letters of our own Secretary of State, embodied in this evidence, which show that the Mexican government either cannot or will not restrain these marauders. The truth is, and the evidence shows it conclusively, that these Mexicans along the border are acting in defiance of the policy and of the wishes of the Mexican government, violating international comity and international law, and sacrificing the lives of our people and taking from them their property. They come across the Rio Grande and commit depredations upon our soil; they burn post-offices and kill postmasters; they rob custom-houses; they rob farm-houses and burn them and kill the owners; they carry away hundreds of thousands of cattle and horses, and when they have crossed the Rio Grande, closely pursued by the citizens or the military, they mock at our condition. Knowing that our Government is disposed to respect the rights of Mexico, they avail themselves of that honor perhaps and action to bid open defiance between the governments of Mexico and the United States.

Now, then, it has been said here, and the illustration has been made by several gentlemen, that if we were to authorize our troops to go into Canada to make reprisals and to arrest wrong-doers it would be an act of war against Great Britain, and we are asked would she not declare war. The same proposition has been put in the reverse form. If the British government should send its forces across our border, would not we deem it an act of war? Certainly, in both cases the proposition made is well sustained by reason. Why? Because each of these nations respects its international obligations with the other, and enforces its local laws, and prevents wrong-doing, and aids with sufficient power to recapture and by extradition to return the wrong-doer to the country in which the wrong was perpetrated, so that there can be no excuse for such an act on the part of either of these parties against the other. Is that the case before this Congress? It is to this that I desire to call the attention of the House. There are men and Mexican border men who are violating the law and subverting the policy of Mexico, bandits and robbers occupying, as General Ord says, the position of the pirates of Algeria and Tripoli. This is known to us all. They bid defiance to their own laws and to our laws. Their government cannot control them, and our Government while it respects this border cannot control them. But it is said that if you permit our troops to cross the border it will be an act of war, and will wound the pride of Mexico and necessarily lead to war. Gentlemen have not examined the whole history of this case. If our troops should cross the border it would be no cause for war, because the Mexican government knows as well as we do that they cannot and do not control these marauders and robbers.

Now, sir, a better illustration of the case on hand would be this: That to-day we have treaty stipulations of friendship and amity with the Sioux Nation, and because we have treaty stipulations with them we should send no troops to the Black Hills country to avenge the murder of Custer and his heroic comrades. We have treaty stipulations, but those stipulations were not intended to be a shield for our enemies and death and destruction to our own citizens.

It is said, however, that by the law of nations it would be an act of war. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT,] a member of the committee who has examined all the testimony and looked well into the law of nations, read you a paragraph from Halleck's Laws of War, which I beg leave to trespass upon the time of the House to read again:

But it may be asked shall the state, which is suffering from the piratical incursions organized in and emanating from a neighboring state, do nothing in self-defense and for self-preservation? Must she wait until the invading force crosses her own borders before she can attack and destroy it? Not at all. If the neighboring state, from the want either of the will or of the ability, neglects to prevent such excursions, or to suppress such organizations, the threatened state may cross the frontier and attack and destroy the threatened danger. But the act is one of hostility, and she performs it in the exercise of her belligerent rights, not in the exercise of a pacific right of self-defense. It is not necessary that such act should be preceded by a declaration of war, nor, indeed, that it should be followed by a public and solemn war in form; nevertheless it is a belligerent act, justifiable, perhaps, by the circumstances of the case and the culpable neglect of the other party, and, as such, belongs to that class of hostile operations known in international jurisprudence as imperfect war, and which will be more particularly discussed in another chapter. (Wheaton's Elements of International Law, part 2, chapter 1, § 13; Grotius de Jure Belli et Pacis, liber 1, cap. 3, § 1; Burlamaqui's Droit Naturell, &c., tome 5, part 4, chapter 3; Vattel, Droit des Gens, liv. 2, chapter 6, § 72.)

I have here before me Wheaton and Vattel, and I have reference to their authorities, but it is sufficient to say that the law here laid down is sustained by all the law-writers on this subject: If Mexico cannot restrain the robbers and marauders that organize upon her borders and make their forays upon our people, she has not only no right to complain if we control and check them, but she ought to be obliged to us for doing so for the preservation of the law and for the enforcement of the right.

While I feel sure that no government in Mexico could freely consent to an invasion of their territory under any circumstances or for any purpose, I do not doubt the Mexican authorities, impressed as I am with the belief that that government means to be just, desires good neighborhood and peaceable commercial relations with us, and would be obliged to us if in the case contemplated by the resolution we broke up this nest of pirates, robbers, and marauders.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I would ask the gentleman if the Mexican government ever intimated that they were unable to prevent these lawless incursions?

Mr. REAGAN. It has not, so far as I know, formally so said. But the Secretary of State of the United States, and Mr. Foster, our minister to the Mexican government, have warned that government that as they could not or would not do this, if they failed to do so it would render it necessary that our forces should cross the border.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COCHRANE. I move that the gentleman's time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole cannot extend the time.

Mr. CONGER. When this discussion first began in Committee of the Whole and after the opening remarks made by the gentleman from Texas who has charge of this matter, [Mr. SCHLEICHER,] I took occasion to make some remarks upon this joint resolution, in which I gave my approval to the first section and admitted the necessity and urged the propriety of providing in some manner for the defense of our Texan frontier. I took occasion also to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the fact that the second section of the joint resolution, in my judgment, authorizes acts which by any civilized nation, if done without its consent, would be a declaration of war. I supported that proposition then by stating that our Government had submitted a proposition to Mexico for permission to pursue marauders across the border and that the Mexican government had refused that permission.

I also stated—and I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] to what I then said, because he criticised my remarks in an unnecessary consumption of time and with an unnecessary disingenuousness—I said that, on the complaint of our Government that these robberies, these murders had been committed by Mexicans invading our soil from Mexican territory, that government had done as all governments are bound to do, appointed a commission to examine into the subject, giving that commission authority to make full and complete research by visiting that border region and taking testimony wherever and whenever they could find anything bearing upon the subject. I said that I had seen that report, the report of that commission, and had read it with great attention and with great care.

Now the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. THROCKMORTON,] with a disingenuousness that is unworthy of the very forcible discourse he delivered here and of the power which he manifested in his remarks, asserted to this House that I had said that I had read that report "with pleasure," as if it pleased me to learn that a foreign nation disputed a fact asserted by our Government; as if it pleased me that a foreign nation made a defense against charges which we believe cannot be disputed. His words were "The gentleman from Michigan says he read the report with very great pleasure." Now there was nothing in the tenor of my remarks that indicated anything of that kind. And the gentleman did not strengthen his position in this House nor before the people by resorting to any such means either of prejudice or persuasion. But that is immaterial to the question now before the House.

I took an early opportunity to call the attention of the friends of this joint resolution to the serious objection, in my mind, and, as it has since appeared, in the minds of many other members of this House, to the second section of this joint resolution. I cannot let this opportunity pass without reading to this Committee of the Whole and to the gentleman from Texas who has spoken to-day [Mr. REAGAN] a part of the report of our minister to Mexico in regard to his negotiations on this very subject, and of the proposition which he made, under the direction of the President of the United States, through our Secretary of State to the Mexican Government. He says in his communication that in a formal conversation which he had with the Mexican minister of foreign affairs he submitted this proposition. I will use his own words:

> The remedy which I would propose is permission for the regular troops of the United States to follow the raiders across the border when in close pursuit.

The very language of this joint resolution:

> Or, what would be still more efficacious, permission to temporarily occupy certain points on the Mexican side where the raiders are accustomed to cross the river. I was of the opinion that then the troubles would soon cease. But Mr. Lafragua said the executive has no authority to grant such permission without the consent of the Mexican congress, and it would not be prudent to ask for this consent; the sentiment of the country would not approve it; and he referred to the indignation occasioned by the passage into Mexican territory of General Mackenzie.

I understood the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to say that already two expeditions have crossed the Mexican border in pursuit of these raiders. Did I understand him correctly to say "by authority of the United States?"

Mr. REAGAN. I did not say "by authority." For one of the expeditions to which I referred there is no publicly proclaimed authority, and I do not care to raise that question.

Mr. CONGER. I understood the gentleman to say in regard to General Mackenzie that he crossed by authority.

Mr. REAGAN. I disremember the language I used.

Mr. CONGER. Does the gentleman now claim that General Mackenzie did cross by any authority of the United States?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know that he had any precedent instructions.

Mr. CONGER. In this very communication, from which I am reading, the Mexican minister referred to the indignation caused by the passage into Mexican territory of General Mackenzie. Our minister says:

> I replied that General Mackenzie crossed without authority from either government; but, if permission was given, the necessity for it would be known to the public, and there would be no violation of national sovereignty, and good citizens ought to be satisfied.

The whole thing is in that simple proposition. If the authorities of a neighboring State permit the crossing of troops into its borders of course there is no occasion for war, of course the act is not a belligerent one, and of course it would lead to no complications. But here our Government, through our Secretary of State, made a distinct proposition to the Mexican government to permit our forces to cross the borders and to pursue raiders; and we are told first that the president of Mexico has no authority to permit that without the consent of the Mexican congress, and, second, that the public feeling of Mexico is so strong against it that even if it were asked by the president of the Mexican Republic it would injure his position as the chief officer of that State.

The indignation of the Mexicans at one crossing by General Mackenzie was so great that the Mexican government at once applied to the United States Government to ascertain if it had authorized that crossing of troops into their territory, that invasion of their territorial rights; and then this Government, knowing perhaps as much in regard to the rules of war, as much in regard to what constitutes belligerent acts, as some members on this floor, hastened to disavow any authority of the United States for the act, hastened to allay the indignation of the Mexican people by disavowing any authority on the part of General Mackenzie for the violation of their territory.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAGAN. As the gentleman opposes this mode of protecting our people, I ask him whether, in view of all the facts of the case, any other efficient mode of protection has occurred to his mind; whether he prefers a declaration of war against peaceful people who do not want war or the cheaper mode of securing ourselves against these marauders?

Mr. CONGER. I have said in previous remarks—I wish the gentleman had been in his seat and had done me the honor to hear me—that I would cheerfully support, and hoped every gentleman in this House would support, the first section of this joint resolution providing two full regiments of cavalry for the protection of that frontier. I also said, as the gentleman may find by turning to the RECORD, that if ten regiments or twenty regiments were needed to protect that frontier I would vote to give them at any time now or hereafter.

But when a measure of this character had been the subject of diplomatic correspondence between the two governments, and when the solemn request of this Government had been refused by Mexico, I cannot give my consent that Congress, in the face of all these facts, should incorporate into a joint resolution authority for our troops to pass where the Mexican government has said they could not pass without exciting the indignation of their people and endangering the supremacy of their government.

Mr. REAGAN. I would like to ask the gentleman further——

Mr. CONGER. As the gentleman has had his half hour, I prefer to say what I have to say without interruption.

Now, when any gentleman on this floor urges the proposition that this is virtually an act of war, that if the government of Mexico has any pride, any patriotism, any valor, it must receive the act as such and must follow it up by actual war, gentlemen on the other side do not answer that proposition. The gentleman from Texas has read an authority exactly on my side from Halleck, in which it is said that such an act without the consent of the other government is a belligerent act. I thank him for the authority.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me right here to read a paragraph from Vattel?

Mr. CONGER. I have read Vattel, I have read Grotius, I have read Halleck; and I do not think anybody needs to spend days and weeks in reading international law to know that the violation of the territory of another country by armed troops without the consent of that country is a belligerent act, and has always been treated as such. It is one of the common modes of commencing war.

Now, how do gentlemen meet that proposition? They repeat over and over again, "Robbery! Murder! Cattle-stealing! Mule-driving!" Does that meet the proposition? I had expected that my friend from Texas, who is the statesman of his delegation, would meet the proposition as a statesman, and not go on repeating over and over and over again the accounts of cattle-stealing. Cattle-stealing is a bad thing; robberies and murders are bad; but plunging two nations into war is infinitely worse. Especially for a proud, strong, war-like nation such as the United States of America has proved itself to be, to commence belligerent acts upon a sister-republic when that republic is approaching more the form of permanent, consistent, civilized government than it ever has before; to take just the time when that government is doing the best it ever has been able to do to maintain the rights of its citizens and prevent the encroachment of its people upon the rights of others; to take just this moment to declare war is unworthy the people of the United States and unworthy of the Congress in which such a proposition may originate.

Now I do not desire to be misunderstood or misrepresented again. I am in favor of pursuing by all legal and legitimate means all measures which shall give protection on the Texas frontier of property, of home, of life, of everything for which the citizen can appeal to this Government for protection. And I am in favor of doing it at whatever cost; for the nation that cannot protect its citizens against the incursions of any body on God's footstool ought to be dethroned from power.

Mr. BANKS. I asked the Chair to put my name on the list of members who were to speak on this question, but it was in deference to the request of the chairman of the committee rather than because of my own judgment that I gave my consent.

I do not think it is impossible for Congress to pass a resolution of this kind without a violation of international law. On the contrary I believe that under circumstances such as may exist, or such as might exist, the Government of the United States might give an order to this effect without any serious offense to the government of Mexico. But it depends wholly upon the manner in which it is done and the circumstances which require it.

Now, sir, in this case our difficulty here in this House or in Congress is that we have no means of communicating or entering into negotiations with the government of Mexico on this subject. And we cannot remove any difficulties which she might have in a process of this kind, or express to her any views of our own in regard to the circumstances in which we are placed. We have no power of communication with the Mexican government. The executive government has that power. They are enabled to communicate at any time, in any manner and to any extent, on this and other subjects. Now my trouble in this regard is that the executive government of the United States has never suggested in any form whatever that is a matter of record for us either the necessity for a power like that embraced in the second section or a declaration of the manner in which it is to be used if that power is given. And if this be the case, then the House will stand in the position of having forced upon the executive government a power, an extraordinary power for which the Government has never asked, without any declaration as to the manner in which that power is to be used, and without any intimation on the part of the executive officers of the Government as to the consequence of giving that power. I rose here especially to ask the honorable chairman of the committee if he has any such communication from the executive department of the Government as will relieve us in these two respects, either as to the necessity of the power embraced in the second section or as to the manner in which that power is to be used and the consequences that may flow from it. On that, sir, my vote will depend.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I feel at liberty to state to the committee that I had several interviews with the Secretary of State, Mr. Fish; but that I have no official communication from him at all. Before the committee acted upon this matter I submitted the resolution to him, and asked him for his opinion. He only gave it privately. He expressed himself that for years he had thought that finally there would be nothing left but the adoption of the measure proposed; that all other means would be tried by him, but that he expected it would come to that. I even consulted with him as to the special wording of the resolution, and he suggested some changes in the wording, which were made. Before the action of the House was asked on the resolution, I addressed a note to Mr. Fish, saying I would not make any statement before the House as to the conversations with him, or as to his opinion, that would have any coloring of an official expression on his part, without knowing exactly how far I should go; and I desired him to state to me in writing how far I should go in that respect. I have not received an answer to that communication. And I consider his failure to answer meant simply this, that he declined to give an official opinion about it, and that his desire was to leave the matter entirely to the responsibility of the House alone.

Mr. BANKS. Those are what I understood to be the facts of the case as regards the communication between the executive department of the Government and the committee having this subject in charge; and they do not seem to me to be sufficient to justify us in taking the step which we would take if we passed the second resolution. According to my judgment it is our duty to consult with the executive department of the Government before taking a step of this kind, and to have an expression of its opinion as to the necessity of the measure, as to the manner in which the power is to be used, and as to the probable consequences that may flow from it. And not having this, I presented to the committee a formula upon this subject, which includes the proposition as to crossing the boundary line between the two governments, but did not go to the extent this resolution goes. And I should feel myself unable to vote for it under the declaration made by the honorable chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. SCHLEICHER.]

Now I want to say that I do not think it will necessarily follow there will be war between the two governments if this resolution should be passed and should be enforced. It may result otherwise than in war; and yet we must all admit it may result in war. It will depend on the manner in which it shall be used; and we have no power to control the manner in which it shall be used.

The executive department gives us no assurance as to the extent to which the power should be carried, and the probability is that it will rest in the end only on the responsibility of the subordinate officers who are to exercise this power, and I would not like under the circumstances to give such power to those officers.

It is a fact already known to all the members of the House that upon the Upper Rio Grande there is a constant passing over the line between Mexico and the United States by Mexican soldiers and the soldiers of the United States for the purposes suggested in this resolution. But that is with an understanding between the subordinate officers who respect the two governments, and hence it leads us into no trouble. We do not know if such an understanding can be obtained with regard to the Lower Rio Grande; we do not know if the executive government demands this power. We do not know, nor can we judge, what the consequence or results will be. The House of Representatives will have forced on the executive department of the Government an extraordinary power for which it is not asked and which may lead to serious trouble between the two governments, which I am sure no member of the House desires to occur.

Mr. COX Some few years ago the Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which I was then a member, gave a good deal of study to this matter. We examined it in detail. We found much exaggeration in favor of interested parties in the reports made from the Rio Grande frontier, as to the losses incurred there. We found a great deal of dispute and recrimination between the two governments on the two sides of the Rio Grande. We took no definite action. Since that time there has been much testimony taken in relation to these raids.

It seems now, however, to be conceded by those who have examined the question that in the last ten years there has been at least a loss of $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 of property belonging to our people which has been stolen and carried upon the other side of the Rio Grande. For this our citizens have had no compensation. In fact, this border itself has been depopulated, wasted, deserted. It remains a desolation.

Now the Rio Grande is a fordable river with numerous curves in it. Beyond it are the Sierra Madre Mountains. They are some one hundred and fifty miles beyond. They afford refuge for these Mexican marauders and their prey.

It is a pity that in fixing the boundary we did not make those mountains instead of a shallow river the western limit of Texas. It would have saved us much trouble, anxiety, and losses and money.

But the question is raised, does the Executive Department desire to have some such authority from Congress as this bill would devolve upon it? This second section should meet approval because we may, I think, at this time, when the incumbent is not a candidate, trust the Executive in its execution. From "necessity" this second section can be justified as well as the first. President Grant in his message refers to this subject and asks for some such power.

Mr. STEVENSON. The discretion, if I understand the resolution correctly, is not vested exclusively in the President of the United States, but in the troops who are sent across the border, and they are to be allowed to exercise such means as they may deem proper for the suppression of these outrages.

Mr. COX. I do not so read the second section. It is as follows:

That, in view of the inability of the national government of Mexico to prevent the inroads of lawless parties from Mexican soil into Texas, the President is hereby authorized, whenever, in his judgment, it shall be necessary for the protection of the rights of American citizens on the Texas frontier, above described, to order the troops to cross the Rio Grande, and use such means as they may find necessary for recovering the stolen property and checking the raids, guarding, however, in all cases, against any unnecessary injury to peaceable inhabitants of Mexico.

This seems to be perspicuous enough. It is the President who bears the responsibility of judgment and of ordering.

Mr. STEVENSON. How can that be made available?

Mr. COX. I presume that while our troops are pursuing the robbers the remedy may be had under this section; at least the President would have the right and power in the first instance to issue his orders. Until he issues them the troops cannot of course act, and no evil results will happen.

Now, sir, I am not very particular on points of international law connected with these outrages. When it comes down to the point of open and flagrant robbing, we ought to take vigorous and decided action. The Mexican government is confessedly powerless. It knows well that our troops will cross, as they have crossed the border, without orders. We cannot afford any special refinements of diplomacy in this matter; but there is a law laid down by our international writers called the law of necessity. That law applies here and now. You find it in Puffendorf and Vattel, and all the other publicists. I admit that Vattel, which I hold in my hand, derives the law of necessity to extremes, for he instances that a nation cannot perpetuate and preserve itself except by stealing its wives in certain emergencies. He justifies almost the rape of the Sabine women on the plea of necessity. I quote his language on that point:

A nation cannot preserve and perpetuate itself except by propagation. A nation of men has therefore a right to procure women, who are absolutely necessary for its preservation; and if its neighbors who have a redundancy of females refuse to give some of them in marriage to those men, the latter may justly have recourse to force. We have a famous example of this in the rape of the Sabine women. But though a nation is allowed to procure for itself even by force of arms the liberty of obtaining women in marriage, no woman in particular can be constrained in her choice, nor become by right the wife of a man who carries her off by force, a circumstance which has not been attended to by those who have decided, without restriction, that the Romans did not commit an act of injustice on that occasion. It is true that the Sabine women submitted to their fate with a good grace, and when their nation took up arms to avenge them, it sufficiently appeared from the ardor with which these women rushed between the combatants that they willingly acknowledged the Romans for their lawful husbands.

So you see, sir, how far this law of necessity has been carried by just writers. The Sabine rape was not, however, justified in detail but only as belonging to a peculiar set of emergencies and circumstances. But if that be justified why may not the via facti, or execution, which is not war, be justified in a case of open rapine when the via amicabilia fails to stop the wrong-doers?

He further lays down the following principle; it is upon this that the second section can be justified:

We thus call the right which necessity alone gives to the performance of certain actions that are otherwise unlawful, when without these actions it is impossible to fulfill an indispensable obligation.

Extreme necessity revives the primitive communion, the abolition of which ought to deprive no person of the necessaries of life. The same right belongs to individuals when a foreign nation refuses them a just assistance. Captain Boutekoe, a Dutchman, having lost his vessel at sea, escaped in his boat with a part of his crew and landed on an Indian coast, where the barbarous inhabitants, refusing him provisions, the Dutch obtained them sword in hand.

What is the obligation referred to in this first paragraph? To protect our people and their property. The men on this side of the line are not devoting their labor to feed the lazy greasers on the other side. They are not grazing for the benefit of Cortinas and his band, who carry off their property to his ranch at their pleasure. The obligation upon our part is to protect that border, at least, or our side of it, against lawless rascals.

That obligation is indispensable. To follow our property across the border, which is an act "otherwise unlawful," may be justified by this citation from Vattel.

This, sir, is international law. International law is founded on the best morality, on the opinions of the best writers, on conscience, and on those various treaties which nations make with each other. This basis of international law is not upturned by this second section. It should avail in this case as of necessity; otherwise we might as well give up all this border altogether and leave its four hundred miles to these marauders, and say that we have no power to protect our people there. We might as well abdicate our Federal sovereignty and turn over the "premises" to Mexico.

But I propose to show that this right had heretofore been exercised. On page 14 of this report will be found an official letter from General Robert E. Lee, then a brevet-colonel commanding in the Department of Texas, to the civil and military authorities of the city of Reynosa, Mexico. He writes as follows:

GENTLEMEN: In pursuance of instructions received from the honorable Secretary of War of the Government of the United States, I hereby notify you that you must break up and disperse the bands of banditti within your jurisdiction engaged in committing depredations upon the persons and property of American citizens, and that I shall hold you responsible for the faithful performance of this plain duty on your part. I have been informed that there are now within your jurisdiction armed followers of Cortina who were engaged in the recent outrages committed by him on this side of the Rio Grande prepared to make similar aggressions.

This state of things cannot longer exist, and must be put an end to.

I am,

R. E. LEE,
Brevet Colonel, Commanding.

In orders issued to Captain Brackett he said:

I have been informed that threats have been uttered by citizens of Reynosa against residents of Edinburgh and Tobasco. I desire you to inform the authorities of Reynosa of the menaces, and give them to understand that they will be held responsible for outrages committed by their citizens on American soil. You will give protection to all citizens within the line of your operations.

R. E. LEE,
Brevet Colonel, Commanding.

General Houston, then governor of Texas, April 14, 1800, gave the same orders and justified them. January 16, 1873, Secretary Fish wrote to Mr. Nelson, then the American minister to Mexico, as follows:

The federal government of that republic appears to be so apathetic on this subject, or so powerless to prevent such raids, that sooner or later this Government will have no other alternative than to endeavor to secure quiet on the frontier by seeking the marauders and punishing them in their haunts wherever they may be. Of course we should prefer that this should be done with the consent if not with the co-operation of Mexico. It is certain, however, that if the grievances shall be persisted in the remedy adverted to will not remain untried.

There is surely justification for such unequivocal conduct and language.

So on all through the history of these border troubles, our people have been compelled, without much dissent from Mexico and with the implied assent of our Government, to cross this border. Natural law authorizes men to go after their property. For the protection of their rights as citizens, when the Government fails, they will be a law unto themselves.

But I desired, Mr. Chairman, to discuss something besides this matter. I find that my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] made quite an excursion outside of this subject. He crossed the border, and I am a little disposed—as I see him announced as a candidate for governor of New York—to follow him across the border. In his speech he discoursed about Jefferson, colored troops, the Jews, Egypt, Chancellorsville, the mills of God, Tammany, economy——

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I would suggest to my colleague whether he had not better postpone his remarks until his colleague is present.

Mr. COX. Why did not your colleague postpone his speech until the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] whom he attacked, was on the floor? I would be very glad to have my colleague here, although I shall say nothing about him in his absence that is not decorous.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I presume the gentleman would be very glad to be here, and he said he would have been glad to have Mr. RANDALL here.

Mr. COX. At the time when he was attacked the chairman of Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL] was in a conference committee. He was trying if possible to obtain an agreement on our appropriation bills. He was trying in the interest of economy to sustain this House. He was attacked for this economy by our colleague, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] the candidate for governor of the State of New York. What did he not refer to in that speech? Not merely Mexico. He referred bitterly to our recent civil war, so as, if possible, to raise himself in the estimation of northern people by reviving the spirit of hate and strife. Moreover, he said he did not care for economy or its figures; and he did not. He referred to Tammany, and in nearly twenty instances he appealed to God, with whom he seemed to be somewhat too familiar. The gentleman also said how kindly he felt toward the South—"a degree of kindness that certainly no living man can complain of." He always prefaces his speeches with such remarks—

As the bat of Indian brakes
With pinions fans the wound it makes,
And soothing thus the dreamer's pain,
Drinks the life-blood from the vein—

So he fans us into a gentle feeling, while he would drink the blood from our southern people.

And what was his speech about when you get to the marrow of it? It was against economy all through. That is its burden. Does he not know the last result we have ciphered it down to, $38,516,312.09? I am happy, by leave of this House, in being able to furnish him and his constituents authentic details, corrected and revised up to day by the indefatigable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] which show democratic reductions over last year:

* This statement has been carefully corrected and compared.

But if the gentleman wants really good, genuine economy, I advise him to go to the annual message of the governor of the State of New York, Samuel J. Tilden, of whom he has perhaps heard. He will find a variety of good reading in the line of economy. In the latter part of that message he will read why economy is so indispensable both in Federal and local affairs. According to that statement our Federal, State, county, city, and town taxes amounted in 1870 in currency to $730,591,521 against $83,000,000 gold in 1850, and $154,000,000 gold in 1860. The taxes in 1870 were $18.91 a head against $3.57 in 1850 and $4.90 in 1860. These taxes are eating up not merely income and earnings, all through the country. In 1870 the Federal taxes amounted to $450,000,000, while the State, county, city, and town taxes amounted to $280,000,000. Perhaps it would be better to express these amounts in tabular form.

The aggregate Federal taxation of the eleven years now closing, computed in currency from the official statements, is more than $4,500,000,000; the local taxation, assuming the census statement for 1870 as an average, is more than $3,000,000,000; the aggregate taxation exceeds $7,500,000,000.

The extravagance of our governmental consumption is illustrated by a comparison of the public expenditures of 1870, five years after the close of the war, with those of 1860 and 1850:

TAXES IN THE UNITED STATES.

	1850.	1860.	1870.

If the gentleman would not disdain to learn more from this message, he may find in it that the daily wants of the masses of mankind, even in the most productive and prosperous countries, press closely upon their daily earnings. It is only a small portion of their current income which they are able to save and to accumulate.

In Great Britian and Ireland, despite the wealth which their people have long been storing up, especially in machinery and moneyed capital, despite the yearly influx of $150,000,000 from interest on investments in other countries, the annual growth of wealth from the savings of all their people is not deemed by the best authorities to exceed six or seven hundred million dollars.

The accumulated wealth of the United States is the result of a shorter period of growth and is less in amount. We have to pay to foreign creditors annually in coin more than $100,000,000. We are richer in the natural powers of the soil, and our labor is, on the whole, more efficient. We earn more, but have less disposition to save and less of the habit of saving.

What will my colleague think when he further learns from this message of Governor Tilden "that a governmental consumption in every year, in bad as well as good years, must be considered greatly excessive when it amounts to a share of the national earnings larger than the whole people are able to save in prosperous times for all new investments; for erecting dwellings and other buildings; for improving farms, increasing the stock of live animals and of agricultural implements; for all manufacturing and mechanical constructions and machinery; for all warehouses and stores and increased supplies of merchandise; for ships and steamers and telegraphs and railroads and their equipments; for all objects which individual and corporate enterprise provide for the future in the progress of a populous and rapidly growing community.

Such taxation is in itself a monstrous evil, and its incidents aggravate its direct injuries. When the exaction from the people was, as in 1860, one-quarter of its present amount per head, even if it were unscientific and unskillful in the levy, the mischief was comparatively inconsiderable. But with the quadruplication of the exaction, the difficulty of obtaining good methods of imposing it is greatly increased, and the mischiefs of bad methods become well-nigh intolerable.

When governments take from the people, for official expenditure, nearly all the surplus earnings of individuals, science and skill in the art of taxation become necessary; necessary to preserve and enlarge the revenue, necessary to gild the infliction to the tax-payers. Our present situation is that we have more than European burdens, as seen in the most costly governments of the richest of modern nations supporting immense navies and armies and public debts; and to these burdens we have conjoined an ignorance and incompetency in dealing with them which are peculiarly our own. We have not yet acquired the arts belonging to a system which the founders of American government warned us against and fondly believed would never exist in this country.

The consequence is that the pecuniary sacrifices of the people are not to be measured by the receipts into the Treasury. They are vastly greater. A tax that starts in its career by disturbing the natural courses of private industry and impairing the productive power of labor, and then comes to the consumer distended by profits of successive intermediaries and by insurance against the risks of a fickle or uncertain governmental policy and of a fluctuating governmental standard of value, blights human well-being at every step. When it reaches the hapless child of toil, who buys his bread by the single loaf and his fuel by the basket, it devours his earnings and inflicts starvation.

Another evil of such a system of excessive taxation is that it creates and nourishes a governmental class, with tendencies to lessen services and to enlarge compensation, to multiply retainers, to invent jobs and foster all forms of expenditure—tendencies unrestrained by the watchful eye and firm hand of personal interest, which alone enable private business to be carried on successfully. In other countries such a class has found itself able, sometimes by its own influence and sometimes in alliance with the army, to rule the unorganized masses.

In our country it has become a great power, acting on the elections by all the methods of organization, of propagating opinion, of influence, and of corruption. The system, like every living thing, struggles to perpetuate its own existence.

Every useful and necessary governmental service, at a proper cost, is productive labor. Every excess beyond that, so far as it is saved by the official, merely transfers to him what belongs to the people. So far as such excess is consumed, it is a waste of capital as absolute as if wheat of equal value were destroyed by fire or gold were sunk in the ocean.

Probably such waste by governmental expenditure in the eleven years since the war amounts to at least as much as our present national debt."

My colleague may also learn that the misgovernment in the South is another call for economy.

And yet my colleague would disregard economy. Let him from the same source learn this also:

It cannot be doubted that the systematic and extreme misgovernment imposed on the States of the South has greatly detracted from our national prosperity. In those impoverished communities it has not stopped with the ordinary effects of ignorant and dishonest administration. It has inflicted upon them enormous issues of fraudulent bonds, the scanty avails of which were wasted or stolen, and the existence of which is a public discredit, tending to bankruptcy or repudiation. Its taxes, generally oppressive, in some instance have confiscated the entire income of property and totally destroyed the marketable value.

It therefore became indispensable that not only the governors of States but the legislators in the Federal Congress should cut down these enormous taxes that were eating up the earnings and substance of our people.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Is it on account of this great economy on the part of Governor Tilden that my colleague supported him so ably at the Saint Louis convention? [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I suppose I supported him just as you supported Mr. CONKLING, who was not nominated. [Laughter.] How did you stand with regard to Mr. CONKLING and Mr. BLAINE and the rest of them? O! you were an original Hayes man, were you? When you ask questions of that kind you should consider your own miserable condition. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. COX. I will answer the gentleman with great pleasure, if my time be extended. If my time is out, more reason for its extension. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Speaker of the House and the House have held strictly that it is not within the power of the Committee of the Whole, when under an order from the House, to extend the time for general debate or the time allotted to each speaker. It is in the power of the Committee of the Whole to rise in order that the time of the gentleman may be extended.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I rise to reply, and will yield all my time except one minute to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I hope this additional time will not come out of the time allowed for general debate.

Mr. COX. I will not take up the time of the House, but will print for the use of my friend from Ohio the details of that economy which we commend in this presidential and centennial year to the great people of the country.

Mr. GARFIELD. I only wanted to say that $450,000,000 which Governor Tilden states in that paper as the amount of Federal taxation for 1870 is an overstatement by at least $100,000, according to the official records of the Government, as I am ready to show.

Mr. COX. Why, sir, that calculation does not include the extra taxes by reason of the protective tariff—the cost of consumption—which would increase the amount $1,000,000,00 if rightly computed.

In compliance, therefore, with the generous leave of the House to extract from our governor lessons of economy for the whole country, I conclude by calling attention to his first pronunciamento at Syracuse, on the 17th September, 1874, before taking upon himself the active candidacy of that year, which made him our governor by 50,000 majority:

One thing only remains in its integrity; that is our taxes. Amid general decay, taxation puts out new sprouts and grows luxuriantly.

"It seats itself"—

if I may borrow a figure from the greatest of our American poets—

"upon the sepulchre,
And of the triumphs of its ghastly foe
Makes its own nourishment."

National taxes, State taxes, county taxes, town taxes, municipal taxes. The collector is as inevitable as the grim messenger of death. Incomes, profits, wages; all these fall, but taxes rise.

Six years ago I had occasion to say that while values were ascending, and for some time after, it might be easy to pay these taxes out of the froth of our apparent wealth; but that when the re-action of an unsound system of government finance should set in, the enormous taxations which that system had created would consume not only our incomes and profits, but trench upon our capital. What was then prediction is now experience.

Retrenchment in public expenditure. Reform in public administration. Simplification and reduction of tariffs and taxes. Accountability of public officers, enforced by better civil and criminal remedies. The people must have these measures of present relief—measures of economy for the future.

A change of men is necessary to secure a change of measures. The opposition is being matured and educated to take the administration. The democracy, with the traditions of its best days, will form the nucleus of the opposition. It embraces vastly the larger body of men of sound ideas and sound practices in political life. It must remove every taint which has touched it in evil times. It must become a compact and homogeneous mass. It must gather to its alliance all who think the same things concerning the interests of our Republic. It is becoming an adequate and effective instrument to reform the administration and to save the country.

It reformed itself in order that it might reform the country, and now, in your name and in the name of the 500,000 voters whom you represent, we declare that in this great work we will tread no step backward. Come weal or come woe, we will not lower our flag. We will go forward until a political revolution will be worked out and the principles of Jefferson and Jackson shall rule in the administration of the Federal Government.

Let us obey the patriotic maxim of old Rome, never to despair of our country. Actual evils can be mitigated. Bad tendencies can be turned aside. The burdens of government can be diminished. Productive industry will be renewed, and frugality will repair the waste of our resources. Then shall the golden days of the Republic once more return and the people become prosperous and happy.

The taxes levied by the Legislature of 1874 were 7¼ mills on a valuation of $2,169,307,873. Their produce, when all realized, is $15,727,482.08.

The taxes levied by the Legislature of 1875 were 6 mills. They were computed in the comptroller's office and in the legislative committees on the valuation of the previous year. On that basis their produce would have been $13,015,847.24.

The reduction would have been $2,711,634.84. But the valuation was increased to $2,367,780,102. The produce of a 6-mills tax on that amount is $14,206,680.61. The increase of the valuation gives an excess over the estimated amount of $1,190,833.37. The reduction actually effected is $1,520,801.47.

A reduction of taxes, without reduction in appropriations, would but create a deficiency and a floating debt. These would have to be paid by a subsequent increase of taxes. The appropriation bills were framed to correspond with the lower valuation, and much effort was made to keep down the appropriations. The result is shown in the following table:

Appropriations and taxes of 1875 compared.

	Mills.	Appropriations of 1875.	Tax computed on valuation of 1874.	Tax computed on valuation of 1875.	Excess.
Schools	1¼	$2,712,000 00	$2,711,634 84	$2,959,725 13	$248,090 29

After one year of democratic rule in the Empire State the State taxes were reduced, as compared with the last year of republican rule, to the extent of two and three-quarters millions of dollars.

The following table gives in detail the amount saved to each county on a comparison of the tax for 1875, under democratic rule, with the tax of 1874, under republican rule:

Had the State assessors not raised the valuation since the rate of taxation was fixed by the Legislature and governor the saving would have been much more.

The governor promised, if the people should send him a Legislature to co-operate with him, to make twice as large a reduction in the taxes next year. This Legislature did not come; but he did well without such a body, as the governor's message reveals. I am allowed graciously to print from it:

The reduction in the appropriations of 1875, below the taxes of 1874—counting, at its true construction, one item about which there may be some doubt—is $2,554,677.65. This leaves the sum of $1,033,875.18 applicable to the reduction of taxes for the coming fiscal year.

The objects in respect to which a reduction of taxes was effected were:

	1874.	1875.	Reduction.
Extraordinary canal repairs	$1,898,144 39	None.	$1,898,144 39

REDUCTION OF STATE TAXES FOR 1876 TO ONE-HALF THE TAXES OF 1874.

The taxes for State purposes in 1874 were 7¼ mills on a valuation of $2,169,307,873, producing	$15,727,482 08
The taxes for State purposes in 1876, if reduced to 3.625 mills on the valuation of 1874, or 3.321 mills on the valuation of 1875, which is $2,367,780,102, would yield	7,863,741 04

From these figures from Governor Tilden's message my colleagues may learn what benefit our governor has bestowed on our State; and he as well as others may infer how much benefit an economist may render to the whole nation when he may select a cabinet of honest officials and demand accountability in Federal as he has in State matters.

Mr. TUCKER. I am aware of the delicacy of the question which is now before the committee. It involves drawing the border line between the right of self-preservation on the part of this country upon the one hand and on the other the duty which the country owes to another country with which it is at peace. Upon this question I will take the liberty of quoting Phillimore, who, in his great work upon international law, says:

The right of self-preservation is the first law of nations as it is of individuals. A society which is not in a condition to repel aggression from without is wanting in its principal duty to the members of which it is composed and to the chief end of its institution. (1 Phillimore on International Law, page 225.)

Again he says:

We have hitherto considered what measures a nation is entitled to take for the preservation of her safety within her own dominions. It may happen that the same right may warrant her in extending precautionary measures without these limits, and even in transgressing the borders of her neighbor's territory. For international law considers the right of self-preservation as prior and paramount to that of territorial inviolability and, where they conflict, justifies the maintenance of the former at the expense of the latter right.

The case of conflict indeed must be indisputable, pouveridia na luce clarior, in the language of canonists. Such a case, however, is quite conceivable. A rebellion or a civil commotion, it may happen, agitates a nation; while the authorities are engaged in repressing it bands of rebels pass the frontier, shelter themselves under the protection of the conterminous state, and thence, with restored strength and fresh appliances, renew their invasion upon the state from which they have escaped. The invaded state remonstrates. The remonstrance, whether from favor to the rebels or feebleness of the executive, is unheeded, or, at least, the evil complained of remains unredressed. In this state of things the invaded state is warranted by international law in crossing the frontier, and in taking the necessary means for her safety, whether these be the capture or dispersion of the rebels or the destruction of their stronghold, as the exigencies of the case may fairly require.

Phillimore then cites Vattel as follows:

Vattel maintains strongly this opinion: "Il est certain que si mon voisin donnait retraite à mes ennemis lorsqu'ils auraient du pire et se trouveraient trop faibles pour m'échapper, leur laissant le temps de se refaire et d'épier l'occasion de tenter une nouvelle irruption sur mes terres, cette conduite, si préjudiciable à ma sûreté et à mes intérêts, serait incompatible avec la neutralité. Lors donc que mes ennemis battus se retirent chez lui, si la charité ne lui permet pas de leur refuser passage et sûreté, il doit les faire passer outre le plus tôt possible, et ne point souffrir qu'ils se tiennent aux aguets pour m'attaquer de nouveau; autrement il me met en droit de les aller chercher dans ses terres. C'est ce qui arrive aux nations qui ne sont pas en état de faire respecter leur territoire: le théâtre de la guerre s'y établit bientôt; on y marche, on y campe, on s'y bat, comme dans un pays ouvert à tous venants." (Phillimore on International Law, pages 226-228.)

After citing some illustrative cases, Phillimore goes on to say:

In all cases where the territory of one nation is invaded from the country of another, whether the invading force be composed of the refugees of the country invaded or of subjects of the other country or of both, the government of the invaded country has a right to be satisfied that the country from which the invasion has come has neither by sufferance nor reception (patientia aut receptu) knowingly aided or abetted it. She must purge herself of both these charges; otherwise if the cause be the feebleness of her government the invaded country is warranted in redressing her own wrong by entering the territory and destroying the preparations of war therein made against her, or if these have been encouraged by the government, then the invaded country has a strict right to make war upon that country herself, because she has afforded not merely an asylum but the means of hostility to the foes of a nation with whom she was at peace. For it never can be maintained that however much a state may suffer from piratical incursions which the feebleness of the executive government of the country whence they issue renders it incapable of preventing or punishing, that until such government shall voluntarily acknowledge the fact the injured state has no right to give itself that security which its neighbor's government admits that it ought to enjoy, but which that government is unable to guarantee.

It must be admitted that there is a practical acknowledgment of such inability which, as much as a voluntary confession, justifies the offended country in a course of action which would under other circumstances be unlawful.

* * * * *

Now, it is presumed that a sovereign knows what his subjects openly and frequently commit, and as to his power of hindering the evil, this likewise is always presumed, unless the want of it be clearly proved. So Vattel: "Si un souverain, qui pourrait retenir ses sujets dans les règles de la justice et de la paix, souffre qu'ils maltraitent une nation, ou dans son corps ou dans ses membres, il ne fait pas moins de tort à toute la nation que s'il la maltraitait lui-même." (1 Phillimore's International Law, pages 230-232.)

Now, Phillimore and Vattel are speaking of a case where a nation permits enemies from another nation to find refuge within its borders. But the case now before the committee is one in which the Mexican nation harbors in its own realm its own citizens who are the enemies of our peace upon our borders; and the question is whether international law prevents us from vindicating the right of our territorial inviolability against marauders who are protected under the government of Mexico, for Mexico says, "We are powerless to keep them from going over." That is the question.

Why, sir, suppose that, while I am walking along the streets, a ferocious dog attacks me and by one of my limbs pulls me within the border of the land of my neighbor, who owns the dog, have I no right to follow him up and make him desist from his seizure of my property or of my person, or to secure myself against a further attack? Or, if it is necessary for me to go inside the premises of my neighbor to prevent his renewal of attack, have I not the right to do it? Can there be any idea in any man's mind that I became a trespasser upon my neighbor's property by taking steps to prevent a disturbance of or attack on me by a dog or any other marauder he may have on his premises? It seems to me the common sense of the matter is clearly in favor of such right. The common law justifies me in pursuing a robber or highwayman who assails me, so far as is necessary to give me complete security against a renewal of his attack.

Mr. Chairman, the whole question turns on this: that Mexico says "I am unable to do this." Well, sir, if you have a household that you are unable so to control as to be consistent with my peace and safety, I have the right to maintain my peace even if I violate the integrity of your household. Your house is a castle for your defense; but not an asylum for my enemies, from which to assail me.

Now, sir, in the brief remarks I shall make on this subject I will call the attention of the House to the fact that wherever the property of the American citizen is taken by the citizens of a foreign power this country has the right to grant letters of marque and reprisal. And I beg the committee to understand that reprisals for private wrong are within the limits of peaceable remedy, as laid down by the writers on international law, which I will now quote:

Retorsion, we have seen, is a vindication of offended comity. But even an injury done to the rights, stricti juris, of a state may be vindicated by the employment of a kind of force which nevertheless falls short of war, and the use of which is, and has always been held to be, compatible with the maintenance of general pacific relations. Such a vindication may be sought and obtained through the medium of reprisals. "Observa," Bynkershoek says, "represaliis locum non esse nisi in pace." (3 Phillimore's International Law, page 10.)

XIX. What are the subjects of reprisals? Strictly speaking, they affect the persons (ἀνδροληψία) as well as the goods of the subjects of the government against which they are granted.

In modern times, however, they have been chiefly confined to goods, and here it is to be observed that, jure gentium, all the subjects of the injuring government are liable to reprisals, whether they be native or domiciled, but not those who are travelers or passing guests. (Ibid., page 21.)

In other words, reprisal is a peaceable remedy. So Phillimore says, and so all the authorities say. It is of course not the most peaceable, but it is peaceable in the sense of being in contrast to a belligerent remedy. You may make reprisals, I say, for such injuries as we are now considering; and I beg to call the attention of the committee to one of the most striking cases of it. Let me read what Phillimore states occurred in England in the time of Cromwell:

When France was ruled by Cardinal Mazarin, during the minority of Louis XIV, and England was under the vigorous despotism of Cromwell, an English merchant-vessel was illegally seized and confiscated on the coast of France. The owner of the vessel, a Quaker, complained to Cromwell, who gave him a letter of which he was to be the bearer to Mazarin, told him to wait three days for an answer, which answer must be the restitution of the ship and cargo. "Tell the cardinal," said Cromwell, "that you have orders from me not to wait longer than three days." The Quaker went, and returned reporting the failure of his mission to Cromwell. Without any further diplomatic communication, that vigorous ruler dispatched two ships of war to make prize of French vessels in the channel. They accomplished their task; Cromwell sold the prizes, paid out of the proceeds to the Quaker the value of his loss, and then apprised the French embassador that the residue was at his service.

"Cette insolente justice," says Mr. Villemain in his biography of Cromwell, "n'excita ni réclamation ni guerre;" but in truth it was an act of substantial justice, and insolent only because the forms of previous diplomatic remonstrances, certainly a grave defect, had been omitted." (3 Phillimore's International Law, pages 24, 25.

And the committee are aware of the celebrated case, which he also quotes, of General Jackson in 1834 recommending reprisals on France for her refusal to carry out obligations she owed to this country. (Idem, page 33, 34.)

So reprisals are peaceable remedies. Now, if we have the right to make reprisals of Mexican property in order to indemnify American citizens for damage done to their property, a fortiori we can make an entry upon Mexican territory to the extent and for the purpose of getting back our own property. If we can take another man's property to indemnify us for loss of our own, resulting from his sufferance or reception, (patientia aut receptu,) cannot we retake our own property in specie which has been lost, and thus to indemnify ourselves?

I beg to go a little further. But this is not reprisal. We do not propose to go that far. We only go to the extent of crossing into the Mexican territory to get at our own property, when the government in whose territory it is has declared it is unable to restore the property to us. That is all. If a gentleman tells me "I am not able to let you get your property; somebody has brought it here on my premises, and I am unable to hand it over to you for some cause, I care not what," what then am I to do? Am I to let it alone in the possession of that neighbor? Am I a trespasser when I go on the land of my neighbor to recover my property? If I go peaceably to the premises of my neighbor and reclaim my property, I say that is a peaceable act; it is not war. I thereby declare no war or enmity against my neighbor when I do that peaceably; I merely remedy the grievance done to me, which he declares he is unable to redress.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the treaty relations between Mexico and this country are such that I suggest an amendment to the second section, which I think will obviate all the objections made to the passage of this joint resolution. The treaty of 1848 and later treaties between Mexico and this country require the extradition of thieves and marauders escaping into Mexican territory. Now suppose Mexico says, "I cannot deliver them," will this House hold we have not the right to cross the border and seize them? But we do not propose to do that. We have not even made a demand for them. What we propose to do is simply this, to recapture our own property. Now it is provided in one of the treaties referred to that, if difficulty should occur between this country and Mexico, resort should not be had at once to reprisals; in which provision it is by implication conceded that reprisals would be a peaceable remedy between parties bound together in peaceful relations by treaty. So there can be no question on that point between the two countries. Gentlemen need not be afraid, therefore, that this is or can be regarded as an act of war. It is a peaceable remedy between nations at peace, a remedy taken by the nation, who has the power to take it, when and because the other nation has not the power to give it.

Now, sir, I would propose this amendment, and I send it to the Clerk's desk for the purpose of having it read. My proposition is substantially that notice should be given by the President of the United States to the Mexican government calling attention to the wrongs and injuries of which we complain, calling upon it to redress them on its own motion, and providing further that, if within four months after the service of this notice the government of Mexico does not provide the remedy and if these inroads and invasions continue, then the President is authorized to use so much of the Army of the United States as may be necessary for the purpose of recapturing, and only for the purpose of recapturing, the property of American citizens with entire respect to the persons and property of peaceful citizens of Mexico.

Furthermore, if I may be permitted to end the sentence——

The CHAIRMAN. There are but five minutes left of the time for general debate, which it is the understanding of the Chair go to one of the colleagues of the chairman of the committee. The amendment of the gentleman from Virginia which he has sent up to be read can be withheld until it properly comes before the House in order.

Mr. TUCKER. I will take only one single minute.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I believe I have the floor for the remaining time, and I yield it to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. TUCKER. I am obliged to the gentleman. The latter part of my amendment provides that the President shall give formal notice to the Mexican government of this joint resolution, declaring that it is within the limits of our peaceful remedies, and with the purpose of maintaining peaceful relations between the two countries, and that unless Mexico can afford a remedy of prevention against these inroads and ravages upon our territory, we will be obliged to take into our own hands the redress which is there indicated.

Now, sir, I ask gentlemen can there be a fairer proposal to a friendly nation? We say to them, "These marauders are a people you have the power to control, or if you have not you ought to have, and do not control, and they are continually injuring us. If they continue to do so we will have to take the remedy into our own hands, and we give you fair time, we give you a fair chance to provide the remedy yourself. If you do not, with entire deference to you, with a spirit entirely friendly, and holding peaceful relations to you, we will go into your territory and get our property." That is all.

Why should we not? It is not war; it is peace—peace in the form in which I present it in my amendment, with the utmost deference to a weak power.

Gentlemen have said we would not do the same to Great Britain. Great Britain did the same to us. When the Caroline in 1838 fired across the border between Great Britain and American territory, fired into a British vessel and upon British soldiers, Great Britain sent a Captain McLeod and crew into American territory, cut out the Caroline from her American moorings, and sent her down Niagara Falls; and she vindicated her right to do so on the principle that she had the right to protect her own territory either against direct invasion from the American Government or the indirect invasion by those whom the Government of America would not prevent. Her right to do so was acknowledged again and again. There was no difficulty about it.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Let me ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. If I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia, he goes further than this joint resolution proposes to go. I understand him to say it is within the right of this Government, after one of these incursions into our territory and property of our citizens has been taken off, to send its troops in search of that property and recapture it. I understand the resolution only to go to the extent that our troops may pursue these lawless raiders with their booty, in hot pursuit as it were, when they come upon our territory to take property and carry off women and children—that our troops when they see them in the act, when they have crossed the border and committed these depredations, shall pursue them in "hot pursuit," as it were, across the border. I understand that is only the extent to which this joint resolution goes.

Mr. TUCKER. I do not propose to go to the full extent of our right, or as far as we would be justified in going. I would always, sir, in private and public affairs deal with a weaker opponent much more generously than with a stronger, and so every magnanimous and noble nation will act. In this case we deal with Mexico with entire respect, and with a deference to its unhappy condition which we should not show to a more powerful neighbor.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I understand that the gentleman's amendment does not go entirely to the extent of the position now laid down.

Mr. TUCKER. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TUCKER. I again thank the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] for his courtesy in yielding me a part of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The limit fixed for general debate has now been reached, and the next thing in order is the consideration of the bill by sections for amendment under the five-minute rule.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I have just now discovered a very important clerical error in the second section. The words "when in hot pursuit of the robbers with their booty" have been left out in section 2. I ask unanimous consent that that correction may be made.

Mr. HURLBUT. It is a misprint.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Those words are left out of the bill as printed. They were in our report. I move to insert after the word "troops," in section 2, line 6, the words:

When in hot pursuit of the robbers with their booty.

Mr. HURLBUT. Let the section be read as it will be when amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That in view of the inability of the national government of Mexico to prevent the inroads of lawless parties from Mexican soil into Texas, the President is hereby authorized, whenever in his judgment it shall be necessary for the protection of the rights of American citizens on the Texas frontier, above described, to order the troops when in hot pursuit of the robbers with their booty to cross the Rio Grande, and use such means as they may find necessary for recovering the stolen property and checking the raids, guarding, however, in all cases, against any unnecessary injury to peaceable inhabitants of Mexico.

There was no objection, and the omitted words were inserted in the second section.

Mr. CONGER. I now desire to offer the amendment I indicated. I desire to move to strike out the second section.

The CHAIRMAN. The second section is not as yet before the committee for consideration. The first section will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, &c., That for the purpose of giving efficient protection to the country between the Rio Grande and Nueces River, in the State of Texas, from the cattle-thieves, robbers, and murderers from the Mexican side of the river, the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized and required to station and keep on the Rio Grande River, from the mouth of that river to the northern boundary of the state of Tamaulipas, above Laredo, two regiments of cavalry, for field service, in addition to such infantry force as may be necessary for garrison duty, and to assign recruits to said regiments, so as to fill each troop to number one hundred privates; and they shall be kept up to that strength as long as they shall be required in that service.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I offer on the part of the committee the following amendment to the first section:

Strike out the words "the northern boundary of the state of Tamaulipas, above Laredo," and insert in lieu thereof the words "Fort Duncan and above, if necessary."

I will state what is the object of that amendment. From late reports we find that the raids have extended higher up than the upper boundary of Tamaulipas, and by this amendment we move the boundary on which these troops can be stationed higher up, so as to cover that ground.

Mr. HARRISON. I rise to oppose the amendment pro forma, desiring to answer some remarks of my friend from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER.] My eloquent friend begs the question when he assumes that the Government of Mexico acknowledges its inability to prevent these outrages. Sir, I claim that the gentleman has not read, or, if he has read, he has not read carefully, the report and testimony before this House. The testimony shows that the outrages committed along the Rio Grande, if not committed by men living on this side of the river, were at least committed by those who were in actual connivance with men living on this side. The gentleman says that if a wild dog belonging to his neighbor comes over into his ground and seizes him by a limb, shall he not follow him into and upon the premises of that neighbor? I ask the gentleman if he had a wild dog on his own side and that dog brings over the wild dog from the other side, whether that would justify him in following the wild dog of his neighbor. First, keep your own wild dog in subjection. Do your own duty at home. Prevent your lawless men from committing outrages before you propose to retaliate or make reprisals upon your neighbor. Pluck the beam from your own eye, and then the mote in that of your neighbor will not seem so large.

Now, sir, by the testimony, as collated by myself three days ago, when the House was not so full as it is now, I showed, by quotations from the evidence of the very men relied upon by the gentleman of this committee, that these outrages had been committed either by men living on this side, Texans, or by men who, living in Texas, under the liberal laws of that State, were claiming the protection of Texan laws. Sir, I do not intend to vote against the first section of this joint resolution. I am willing to send soldiers, and enough of them, to protect the border from men who live on this side or on the other side who commit outrages upon peaceable citizens, and prevent them from crossing to the other side. And if they do cross, let them in the emergency of the moment, in hot haste, follow them, as a simple right. But do not let this Congress here, acting calmly in its right as the Congress of the American people, pass a resolution that will say, "You of Mexico deny these outrages as having been committed by your people."

Your report denies these wrongs; but we will not take a word you say, but will garble the testimony that comes here from prejudiced men of this nation; we will read and listen to so much of that testimony as is in our favor, but will turn a deaf ear to everything that is against us. We will assume, against your protestations to the contrary, that you acknowledge your people all in the wrong and our people all in the right, and we will order our troops upon your soil. Or, according to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, we will give you ninety days to correct the evil we claim you are doing; and if you fail to correct them, our soldiers shall cross over and make reprisals. Magnanimous proposition from this proud Republic to that poor, revolution-torn but proud sister-republic!

If gentlemen will carefully read the testimony before the committee, they will find that according to the evidence of their own witnesses, brought by these gentlemen, out of a thousand families in one county there are only some ten or fifteen who do not speak Mexican and only five or six who are registered voters, and that by jurors selected from those thousand families they cannot convict a single thief. Why? Because the jurors protected by the Texan laws dare not bring in a verdict; and therefore because they do not enforce the law we are to allow our soldiers to cross over the border.

I say what I am saying, sir, not really in opposition to the first resolution but in order to answer the gentleman from Virginia. I admit that the gentleman from Virginia may be right as to international law and that he has laid down the law correctly, but the facts brought up here by this committee are not sufficient to justify us to ask under the law laid down by him—not sufficient to justify us in taking this high-handed movement and demanding of Mexico, "If you do not do this or that, if you do not prevent outrages which you deny you are responsible for, and do it in ninety days, we will march over your border." Let a commission be appointed by the President of the United States and let us revise our treaty if necessary. Let us treat them as a nation, our peer in everything of nationality, though not our peer in power, but let us treat Mexico as if she were our peer in power as well as in nationality.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TUCKER. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of saying a single word in reply to the gentleman from Illinois. My friend from Illinois says that I have assumed that the Mexican government acknowledged itself unable to prevent or redress these wrongs. Now, I said that out of charity and kindness for her. But she is at all events in this dilemma: either she is able to redress these wrongs and will not do so, which would be, stricti juris, a cause of war, or she is unable to do it; and that is the ground on which I put it; and therefore we must redress these wrongs ourselves because of her inability to do so. It is her misfortune, not her fault.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. Is it not the fact that she is unable to protect our people from marauders who live upon our side of the line?

Mr. SCHLEICHER. There is not a word in the whole evidence to sustain the statement of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. TUCKER. I say this, and I am sustained by the authorities cited by me this morning, that, if there were rebels on this side of the Rio Grande who fled into the Mexican territory and there combined with other parties who were in complicity with them and fortified themselves, we should have the right to pursue them there and destroy their fortifications; that is the principle, and therefore why these marauders come from this side or the other side of the border the remedy proposed is entirely legitimate.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say one word.

The CHAIRMAN. To what question does the gentleman speak?

Mr. REAGAN. To the informal amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER;] and I do so for the purpose of saying a word in response to what has been said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] to-day and what was said by him on a former occasion. He assumes that the testimony develops the fact that these marauders were citizens of Texas. He got that not from the report of the evidence which the committee have taken, but he got it from the Mexican report, a considerable part of it, at least, which I have examined; and in order to illustrate the reliability of that report, I will say this, that it devotes many pages to an attempt to vindicate the character and the conduct of General Cortina, a man who has bid defiance to all the laws of Mexico and the laws of the United States, to the laws of Tamaulipas and of Texas; who has deposed governors and shot judges and alcaldes. He has been at the head of an organized band of cattle-stealers, and there is evidence that he was engaged in supplying a large contract with Spain with cattle stolen from the people of Texas, and there is no dispute about it.

The gentleman referred to another point. He states that it is developed in the testimony that many inhabitants on the northern bank of the Rio Grande are Mexicans. That testimony was brought in for the purpose of showing the difficulty of enforcing the laws. Many of them are not English-speaking people. Marauders come among them and neither the civil officer nor the soldiers can determine who are the marauders and who of those Mexicans belong to Texas. The very evidence that the gentleman read on a former occasion was that whenever the marauders were overtaken either by the military or civil authorities, they excused themselves by stating, "I live at such and such a place," or, "I am going to such a place." And it is impossible for either the military or the civil authorities to know what is the truth in regard to them. Under the laws of Texas the civil authorities dare not make an arrest without an affidavit, and the military have no right to make arrests in civil cases, hence it is as shown by the testimony of the military and civil officers that the existence of the Mexican population on this side of the Rio Grande gives protection to the marauders and makes it difficult to enforce the laws. And yet the gentleman from Illinois, in disregard to the facts of the case, in disregard of humanity to his own fellow-citizens, in disregard of the national honor and of the welfare of this people, mocks them in the hour of their calamity by saying why not arrest these men, when the testimony reveals the impossibility of doing it? What does he propose for them to do? Does he propose to deliver our people bound hand and foot to the robbers there rather than vindicate their rights by the laws of nations and the laws of common reason?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TUCKER. I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. I move to strike out the last five words. Now, Mr. Chairman, as there is a question of veracity here——

Mr. REAGAN. O! no.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. A question of recollection.

Mr. HARRISON. No, sir; I quoted and read directly from the testimony. It is true that I read, or rather I understand, that testimony differently from the gentlemen. I claim that they look at it through Texan eyes and I look on it as an American citizen. I say that our national honor and the high position we occupy among the nations of the world forbids that we should go into Mexico, a poor, unfriended nation, overcome with revolution and demand at her hands what she cannot give us just now.

I will read the testimony which I quoted. I cannot give the page, because, not having the report marked before me as I had when I made my speech, I am compelled to read from the printed copy of the remarks which I made two or three days since.

Mr. MILLS. Does the gentleman propose to prove his own statements by reading from his own speech?

Mr. HARRISON. Not at all; I say I read from the testimony in the report.

Mr. MILLS. You say you are reading from your own speech.

Mr. HARRISON. I am reading from the testimony as collated in my speech. I merely read from my speech for convenience.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. You do not read all the testimony.

Mr. HARRISON. I read the following:

The country is filled with numbers of armed Mexicans; and it is a most common sight to see four or five or six men, well armed and mounted, whose business no one knows. If you ask them who they are, they will say, "We belong to a ranch fifteen or twenty miles distant," or, "We are trading stock," or, "We have been visiting Brownsville or Matamoras," or, "We belong on the other side of the river," or, "We are going to our employer's ranch in the interior," or they may claim to belong to some neighboring ranch. We know nothing of them, and if we take them to the ranch to which they say they belong the servants of the ranch generally, without hesitation, verify their statement, in many instances from friendship, most frequently from fear.

There are men riding about in squads of four or five or six, according to this testimony. They do not arrest them because when they go to the ranch which they claim to be from the servants there will acknowledge them. Now, in another place is this testimony:

A large proportion of the Mexican population on this side of the river have their homes on the other side. They live over here, and are employed on this side; but they claim no citizenship here, and they are in active, direct sympathy with the raiders.

Did I say anything more than that? This is testimony from the gentleman's own witness, not from the Mexicans. I did not read one word from the Mexican report except the quotations made from the Texan newspapers. The gentleman said when I made these quotations: "O, they are partisan;" as if it were a republican charging a democrat or a democrat charging a republican. How are we to suppose that they are partisan? This Mexican report gives the statements copied from these newspapers, and that is all that I read from that report; I did not read another word from the Mexican report. What I read was from the testimony of witnesses brought here by the gentleman himself to prove his point, and I claim that it proved my side of the question.

Mr. HANCOCK. I wish to say but a word or two upon this subject. I had observed the view which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] seemed determined to take of the statements of Captain McNally, from whose testimony I presume he quoted in reading from his speech the other day. Allow me to explain to the gentleman from Illinois that Captain McNally simply meant to depict, as well as he might be able, probably not in such glowing terms of eloquence as the gentleman from Illinois could use, the condition of that country and the necessity of some prompt measures being taken in regard to securing the persons and property of the people of Texas. The roaming parties to which he makes allusion are persons who covertly came into the country from the other side of the Rio Grande and assume to have some relations with persons living on this side. In that way they evade suspicion for a great while and frequently detection, and also escape arrest, not alone by the civil authorities but by the military authorities. In that way they are enabled to penetrate into the country for a great distance.

This is a country that is sparsely peopled. These marauders come in different detachments, and have their rendezvous sometimes one hundred and twenty miles and even one hundred and fifty miles east of the Rio Grande. When they have formed their junction with their confederates they band themselves together and are able to drive out of the country the cattle, horses, or any other character of stock they may select, and escape interference from either the civil or military authorities.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman allow me a question just there?

Mr. HANCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. When these men are seen on your side, why do you not arrest them and punish them?

Mr. HANCOCK. The same rule applies there as in Illinois, where there are probably not so many persons of this character; it is almost indispensable to catch them first.

Mr. HARRISON. You see them.

Mr. HANCOCK. I am trying to explain to the gentleman from Illinois why it is that they cannot be arrested by the civil authorities by reason of the peculiar condition of the country, it being very sparsely peopled. If the gentleman will read from the testimony he will find that in fact—and I mean no offense by saying so—he really knows nothing about what the witness has said upon the subject; he seems to have most unqualifiedly misapprehended what the witness intended to convey. If he will read the testimony entirely through, I think he can hardly misunderstand what was the purpose of the witness, in his effort to convey to the committee an understanding of the true condition of that country and the necessity of something being done for the protection of the people there.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I move to amend by striking out the last two words. I do not wish to say an original word of my own; but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] has read two or three snatches from the evidence of Captain McNally, but he has omited a very material part. I wish to read it all in connection, including what he read:

The country is filled with numbers of armed Mexicans; and it is a most common sight to see four or five or six men, well armed and mounted, whose business no one knows. If you ask them who they are, they will say, "We belong to a ranch fifteen or twenty miles distant," or, "We are trading stock," or, "We have been visiting Brownsville or Matamoras," or, "We belong on the other side of the river," or, "We are going to our employer's ranch in the interior," or they may claim to belong to some neighboring ranch. We know nothing of them, and if we take them to the ranch to which they say they belong, the servants of the ranch generally, without hesitation, verify their statement; in many instances, from friendship; most frequently from fear. The Mexican owners of ranches on this side of the river, those who are citizens of Texas, are, almost to a man, as much opposed to this system of raiding as the American citizens of Texas are. Many of them have not nerve enough to take an active, decided stand against it either by giving information or by personal assistance. Still a number of them have done it since I have been out there; and some eight or ten of them, or probably twelve, have been killed on that account. It has been the history of those border counties that when any man, Mexican or American, has made himself prominent in hunting those raiders down, or in organizing parties to pursue them when they are carrying off cattle, he has been either forced to move from the ranch and come into town, or he has been killed. Quite a number of Americans have been killed within the last year out there, and also quite a number of Mexicans; probably twelve or fifteen for that offense alone. The men on the other side of the river threaten to kill them, and the fact is known publicly. They say, "We will kill that man within a week," and the report is heralded abroad over the country, and if the man does not leave they usually carry their threat into execution. We have a few Mexican rancheros who take an active part against these raiders, and who send me information and aid me with their services personally in hunting down the raiders and in keeping out a guard in their own neighborhood, sending out regularly the vaqueros to certain points to watch the trains of cattle. But the large proportion of the Mexican settlers on this side of the river is a floating population, who vote on this side as well as on the other. Many of them have been born and claim citizenship in Mexico. A large proportion of the Mexican population on this side of the river have their homes on the other side. They live over here, and are employed on this side: but they claim no citizenship here, and they are in active, direct sympathy with the raiders. They are their kinsfolk, their cousins, uncles, and brothers—for it seems to me as if all the Mexicans on both sides of the river are relatives.

Mr. HARRISON. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman directly contradicted the accuracy of my statement of the evidence; but he has not only read exactly what I quoted but additional matter which strengthens my position. It appears by what he has just read that many of these men vote on both sides of the river.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Not the raiders, but the floating population.

Mr. HARRISON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not oppose at all the first resolution. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] says, "First catch your thief." Now, when we learn from Captain McNally's testimony that he goes with these men, that he rides along with them, it looks as if with the regiments which I will vote to send there, we might succeed in taking them.

But do you not bring in here testimony which shows that the outrages are committed by men living on this side and voting on both sides of the river? I suppose that next fall they will come over in crowds; they are invited, it seems, to come up and vote. But this second resolution says, "Let your colonels, your captains, and lieutenants be sent over the border; but be careful not to do any unnecessary injury to peaceful citizens" Gentlemen, if that resolution passes it will be a dishonor to the American nation, and therefore I oppose it.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. HILL. I renew the amendment. I am very anxious to do what is necessary to protect the people on the borders of Texas; but I confess that I have considerable trouble in relation to this second section of the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The first section is now under consideration.

Mr. HILL. Well, though my remarks might more pertinently be presented when the second section shall be under consideration, I believe while I am up I will say what I had intended to say.

The argument of my very excellent friend from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] does not altogether satisfy my mind; and I think the instances he quotes upon the question of law are not exactly in point. Still, I concede the general proposition that self-preservation is just as much the law of nations as of individuals; and cases may arise, and doubtless have arisen—such cases are mentioned by all the law-writers—where you may under certain circumstances pursue marauders even into the territory of a nation with which you are at peace. But this is giving a very strong power to the executive government and a very dangerous one, one that may result in no damage or in very great damage, and one which I think ought to be conceded with very great caution.

Now I want to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] this question: if we shall pass the first section of the resolution and give two full regiments of cavalry to be stationed permanently on that border, does not the gentleman believe that that will remedy these difficulties? At least does it not give such promise of remedy that it ought to be tried first before going further?

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I answer the gentleman that certainly it will give some measure of security; but I wish to state right here that when the committee first met for the consideration of this question there was not a single member who contemplated the passage of any such proposition as is embraced in the second section. But it appears from the evidence that there is on our side of the river a thicket two hundred miles long and twenty miles wide, with only occasional paths through it, so that there are great facilities for the marauders to make their escape across the river, and the only chance of securing them is by following them across the river, perhaps only a few hundred yards, for the country on the other side is open. It was only after these facts were impressed upon us that the committee—very reluctantly, I can assure the gentleman—came to the conclusion to recommend the second section.

Mr. HILL. I have no doubt of that; but the question is whether the presence (known to these marauders in Mexico) of two full regiments of cavalry, always ready to capture and punish them, would not deter them from their incursions?

Mr. REAGAN. I refer the gentleman to the testimony of General Ord and other officers giving their opinion as military men that that will not be sufficient.

Mr. HILL. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The question then recurred on the amendment reported from the committee to strike out in the first section the words "northern boundary of the state of Tamaulipas above Laredo" and insert "Fort Duncan and above, if necessary."

The amendment was adopted.

The question then recurred on the second amendment reported from the committee, to add to the first section the following:

And the measures herein directed shall be carried out without delay, any restrictions or limitations in the laws in regard to the Army notwithstanding.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I will in a few words explain the necessity of that amendment. The proposition in the first section is that the two regular regiments to be stationed there shall be immediately recruited to one hundred privates in each company. Now, the Army appropriation bill as it passed this House the other day contains a section, section 6, that the President shall not be authorized to accept any recruits until the Army by natural reduction has been reduced to 22,000 men. At present the Army is little over 25,000 men, and it may take two or three years, and at least one year, before the Army by natural causes is reduced to 22,000. Therefore, unless this proposition is especially guarded against that provision in the Army appropriation bill, it would be entirely futile. For that reason I have provided in case that provision remains in the Army appropriation bill, so far as the recruiting of these two regiments is concerned it shall be free from the restrictions and limitations of that proviso.

Mr. FORT. I wish to ask the gentleman from Texas whether it could not be provided that infantry men may be transferred to the cavalry arm by their own consent? Then, instead of discharging the soldiers already enlisted and who to some extent have been drilled, they may be transferred to the cavalry service, and in that way we may go right along.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I do not see how any member of this House can have anything to do with that. It will be in the hands of the military authorities, and they very likely will do it. I merely wish to guard this section against the provision now contained in the Army appropriation bill, which would render this joint resolution futile, or at least suspend its full operation for a year or two.

The question was put to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. It would appear by the sound the amendment is rejected.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I hope not, as the amendment is one that is very necessary. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HURLBUT. Permit me to explain what that means. It is simply to authorize the recruiting of these two regiments to the full standard and to keep them so without reference to any reduction of the Army that may now or hereafter be adopted.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 84, noes 12; no quorum voting.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan insist on a further count?

Mr. CONGER. I think it is a dangerous proposition to make. It has been agreed the Army shall be limited to a particular number of men, of which fifty shall constitute a company in all of the regiments. This proposes that these twenty companies shall have one hundred each, and that reduces so much from other regiments in the cavalry service.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. It does nothing of the kind, but simply provides that these two regiments shall be recruited to the full standard of one hundred men to each company.

Mr. CONGER. The Army appropriation bill provides that there shall be so many in the Army. I do not know by what policy this House will destroy the Army altogether. This is in that direction.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CONGER. I have the floor, and have the right to debate the pending proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is dividing on the question and debate is not in order. Does the gentleman call for tellers?

Mr. CONGER. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Then no further count being insisted on, the amendment is adopted.

Mr. FORT. I have an amendment to offer, and I hope the chairman of the committee will give me his attention. I move to add to the amendment just adopted the following:

And the Secretary of War is authorized to transfer any enlisted man from the infantry to the cavalry on his request.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. FORT. Then I do not wish to discuss it.

Mr. HURLBUT. It cannot be done. The man who enlists in the infantry cannot be transferred to the cavalry without his own consent.

Mr. FORT. It is the desire of the gentleman having this bill in charge, as I understand him, to have these two regiments immediately recruited up to the full standard, and of course it is much better to keep in the Army men who have been enlisted and served in the infantry, and who have been drilled to some extent, by transferring them to the cavalry at their own request. They will be in lieu of new recruits, and I can see no good reason why the Secretary of War should not be allowed when the time of an infantry-man has expired to re-enlist him in the cavalry if he so desires. As the law now stands by the Army appropriation bill just passed our infantry force has to be reduced. This provides that the cavalry force shall be increased. For my part I can see no objection then to transferring an infantry-man whose time has expired and who is about to be discharged to the cavalry service if he so desires.

Mr. MILLS. If the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois is to leave it optional with the infantry to be transferred to the cavalry, I can only say to him that the result will be that the whole of the infantry will be transferred to the cavalry.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. If there be objection to the amendment of course I do not accept it, but will allow it to be voted upon by the House.

Mr. FORT. I will modify my proposition so as to provide that such transfer shall take place only until said regiments are full.

Mr. HURLBUT. That takes away the objection I originally made. It is not worth while, however, to do it. It is not worth while to encumber the resolution with anything of the kind because it can be done now. No man recruited in the infantry can be transferred to any other arm of the service but by his own consent.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMALLS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the first section the following:

Provided, That no troops for the purposes named in this section shall be drawn from the State of South Carolina so long as the militia of that State peaceably assembled are assaulted, disarmed, and taken prisoners, and then massacred in cold blood by lawless bands of men invading that State from the State of Georgia.

Mr. SMALLS. I hope the House will adopt that proviso as an amendment to the bill. As I have only five minutes I send to the desk a letter published in one of the newspapers here from an eye-witness of the massacre at Hamburgh, and I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

The origin of the difficulty, as I learn from the best and most reliable authority, is as follows: On the Fourth of July the colored people of the town were engaged in celebrating the day, and part of the celebration consisted in the parade of the colored militia company. After marching through the principal streets of the town, the company came to a halt across one of the roads leading out of the town. While resting there two white men drove up in a buggy, and with curses ordered the company to break ranks and let them pass through. The captain of the company replied that there was plenty of room on either side of the company, and they could pass that way. The white men continued cursing and refused to turn out. So the captain of the militia, to avoid difficulty, ordered his men to break ranks and permit the buggy to pass through:

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I rise to a point of order. I wish to know if this proposition is germane to the bill.

Several MEMBERS. Too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to say that it strikes him as being as germane as other propositions which have been generally entertained to make it allowable.

The Clerk continued the reading of the letter, as follows:

The order was obeyed, and the white men went on their way uttering threats. The next day a colored trial justice issued processes against the officers of the company, based on the complaint of the two white men, citing the officers to appear and answer to a charge of obstructing the public highway. They obeyed the writs, and after a slight examination the justice adjourned the trial until Saturday, the 8th instant. On that day, at an early hour, the town commenced to fill up with white men, armed to the teeth with repeating rifles and revolvers. The colored people had no idea of the bloody tragedy which was soon to take place, and consequently made no preparations to resist an attack, and were almost defenseless.

Late in the afternoon General M. C. Butler, one of the most malignant of the unreconstructed rebels, rode into the town, accompanied by a score of well-armed white men, and stated to the leading colored men that he came for the purpose of prosecuting the case on the part of the two white men, and he demanded that the militia company should give up their arms and also surrender their officers. This demand the militia was ready to comply with for the purpose of avoiding a difficulty if General Butler would guarantee them entire safety from molestation by the crowd of white desperadoes. This Butler refused to do, and persisted in his demand for the surrender of the guns and the officers, and threatened that if the surrender was not immediately made he would take the guns and officers by force of arms. This threat aroused the militia company to a realizing sense of their impending danger, and they at once repaired to a large brick building, some two hundred yards from the river, used by them as an armory, and there took refuge. They numbered in all about forty men and had a very small quantity of ammunition. During this time, while the militia were taking refuge in their armory the white desperadoes were coming into the town in large numbers, not only from the adjacent county of Edgefield, but also from the city of Augusta, Georgia, until they numbered over fifteen hundred well-armed and ruffianly men, who were under the immediate command and direction of the ex-rebel chief, M. C. Butler. After the entire force had arrived, the building where the militia had taken refuge was entirely surrounded and a brisk fire opened upon it. This fire was kept up for some two hours, when, finding that the militia could not be dislodged by small arms, a messenger was sent to Augusta for artillery. During all this time not a shot had been fired by the militiamen. The artillery arrived and was posted on the bank of the river and opened fire on the building with grape and canister.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I rise to a question of order. If this be read as a part of the gentleman's remarks, is he not subject to the five-minutes rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina was recognized at thirty-two minutes past three o'clock. There is still half a minute remaining.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I hope the paper will be read through.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the paper, as follows:

The militia now realized that it was necessary to evacuate the armory at once. They proceeded to do so, getting out of a back window into a corn-field. They were soon discovered by the ruffians, and a rush was made for them. Fortunately, by hiding and hard fighting, a portion of the command escaped, but twenty-one were captured by the bushwhackers and taken immediately to a place near the railroad station.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RAINEY. I rise to oppose the amendment, and I yield my time to my colleague [Mr. SMALLS] in order that the reading of the letter may be continued.

A MEMBER. The two gentlemen are on one side.

The CHAIRMAN. The present incumbent of the chair confesses to some doubt whether the multiplication and piling up of pro forma amendments for the purpose of mutual accommodation is strictly in accordance with the spirit of the rule. The Chair felt that in the debate that terminated a little while ago. But inasmuch as these things have generally been practiced—a multiplication of pro forma amendments or a gentleman getting the floor in order to yield time to another—the Chair allows this.

Mr. COX. I hope the paper will be read through.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I ask that it may be read by unanimous consent.

Mr. HANCOCK. I hope there will be no objection to its being read through.

The CHAIRMAN. The paper is being read in the time of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RAINEY.]

The Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

Here a quasi-drumhead court-martial was organized by the blood-hunters, and the last scene of the horrible drama began. It must now be remembered that not one of the twenty-one colored men had a pistol or gun about them. The moment they were captured their arms were taken from them, and they were absolutely defenseless. The orderly sergeant of the militia company was ordered to call the roll, and the first name called out to be shot in cold blood was Allan T. Attaway, the first lieutenant of the company, and holding the position of county commissioner of Aiken County, in which county Hamburgh is situated. He pleaded for his life, as only one in his position could plead, but his pleadings were met with curses and blows, and he was taken from the sight of his comrades and a file of twelve men fired upon him. He was penetrated by four balls, one entering his brain, and the other three the lower portion of his body. He was instantly killed and after he was dead the brutes in human shape struck him over the head with their guns and stabbed him in the face with their bayonets. Three other men were treated in the same brutal manner. The fifth man when taken out made a dash for his life, and luckily escaped with only a slight wound in his leg.

In another portion of the town the chief of police, a colored man named James Cook, was taken from his house and while begging for his life brutally murdered. Not satisfied with this, the inhuman fiends beat him over the head with their muskets and cut out his tongue.

Another colored man, one of the marshals of the town, surrendered and was immediately shot through the body and mortally wounded. He has since died. So far as I have been able to learn only one white man was killed. It will thus be seen that six colored men were brutally murdered and one wounded, while on the side of the whites only one man was killed. After this holocaust of blood was over the desperadoes in large bodies entered the houses of most of the prominent colored men of the town and completely gutted them. They stole all they possibly could, and what they could not steal they destroyed. Furniture was smashed, books torn to pieces, pictures cut from their frames, and everything that could be destroyed was given up to the demon of destruction. Such scenes my eyes have never before witnessed and the distress and suffering among the poor colored people was heart-rending to behold. The town is desolate and the inhabitants have taken refuge in Aiken, Columbia, and other points. The civil authorities are powerless or too negligent to do anything, and peace and order cannot be preserved unless United States troops are sent to this point at once.

The scenes during the massacre were fearful to behold—the moon shining down upon the horrid scene lighting up the whole with a ghastly light; the popping of the small arms; the screams of frightened women and terrified children; the loud reports from the artillery, all tended to make a scene terrible and more than fearful to behold. And now what was the provocation given for this hellish slaughter? The answer is, nothing. Legally the militia had the right of way over the public road. The day was the nation's holiday. The militia had a perfect right to parade, and vehicles of all kinds were required to keep out of their way, and not interfere with their marching. Again, General Butler had not the shadow of a right to demand the arms of the militia. They were organized under the constitution and laws of the State, and were part and parcel of the armed force of the Commonwealth. No private citizen had the slightest right to molest them. Such molestation was a direct blow at the power and authority of the State. It was a revolutionary step, and should be thus punished.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COCHRANE. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the letter be finished.

Mr. COOK. I hope there will be no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent cannot be granted in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. SMALLS,] and, as part of my remarks, I ask that the reading may be continued.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, perhaps, was not thoroughly understood when he spoke before. He desires simply to say that although he has some doubt about the propriety of these pro forma arrangements, still he cheerfully consents to their being continued, because such has been the practice in the Committee of the Whole House.

The Clerk resumed, and concluded the reading of the letter, as follows:

Are the southern colored citizens to be protected or are they to be left at the mercy of such ruffians as massacred the poor men of Hamburgh? The murdered Attaway was a man of considerable prominence in the republican party of the county. He was a law-abiding citizen, held a responsible office, and was well thought of by very many people. The other murdered men were good citizens and have never been known to infringe the law. The whole affair was a well and secretly planned scheme to destroy all of the leading republicans of the county of Aiken living in Hamburgh. M. C. Butler, who lost a leg while fighting in the ranks of the rebels, and who is to-day the bitterest of Ku-Klux democrats, was the instigator of the whole affair and the blood-thirsty leader of the massacre. He boasted in Hamburgh during the fight that that was only the beginning; that the end would not be until after the elections in November. Such a man should be dealt with without pity or without hesistation. The United States Government is not powerless, and surely she will not be silent in an emergency like this, the parallel of which pen cannot describe. In this centennial year will she stand idly by and see her soil stained with the blood of defenseless citizens, and witness the bitter tears of women and children falling upon the murdered bodies of their loved ones? God forbid that such an attitude will be assumed toward the colored people of the South by the "best Government the world ever saw." Something must be done, and that quickly, or South Carolina will shed tears of blood and her limbs be shackeled by democratic chains.

What I have written in this letter are facts which I vouch for entirely, and are not distorted in any degree. It's a "plain, unvarnished" narration of painful and horrible truths.

Mr. HILL. Read the name attached to the letter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands there is no name given.

Mr. HILL. Who is the author of the letter?

Mr. GUNTER. I call for the date of that paper and the name attached to it.

Mr. CONGER. I believe my time has not expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has not expired.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I call for the reading of the name of the author of the letter.

Mr. CONGER. I claim the floor for the balance of my time.

Mr. COCHRANE. Before this matter is concluded, I desire to know whether there is any name attached to that communication.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk informs the Chair that there is only a nom de plume attached.

Mr. COCHRANE. I understand that the name attached to that communication is erased. I ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SMALLS] whether he erased the name?

Mr. CONGER. I hope that all this will not be taken out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has five full minutes of sixty seconds each.

Mr. CONGER. Then I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. SMALLS.]

Mr. SMALLS. This is a letter written by a gentleman who was an eye-witness of this transaction to me, and I, sir, had that letter published in the paper. I am responsible for the name.

Mr. COCHRANE. Whose name is it? Who wrote that letter?

Mr. SMALLS. I will say to the gentleman if he is desirous that the name shall be given in order to have another negro killed, he will not get it from me. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] to yield me two minutes.

Mr. CONGER. I have already yielded five to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. SMALLS.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina wish to occupy the rest of the five minutes?

Mr. SMALLS. I do not.

Mr. CONGER. Then I resume the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan has three and a half minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. CONGER. When an amendment was before the committee to increase the regiments without any reference to the action of the House in reducing the Army, I made a suggestion to the House that that proposition would draw from other cavalry regiments a large portion of their quotas and leave them with a very diminished number of men. The amendment that is offered here is a very simple and a very proper one and in accordance with the amendment which was last under consideration. It is that, in portions of the United States where the lives and property of the citizens are alleged to be invaded, where it is alleged that property is taken and life taken by riotous men, in regions of country where troops are as necessary to protect them as they are necessary to protect our citizens on the borders of Texas, notwithstanding this resolution which we propose to pass, troops shall not be taken from those regions where their presence is equally necessary for the protection of the life of the citizen and the protection of his property.

I venture to say there is no man on this floor that dare rise in the presence of the American people to oppose this amendment, and I challenge any man to it; not alone on account of the statements in that communication, of the truth or falsity of which I do not now speak, but from the common knowledge which every one has of the events in the State of South Carolina. From facts universally acknowledged I venture to say that the same spirit which will induce every member of this committee and every member of this Congress to raise his voice and his hand in defense and protection of the citizens of the country would palsy the hand that would be raised to oppose the extension of that protection to one portion of the United States where the same necessity for protection exists.

Sir, I believe that the cutting down of the Army was the result of a determination on the part of some men somewhere to prevent troops being sent into States where lawless men take the lives of peaceable citizens. I just charge that as the attempt inaugurated in this House and carried out, I regret to say, with the assent of men who never ought to have given it their assent.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I would ask the gentleman if he has any member in his eye or in his mind whom he pictures as that man?

Mr. CONGER. I charge that the natural and inevitable result of that reduction must be to leave the Army so small that with the Indian war upon our hands and the necessity of protecting the Texas border there would be no forces to be sent into other portions of our country where the presence of an Army is eminently desirable and necessary.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I understand that this town of Hamburgh is immediately opposite Augusta, in the State of Georgia, across the river. The town of Hamburgh is mostly made up of a colored population. It has a colored magistrate or intendant. It has moreover a colored militia company. This trouble occurred in the first place, as I understand authentically, by the killing of a white man. That was the beginning of it. Afterward the negroes intrenched themselves in a house and they were driven out from it. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARTRIDGE] has a letter, which he will read here, and which will explain the whole matter. It is from a gentleman who has been inculpated on the other side. I do not take the statement which has been read as absolute verity. It has no name attached to it. It is indorsed indeed by the member from South Carolina opposite as being authentic, but who indorses the gentleman? [Cries of "O! ah!" from the republican side of the House.]

Mr. RAINEY. A large constituency do.

Mr. SMALLS. A majority of 13,000.

Mr. COX. Thirteen thousand people may indorse the gentleman, yet he comes here with all the prejudice belonging to his race, and he will admit that much himself.

Mr. SMALLS. No, sir; I will not admit it.

Mr. COX. Now wait until I get through. These gentlemen from South Carolina have had read a statement which is anonymous, and they ask legislation based upon it. And then the gentleman from Michigan rises here and challenges every member in this House to vote against that proposition if he dare, because of the condition of the Army. Sir, it becomes us not only to inquire into the basis of the letter which has been read here, but into the basis of the statement of the gentleman who indorsed it. Now I do not impugn the gentleman's veracity at all when I say that he may speak from hearsay, and that, not having been on the ground himself, he may have had partial accounts of the subject. Does he understand me? And, if so, why this unnecessary clap-trap on the other side of the House?

Now the gentleman from Michigan has another motive. This letter was intended to be shaken into the face of the House for political and bad party purposes, for the gentleman knows that in the distribution of the Army there is strength enough in the South to protect every one to whom protection in the South is due.

Mr. HILL. The Hamburgh riot was got up for that express purpose.

Mr. COX. I have no doubt of it. The State of Georgia is not touched by this matter, but is entirely innocent in regard to it.

Mr. RANEY rose.

Mr. COX. The gentleman must wait until I get through. The State of South Carolina is to-day a republican State and the worst governed State in the Union; it is bad all around; bad at its borders; bad in its heart; bad on the sea-coast; bad in Edgefield County; everywhere rotten to the core, as your own party papers have said. Give South Carolina a democratic government and fair play as has been the case in Tennessee, Virginia, and other States which have been rescued from maladministration, and you will see that every man, black and white, will be cared for under the law.

Mr GARFIELD, (in his seat). As they were at Hamburgh.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman rise and repeat his remark? I could not hear it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will do so presently.

Mr. COX. It does not belong to the United States to look after every petty disturbance in a State and to put the military there. It is a new idea that you have to touch with a Federal bayonet every sore place in the country. How is the Army distributed? The 26,979 men are distributed as follows: 4,216 at West Point and in the Ordnance Corps and non-commissioned staff; 7,930 in the Territories; 3,778 in Texas; 3,334 in other Southern States; 2,913 against operating the Sioux under Generals Terry and Crook, and about 4,500 in the northern cities and forts.

This Texas border bill does not detract from the force of the Army South, North, East, or West to any considerable extent. This matter is brought up to divert us from the question of protecting the Texan frontier, as we should do by pertinent legislation; to get up a cry throughout the land for this fall's elections and for sinister purposes; to stimulate malignancy and shake the bloody shirt in the face of the people. This is the only object. The people will understand it. Anonymous letters read here, apparently from the South, will not affect them. The device is thin. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARTRIDGE] has an authentic letter which explains this matter. He will give it to the House, and I now yield to him for the purpose of having it read.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I renew it. The object of the introduction of this amendment is self-evident. The partisan purpose which it is intended to subserve is easily recognized by every intelligent mind. I should not rise to oppose it were it not for the fact that it does gross injustice to an honorable and gallant gentleman, and endeavors to cast an imputation upon a portion of the people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent.

The people of Augusta, Georgia, have no immediate Representative upon this floor. The hand of Providence pressing heavily upon their gifted Representative prevents him from raising his voice, as he would do if here, in defense of the honor of his constituents. But there is no Georgian upon this floor who will not feel it his duty, his pride, and his pleasure to enter his protest against any imputation such as that conveyed by this amendment against a community distinguished for its intelligence, for its integrity, for its virtue, and for its obedience to the laws and the Constitution.

This anonymous communication so far as we know its nature, anonymous so far as this House is concerned, anonymous so far as this country is concerned, is read here to give to this House a partisan view of the unfortunate occurrence at Hamburgh, South Carolina. No one regrets that occurrence more than I do, none regrets it more than the people of my State do. Even now all the papers of Georgia, democratic as they are, are calling out for an investigation of this matter, and they stand ready, if there be any fault, if there be any crime, to stamp it with their condemnation and to aid in its punishment. An investigation is going on conducted by the Governor of South Carolina, through his official agents, his attorney-general, his adjutant-general, and his coroners holding inquests over the bodies of those unfortunate dead. It would have been well to have waited until that inquest had given to the world the result of its determination before casting this fire-brand into this assembly.

But I do not propose to address this House longer upon this subject. I arose simply to give my reasons for asking that the letter be read which I send to the Clerk's desk. It comes from General Butler himself; it is signed by him; there is no hiding of his signature. He desires that the world shall know what part he took in this matter.

Mr. CONGER. Is he the same General Butler that is charged in the other letter with being engaged in this affair?

Mr. HARTRIDGE. He is the same General Butler.

Mr. DOUGLAS. And a gentleman, as I know.

Mr. CONGER. He may be a gentleman, but I ask is he the person charged in the other letter?

Mr. HARTRIDGE. He is the same General Butler who is slandered by that communication.

Mr. COOK. And he is the peer of any man on this floor.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I ask that the letter that I send to the Clerk's desk be read as a portion of my remarks.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HARTRIDGE. Let the letter be first read.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Is this General Butler an officer of the militia of South Carolina?

Mr. HARTRIDGE. Let the letter be read.

The Clerk read the following from the Augusta Constitutionalist, published in Augusta, Georgia, July 13, 1876:

The following is General M. C. Butler's account of the Hamburgh militia riot of Saturday night. The general begins by saying that—

Certain newspapers, editors, and reporters have done me so much injustice by false reports in reference to the recent disturbance in Hamburgh, that it is due to myself to make to the public a statement of my connection with it. On Friday evening, July 7, Colonel Charles Shaw, with his brother, Rev. William Shaw, was at Edgefield C. H., to see Mr. H. W. Addison and Mr. A. J. Forris and myself on business. After transacting it, Colonel Shaw said to me that Mr. Robert J. Butler, who lives near Hamburgh, in Aiken County, desired me to be at Hamburgh on the following evening (Saturday) at four o'clock to represent professionally his son, Thomas Butler, and son-in-law, Henry Gelson, in a trial to be held before Trial-Justice Prince Rivers.

Mr. Butler has been a lucrative client of mine for many years. I inquired of Colonel Shaw if he knew the nature of the case to be tried, and he said he knew nothing except what he had heard; that these two young men had had an altercation with a company of negro militia in the streets of Hamburgh on the 4th of July, and that Mr. Robert Butler had complained to Rivers, the major-general of militia and trial-justice, and he supposed the trial referred to that matter. I accordingly left Edgefield at nine o'clock the next morning in a buggy. When I had gone about seven miles on the old stage-road I met Dr. John Wise, who inquired if I had heard the news from Hamburgh. I replied that I had heard nothing special, but was on my way to Hamburgh to attend a trial before Rivers. He said the information had reached his neighborhood that the negro militia had threatened to lynch Thomas Butler and Henry Gelson if they were not convicted, and that several young men had gone in that direction.

When nearing the town, I sent word to Mr. Robert Butler to meet me in Hamburgh and give me the facts of the case in which he wished me to appear. Mr. Butler did meet me in a short time, and I there, for the first time, ascertained the character of the trouble. I had nothing whatever to do with the matter up to that time. Knew nothing but what I have stated. My business there was simply professional. I had nothing about me but one law-book, and had no idea of there being a collision than an utter stranger. I learned after reaching Hamburgh that Mr. Henry Sparnick, of Aiken, was in town, as the attorney of the colored militia, and sent for him with a view of arranging for the trial or effecting some arrangement between the parties. Mr. Sparnick met me, and I think will do me the justice to say that my earnest effort was to prevent any further trouble, if possible, and he appeared equally anxious.

Mr. Robert Butler then interposed and said to Mr. Sparnick that if these men would make acknowledgments for their abuse and maltreatment of his son and son-in-law he would be satisfied. I said nothing about any apology myself. It was then proposed that we hold a conference with the officers of the militia company and Prince Rivers and see if we could not adjust matters. I made this proposition to Mr. Sparnick and he assented, saying he had influence with the negroes and he thought we could arrange it. He went off, as I supposed, to bring his clients, and did not return. Sam Spencer, a negro man, came to Mr. Damm's store, where I was with Mr. Robert Butler, his son, and son-in-law, and said that he desired to see me privately.

I at once went into Mr. Damm's back room. He said he was sorry to see so much excitement, and I expressed regrets at it. When he said that he thought inasmuch as Trial-Justice Rivers was to hear the case he would prefer not to be in the conference. I agreed with the propriety of that position, and he then said that the officers of Doc Adams's militia company would meet me, but did not like to come to me at Damm's store, as there were armed men there, but would meet me at his (Spencer's) office if agreeable to me. I said certainly; I would meet them at his office, and alone, if they preferred. He then went off, and did not return. The time appointed for the trial having arrived, I proceeded with my clients to the trial justice's office. Rivers was not in, and after a time his clerk went for him, and he opened his court. I inquired, as a preliminary question, whether he was sitting as a civil or a military officer. He replied that that depended upon the facts as they would be developed; that he was then acting as a peace officer. I remarked that I was indifferent as to the character of the court, as we only desired to arrive at the facts, and inquired if the accused parties would be present. He said that he did not know, but would have them called, which his constable proceeded to do from the door.

About this time Sam Spencer came in and said to me that he thought if the trial could be suspended the matter could be settled. I replied that he must see the trial justice, and if he would suspend I had no objections; whereupon Rivers announced the case suspended for ten minutes, and I was invited by the intendant of the town, a negro man named Gardner, to the council chamber for the purpose of meeting the militia officers of Adams's company. I repaired at once to that place, and remained there about a quarter of an hour, nobody appearing but Gardner, with whom I had some talk as to the necessity of something being speedily done, and that I thought the best solution of the matter was that these people should deliver up their arms as a means of settling the present difficulty, and a guarantee against a future recurrence. He said he knew nothing about it, and waiting, as I thought, long enough, I got in my buggy and went over to Augusta on business, having no relation to the Hamburgh matter; and while there was questioned by a number of people as to the status of affairs in Hamburgh, to whom I replied that I thought a collision between the whites and blacks imminent and likely to take place.

After dispatching my business, I was returning through Hamburgh on my way to spend the night at Mr. Robert Butler's, two miles in the country, and leave for home next morning. When about half way across the bridge I met a delegation of four negroes, Pixley, Edwards, Spencer, and Sims, who stopped me and said that if I would go to Spencer's office the officers of the militia would meet me and endeavor to stop the impending trouble. I agreed; went directly to the appointed place and waited there some twenty or thirty minutes, but one of the officers, Cartledge, appearing. He said he would do all in his power to induce the militia to disband and give up their guns, and I believe he did. While I was in Augusta a body of men rode into the town of Hamburgh mounted. I went around the street to look for Butler, and had not been gone long before I received a message from Prince Rivers, asking me to meet him. I declined to do so, saying that we had made about four appointments which were observed by myself only, and that he must come to me. I did, however, go to meet him, and he asked me if the men would give up their arms would I guarantee the safety of the town. I said I had nothing whatever to do with the town and could give no guarantee of any sort, as I had no command or authority; but would say as a citizen that, in my judgment, if they would do that there would not be the slightest trouble; and he said that he thought that right, and would go and advise them to that course.

In about ten minutes the report was circulated that the negroes refused to give up their arms and intended to fight, and a few minutes thereafter the fight did ensue. The negroes were fortified in their drill-room in a brick building known as Sibley's corner, and they raised a yell and fired from the windows, which was responded to by the whites and a general firing took place. Not a very great while after the firing began Mr. McKie Merriwether, a most estimable young man, was shot through the head and killed.

Not a negro had then been touched, and Merriwether's death naturally infuriated the already excited crowd, and they were under the leadership of no one. During the firing some parties unknown to me brought over a piece of artillery, and fired four or five times at the building and returned. The firing of the negroes from their position then ceased. I left the crowd arresting the negroes. How many were killed I do not know.

This collision was the culmination of the system of insulting and outraging of white people which the negroes had adopted there for several years. Many things were done on this terrible night which of course cannot be justified, but the negroes sowed the wind and reaped the whirlwind.

I did not attempt to accomplish by force what I could accomplish by peaceful means. I was not the leader of this body of infuriated men. I was there in the line of my profession. The collision was a sort of spontaneous combustion. I thought I saw it approaching, and did all that any human being could to prevent it.

I have no objection to being saddled with whatever responsibility fairly attaches to my conduct; but I have no idea of permitting newspaper reporters, for the sake of a sensation or any other purpose, presenting me as the leader of a mob, when I was no more the leader and no more responsible than any other person who might have been there in the line of his duty.

M. C. BUTLER.

During the reading of the letter,

The CHAIRMAN said: The five minutes of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARTRIDGE] has expired.

Mr. GARFIELD, Mr. KASSON, and others: Let the whole letter be read.

There was no objection; and the Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the letter.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I desire to say a word or two on this subject. I am very glad that letter has been read, for I know the man who wrote it and have known him from infancy.

In regard to this trouble at Hamburgh it is to be greatly deplored, and no one in this country deplores it more than I do. I have a love for the State of South Carolina. I was reared upon her soil, and I venerate her ancient name and fame. Even now, when I believe she is under one of the most despicable governments the sun ever shone upon, I have a sympathy for every human being that inhabits that land. I am a friend of the colored man, and whenever the colored race in South Carolina desire anything for their civilization or elevation, I will be one of the first men to come to their rescue in a proper sense and spirit.

I have no doubt the exact truth of the unfortunate occurrence at Hamburgh has been told in that letter. I vouch for every word of it. I read yesterday in the public journals the letter which was sent up here, and very imprudently asked to be read to the House by the member from South Carolina, [Mr. SMALLS.] I believe it to be a slander and a lie. Does he know it to be true? He does not. In my judgment it is a mere fabrication for political effect.

But, sir, as far as M. C. Butler is concerned, to call him a Ku-Klux would be an insult to the most honorable blood in America. I have known his family all my life. They have been in every war of this country from the Revolution down. They have been distinguished soldiers, heroes, and statesmen, as he is one to-day. He was a gallant and brilliant officer in the confederate army from the firing of the first gun of the war to the last; and when the war ended he surrendered like a soldier and a hero, and he has behaved himself as a soldier and a hero ever since. He was one of six or seven brothers who went to the front, and I believe but three survived the conflict. In addition to the noble Butler blood which runs through his veins, he inherits through his venerated mother, whom I well knew, the blood of the gallant Commodore Perry of Lake Erie fame. He has been eminently conservative and loyal ever since he surrendered his sword.

Why, sir, the conservative party in South Carolina five years ago sent here to have his disabilities removed. They were removed at my instance; and they ran him for lieutenant-governor upon the conservative ticket with R. B. Carpenter, who went from Kentucky into South Carolina, and who was always a most loyal Union man.

Mr. BUCKNER rose.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I will not allow myself to be interrupted. Sir, if there be a man in the Union whom we can recognize as the proud chevalier—sans peur et sans reproche—it is M. C. Butler, of South Carolina.

I repeat that I have known him from boyhood. I knew his father and all his great uncles—all distinguished and honorable men. What is stated in that letter is literally true. I would vouch for M. C. Butler the world over.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, no member on this floor can deprecate more heartily than myself the opening of this discussion. I had anticipated that when this Congress met its action would be such as to exercise a salutary effect upon the entire democratic party of the country; that it would close its deliberations without agitating these questions affecting the lives and liberties of American citizens. But it appears to me that so long as the negro has a vote in this country, so long as he has a voice in this Government, it is necessary that he should on every proper occasion appeal to the country in behalf of those rights.

Sir, I regret as much as any man here that outbreak at Hamburgh. I regret that the proceeding was measurably countenanced by a cavalier who has descended from noble stock—the very best that peopled the soil of Carolina. When I make this assertion I am not influenced by any partisan prejudice; I do not speak from hearsay or mere conjecture. I am sustained in what I say by the democratic papers of South Carolina. I have in my hands the News and Courier, the leading democratic paper of the State, which contains an article from the Augusta Chronicle and Sentinel, stating the very fact that General Butler went from Hamburgh across the bridge into Augusta, saw young men over there, and said to them: "Things over in Hamburgh look squally; young men, we may want you over there this evening; get yourselves in readiness." The editor of this democratic paper, published in the city of Augusta, says that General Butler made use of that expression, and that those young men, fully armed and to the number of two or three hundred, went over there.

And, sir, what are we to say of brave white men who fought in the confederate army coming out in armed force to capture and subjugate forty defenseless negroes collected in a building where they could not defend themselves? These men said that they were willing to surrender the few arms they had, but not until General Butler or some one else high in authority should give them assurance that their property, their liberty, and their lives would be secure. Did they exact from General Butler any more than is accorded to them by the Constitution? I ask whether they had not as much right to bear arms as General Butler or anybody else? Had they menaced or threatened any one while engaged in that parade on the Fourth of July? No, sir; the whole trouble arose because a few men, inflamed with whisky and with a determination to subdue the negro in the South, told them with threats that they must stand from across the road so that these men might be enabled to drive by unmolested.

Why, sir, just think of it! What would be thought if here in Washington City, when a military company was parading on the Fourth of July, two men should come up in a buggy and demand of the officers that the company should get out of the way, and if they did not, should at once set to work and murder the men of that military company? I ask you, citizens of the United States, would you stand it? I ask you, brave men who fought for your country's liberties long before you took part in the war of the rebellion, would you stand it? I ask you, proud southern men who boast of your gallantry and your intelligence and your superiority to my race, would you stand it? I ask you, men of the North who sacrificed your blood and treasure, who sacrificed the lives of your sons and your relatives, would you stand it? Do you, then, expect negroes to stand all this? Do you expect my race to submit meekly to continual persecution and massacre by these people in the South? Are you not going to allow us any right of self-defense? In the name of my race and my people, in the name of humanity, in the name of God, I ask you whether we are to be American citizens with all the rights and immunities of citizens or whether we are to be vassals and slaves again? I ask you to tell us whether these things are to go on, so that we may understand now and henceforth what we are to expect?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. One word more. I ask to have published as part of my remarks an editorial from the Charleston News and Courier and some other extracts which I have not had time to read.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let them be printed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman has consent to print them.

Mr. GARFIELD. What is the date of the editorial of the News and Courier?

Mr. RAINEY. July 10, 1876.

The papers ordered to be printed are as follows:

THE BLOODY WORK AT HAMBURGH.

Assuming that the accounts of the Hamburgh fight given by the Augusta newspapers are in the main correct, we find little, if any, excuse for the conflict itself and absolutely none for the cowardly killing of the seven negro prisoners who were shot down like rabbits long after they had surrendered.

The insolence of the negro militiamen out of which the trouble came could easily have been punished without a resort to arms. General Butler, who appears to have been in command of the whites, admitted that an apology by the militiamen would satisfy his clients. The affront to Mr. Butler, therefore, was not the immediate cause of the fight that followed. This was brought on by the demand that the militiamen surrender their arms into the keeping of the whites. The presence of armed bodies of negroes is a menace to any community; but we do not understand that the danger was such as to justify the whites in demanding the surrender of the arms or in laying siege to the house in which the negroes took refuge and killing the negroes who attempted to escape. The killing of seven of the prisoners was barbarous in the extreme. We have no words strong enough to express our condemnation of such a crime. They who do such deeds sow the wind. We pray that they and those who are innocent of the wrong may not reap the whirlwind.

It pains us to be forced to speak in this strain of any act done in South Carolina by white men; but the higher intelligence and culture of the whites impose on them the duty of self-reverence and self-control. When they give way to passion and revenge, when they kill unarmed prisoners, they do what, as soldiers, they would not have dreamed of doing; they wrong themselves, their State, and increase a hundred-fold the difficulties and dangers of our political and social future.

What followed is given in the words of the Augusta Chronicle and Sentinel of to-day:

THIS THING HAD GONE ON LONG ENOUGH.

After waiting some time, General Butler told Rivers that he must proceed. The constable then went to the door and called Adams, who, however, failed to answer. It was then ascertained that Adams, with his company, was up the street in a defiant attitude. General Butler thereupon informed Rivers that this sort of thing had gone on long enough and it was about time that it was put a stop to. The negroes must give up their arms at once, and he would give the names of twenty of the best citizens in Edgefield as security that they would be turned over to Governor Chamberlain. Rivers then asked if General Butler, in case the arms were given up, would see that the town was protected during the night. General Butler answered in the affirmative. Rivers assured him that he would go immediately to Adams and persuade him to give up the arms. He accordingly went to that worthy and talked with him for some time. Upon his return he told General Butler that the mayor, Gardner, and the officers of the company would confer with him at the council chamber. General Butler accordingly went thither and had a conference with the negro leaders. He told them that the arms must be given up; there was no necessity for them in that place, and they had no business with them. As for the Adams case, Mr. Butler would be satisfied if Adams would make an apology.

THEY INTENDED TO FIGHT.

This conference accomplished nothing. The negroes still hesitated about giving up the arms. In the mean time, however, a number of white citizens had assembled in the town and matters began to look squally. General Butler rode over to Augusta and told several young men that he might need their services in Hamburgh during the afternoon. He then returned to the town. Just after crossing the bridge he was met by Prince Rivers, who said he would make one more effort to induce the negroes to give up their guns, and if they would not yield they must take the consequences. Accordingly he conferred with the officers of the company, and shortly returned to General Butler with the announcement that the negroes said they would not give up their guns; they intended to fight. In the mean time the news of the trouble had spread in Augusta and caused much excitement. A large number of young men hastily procured arms and ammunition and hastened to the scene. Many others waited at the foot of the bridge anxiously awaiting the result. By seven o'clock there was a large crowd at that point.

OPENING FIRE.

Upon learning the result of Rivers's efforts, General Butler determined to accomplish by force that which could not be done by peaceable demands. The negroes had intrenched themselves in a large brick structure, known as Sibley's building, on a corner, and defied the whites. The latter surrounded the house, and at half past seven o'clock opened fire upon it. This was returned by the negroes, and a constant fusilade was kept up for over two hours.

THE FIRST MAN KILLED.

About eight o'clock a young man named T. McKie Merriwether, who was standing near the front of the Charlotte, Columbia and Augusta Railroad bridge, was struck in the head by a minie-ball fired from one of the windows of the Sibley building, and almost instantly killed. His body was placed on a litter and brought to the city by a number of young men. Mr. Joseph Merriwether, father of the unfortunate young man, also accompanied the body to the city.

The deceased was in the twenty-third year of his age. His father lives in Edgefield County, about fifteen miles from Augusta. The Constitutionalist to-day gives the subjoined account of the way in which Merriwether was killed:

"Two young men were firing from behind an abutment of the Charlotte, Columbia and Augusta Railroad bridge when two negroes slipped through the tall weeds on the edge of the river, and coming up unperceived in the rear of them shot and killed a Mr. Merriwether, son of Dr. Merriwether, of Edgefield, the ball striking him behind the ear, killing him instantly. The young man who was with Merriwether turned and fired at the negroes, killing one dead. The other threw down his gun and made an effort to escape, but was pursued and captured by the young man and brought in as a prisoner."

But an eye witness informs the Chronicle and Sentinel that he happened to be looking at Merriwether when he was killed. Two shots were fired almost simultaneously from one of the windows, and it was probably one of these which struck the unfortunate young man, as he instantly fell.

SENDING FOR ARTILLERY.

Soon after the death of Merriwether several men were sent over to Augusta for a piece of artillery. This was procured and carried to Hamburgh as soon as possible. The piece was stationed on the river bank, a short distance from the house where the negroes had taken up their position, and a fire opened with canister. Four rounds were fired. Little damage was done the building, but the fire had the effect of completely silencing the negroes. During the evening eight negroes were captured, two of them members of the company.

THREE NEGROES KILLED.

About half past eight or nine o'clock a party of five escaped from the building and ran across an open field. They were fired upon by the white men, and two of them returned the fire, but without effect. About ten o'clock a negro jumped over the fence in rear of the house and attempted to escape, but he was instantly fired upon and fell dead, riddled by bullets. It was then ascertained that he was Jim Cook, the marshal of the town, who had been one of the chief promoters of the difficulty. His head was almost shot to pieces. Soon after this another negro, named John Thomas, first lieutenant of the company, was caught while attempting to escape. After he was arrested he was shot in the back by some unknown party and seriously, perhaps mortally, wounded. This action was condemned in the severest terms by every one, and especially by General Butler.

TWENTY-NINE PRISONERS.

About twelve o'clock general search was made throughout the town and resulted in the finding of fifteen more negroes, making twenty-nine in all. A negro who attempted to escape was shot in several places and badly wounded. The negro lieutenant, John Thomas, who, as stated above, was shot in the back, was expected to die from the wound. A young man named Morgan was accidentally shot in the leg by one of his comrades while pursuing a fleeing negro. He was firing at the negro, together with others, at the time. His wound, while painful, is not considered dangerous. The negroes who were last captured were discovered hid away in cellars and under floors.

KILLING THE PRISONERS.

Early this morning seven of the prisoners were taken out and killed. The Chronical and Sentinel says that about two o'clock, or a little before, the roll was called of the prisoners, and those who were considered ringleaders of the disturbing element in this county were carried to a corn-field near the river and turned loose. As they ran they were fired upon and killed. One of the men shot was named Attaway, a county commissioner and a member of the Legislature. The prisoners died almost without a groan. The remainder were then turned loose. Before the shooting took place a detail of twenty-five men was made and ordered to take the prisoners to Aiken to jail. On the way it was determined to kill the ringleaders, and the shooting was done as described. Some gentlemen from Augusta interfered and saved the lives of three by persuading the guards to let them bring the negroes to this city. They were taken to the city-hall and discharged. The man who was shot after being captured, John Thomas, was also brought to the city-hall. He cannot possibly recover. The list now foots up ten negroes killed, one white man killed, another severely wounded. The wounded man is in the hospital. As the remainder of the prisoners were turned loose they were fired into, but it is not known whether any of them were killed or not.

THE FORCE OF WHITE MEN

in Hamburgh during the evening numbered several hundred, a portion of whom were from South Carolina and a portion from Augusta. They were armed with revolvers, shot-guns, and rifles, and were under the leadership of General Butler.

At eight o'clock a force of Augusta city police, armed with police-guns, was marched to the South Carolina end of the city bridge and drawn up in line across the structure in order to protect the latter, as it was understood that threats in regard to it had been made by the negroes. There was no demonstration in that direction, however. During the evening while the firing was going on in Ham-burgh intense excitement prevailed in Augusta and everybody was anxious to learn the latest news from the front. It was a matter of no little danger to attempt to get near the scene while the battle was progressing, as the balls were flying in every direction. Several of the balls fell in Washington street.

TRYING THE TORCH.

When the negroes first fired from the windows of the Sibley building they set up a loud yell. The fire and the yell were both answered at once by the whites. A number of the latter were stationed on the river bank and kept up a rapid fire at the building. Just after the firing began kerosene oil was poured on a small wooden structure next to the Sibley building and the torch applied to it. Information of the fact was conveyed to General Butler, who immediately rode to the spot and ordered the fire extinguished, peremptorily forbidding any such attempt in the future.

THE CALL FOR TROOPS.

It is said that the ammunition in the possession of the negroes was furnished to them by a white man named Schiller, who came over to Augusta and purchased it yesterday morning. It was rumored during the evening that the negroes had telegraphed to Charleston for Federal troops, but the rumor could not be traced to any authentic source. None of the arms held by the negroes were captured, but a quantity of ammunition was found in one of the houses. Prince Rivers fled from Hamburgh and took refuge in this city.

THE STATEMENT OF A PRISONER.

A reporter conversed with one of the negro prisoners named Gilbert Muller, who works in Augusta. He said that he knew nothing about the origin of the difficulty. All he knew was that when he got home from his work that afternoon his captain ordered him to get his gun and "fall in" with the company. He obeyed orders and was with the company in the house while the firing was taking place. He declared, however, he did not fire a single shot. Each member of the company had two rounds of ammunition. They had all gone into the cellar of the building when the cannon commenced firing, and he supposed they were there now. For his part he considered it best to give himself up, and he therefore did so.

SIOUX CIVILIZATION.

Sitting Bull is said to be profoundly gratified with the reports of the Hamburgh riot. It shows that Sioux civilization and Sioux tactics are spreading. Sitting Bull thinks all the prisoners, and not only four, should have been shot; but still he is not exacting. He knows it requires time to educate a community up to the Sioux standard.—New York Herald.

TERRIFIED SUBMISSION.

The Charleston News and Courier reports that since the riot at Hamburgh the condition of the negroes is that of "terrified submission." The recent achievements of that great chief, Sitting Bull, seem to have made an impression upon the confederate Major-General Butler, who commanded "the attacking column," for, according to the same journal, "two of the bodies were mutilated with hatchets or bayonets." As a further bit of information, we are informed that "all the killed had families, with one exception, and the grief and distress of the women and children were violent and heart-rending." We hope our readers will bear in mind that these extracts are not from a speech of Senator Morton, intended to inflame the North, but from the Charleston News and Courier, one of the ablest journals in the South, and leading the campaign in South Carolina for Tilden and Hendricks.—New York Herald.

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for any purpose of entering into a discussion of the facts connected with the unfortunate occurrence alluded to as having taken place in Hamburgh, South Carolina. I think I am warranted in expressing my regret that it should have been brought in during the consideration of the subject-matter now before the committee. Both sides, however, seem to have had an opportunity of presenting their prima facie cases. We are not in a condition now to ascertain really what the facts are, and I trust a moment's reflection will satisfy those who manifest so much feeling with reference to this unfortunate occurrence that there is really no necessity for bringing forward the amendment proposed to the first section of the joint resolution now pending before the committee, as that resolution does not contemplate interference with the troops in South Carolina or elsewhere. The troops there in the main are infantry. This contemplates the raising of two regiments of cavalry for the defense of the Texan border. Hence there can be no ground of apprehension whatever that the forces now employed in South Carolina are in danger of being removed to meet the requirements of this resolution. Furthermore the Army is under the direction of the Commander-in-Chief, in whom I presume all gentlemen have an abiding confidence he would not take from any portion of the country which might seem to require its service such numbers of the Army as would injure the peace, quiet, and security of that section.

These two reasons, either one of which would seem to be satisfactory, would demonstrate there is no necessity for this amendment for the purpose of guarding against any danger that might possibly result to South Carolina or any other State by reason of any requirement contained in this joint resolution. Both together induce me to hope the mover of the amendment will on reflection, after he has brought to the attention of the House and possibly of the people of the United States the facts which he conceived it to be his right and duty to present, withdraw his proposition and enable the House to proceed quietly and in good temper with the consideration of the subject-matter properly before us. We can then go on without any undue heat or excitement and pass upon this measure important to the interests of the whole country, for it is of interest to the whole country that we should preserve our peaceful relations with a neighboring republic. If measures of the character presented by the gentleman from South Carolina be brought forward and insisted upon, they must certainly lead to crimination and recrimination, out of which I have not witnessed so far any substantial result. I sincerely trust the proposition will not be insisted upon. It can result in no good whatever to any party. Now, after both sides have been heard, I hope it will be withdrawn and the committee allowed to proceed with the consideration of the report from the special committee for the protection of the Texas border.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I move the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. SMALLS. I hope not, inasmuch as I was charged by the gentleman from New York——

Mr. SCHLEICHER. It is perfectly evident that we will not get through until late to-night if this debate is allowed to go on, and I insist on my motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest we allow further debate. It will be the quickest way out of it.

Mr. FOSTER. We are going to have it.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. You can have it on the next section.

Mr. GARFIELD. It will then be out of order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. This whole amendment is out of order.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I cannot withdraw my motion.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 87, noes 57.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. MONROE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had according to order had under consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 96) to provide for the protection of the Texas frontier on the lower Rio Grande, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I move the House go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the joint resolution in reference to the Texas border troubles; and pending that motion, I move that all further debate be closed on the first resolution and the pending amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest there are a few gentlemen who wish to speak for a few moments on the pending subject. I think twenty or twenty-five minutes at the outside would satisfy gentlemen.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move the House adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think this side of the House will be satisfied with twenty-five minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] appealed to the gentleman from South Carolina to withdraw his amendment, and made a very excellent speech of five minutes. Now, the gentleman from South Carolina should at least have the privilege of saying whether he will withdraw it or not. If the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] is agreed to he will not have that privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will first put the question on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. STEVENSON,] that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 97, noes 41.

So the motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Pending the announcement of the vote on the motion to adjourn,

Mr. BAKER, of New York, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1807) for the relief of Anthony Lawson, surviving partner of the firm of Lawson & Brewis, of Alexandria, Virginia;

An act (H. R. No. 3486) for the relief of James F. Buckner; and

An act (H. R. No. 3490) for the relief of James W. Love, postmaster at Patriot, Indiana.

Mr. PLAISTED, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 2118) to provide for the construction of military posts on the Yellowstone and Muscleshell Rivers; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 146) to amend the act approved June 18, 1874, relating to the admission of articles intended for the international exhibition of 1876.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was given as follows:

To Mr. HOOKER for four days from and including the 14th; and

To Mr. CABELL for four days.

MILITARY EXPEDITION AGAINST SIOUX INDIANS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the operations of the military expedition against the Sioux Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RELIEF OF THE FAMILY OF GENERAL CUSTER.

Mr. RUSK. I ask unanimous consent, prior to the announcement of the vote on adjournment, to made a correction in the bill passed this morning providing for a pension to the father and mother of General Custer. I move to strike out in the last line of the bill the words "the two last named sons," and insert in lieu thereof the words "their two sons."

There was no objection, and the correction was made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I hope the same courtesy will be allowed to me to introduce a bill for the relief of the heirs of the officers and men who fell in the recent fight with the Indians on the Little Big Horn River under command of Brevet Major-General George A. Custer.

Mr. COX. I call for the regular order.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I ask the gentleman to yield to me that I may offer this bill.

Mr. COX. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House cannot entertain the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACDOUGALL] when the regular order is demanded.

The result of the vote on the motion to adjourn was then announced; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana: Papers relating to the petition of John S. Bishop, for a correction of his war record, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. JOHN REILLY: The petition of First Lieutenant James M. Bell, Seventh United States Cavalry, for pay for loss and damage to property in transit while changing stations from Fort Lincoln, Dakota Territory, to Shreveport, Louisiana, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SPENCER: A paper relating to the extension of post-route 30130, in the State of Louisiana, to Colfax, Grant Parish, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. SPRINGER: Memorial of James S. Nottingham, of New Mexico, for an investigation by the House of the charges against Judge Warren Bristol, of said Territory, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TERRY: A paper relating to the establishment of a post-route from Speer's Ferry, Virginia, to Kyles Ford, Tennessee, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, July 17, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McMILLAN presented the petition of Charles F. Yeager, of Saint Paul, Minnesota late an officer in the engineer department of the volunteer service, United States Navy, and doing duty on board the United States vessel Samson, engaged in the Red River expedition, praying, in behalf of himself and the officers and crew of that vessel, such legislation as may be necessary to authorize the redistribution of the prize-money accruing from the capture of certain cotton by that vessel; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MAXEY. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of Texas, which I ask be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution instructing our Senators and requesting our Representatives in Congress to ask protection for the frontier and compensation for past expenditures by the State in that behalf.

Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Texas, That the Federal Government owes to Texas protection of her exposed frontiers, by virtue of her right as a member of the Union to an equal participation in the benefits and blessings which its Constitution guarantees to all the States, among which is defense against invasion; and the republic of Texas upon her accession to the Union having ceded to the United States all public edifices, fortifications, barracks, ports, and harbors, navy and navy-yards, docks, magazines, arms, armaments, and all other property and means pertaining to the public defense, the faith of the United States thereby became solemnly pledged to extend to the frontiers of the said republic of Texas the most ample protection, without which, as a condition-precedent, Texas would have had no sufficient inducement to surrender her independent political position.

SEC. 2. That our Senators in the Congress of the United States are hereby instructed and our Representatives are hereby requested to present to Congress now assembled these resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Texas, and to urge upon that body the enactment of such laws as will secure to our frontiers ample military protection against Indians and Mexican freebooters, the military forces of the United States on our borders being too weak under the most effective command to afford such protection, and the State of Texas being compelled, in defense of the property and lives of her citizens, to maintain in the field a considerable military force at her own expense.

SEC. 3. That our said Senators be instructed and our Representatives requested to present and urge before Congress the passage of a bill re-imbursing the State of Texas for the large appropriations of money which from time to time have necessarily been made by her Legislature because of the failure of the Federal Government to provide sufficient protection to our frontiers.

SEC. 4. That the governor of the State be requested to transmit to our Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of these resolutions, together with an itemized statement of all expenditures made by the State in the protection of her frontiers.

SEC. 5. The fact that Congress will adjourn at an early day and the necessity for prompt action require that this joint resolution take effect, and it is hereby declared that it do take effect, from and after its passage.

Approved July 6, 1876.

THE STATE OF TEXAS,
Department of State:

I, A. W. De Berry, secretary of state for the State of Texas, do hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original enrolled senate joint resolution No. 169, passed by the fifteenth Legislature of the State of Texas, and now on file in this department.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto signed my name and affixed the seal of State at the city of Austin this the 7th day of July, A. D. 1876.

[SEAL.] A. W. DE BERRY,
Secretary of State.

Mr. MAXEY. In reference to this resolution I beg leave to state that my colleague and myself have anticipated the wishes of the Legislature as indicated by these instructions so far as protection is concerned. The amendment which I had the honor to present to the Army appropriation bill, and which passed the Senate, increasing the number of cavalrymen to one hundred in a company, will accomplish the purpose had in view by the Legislature. I am informed that this amendment is to be retained in the report of the committee of conference upon that bill, and a force of cavalry maintained in Texas according to that amendment will accomplish the object sought. There is no doubt that the amendment referred to will afford an adequate cavalry force on the Mexican and Indian frontiers of Texas for the complete protection of those frontiers. I move that the resolution of the Legislature be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT presented a memorial of certain clergymen of San Francisco, California, remonstrating against any change of the shipping-commissioner law, by which the appointment of commissioners shall be vested in the Secretary of the Treasury; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of Curtis Smith, Robert S. Wood, and others, employés in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, praying for a short leave of absence to visit the exhibition at Philadelphia; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also presented the petition of W. W. Wilkins and others, citizens of Minnesota, on behalf of Louis B. Idell, late of the Eighteenth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, praying that a patent may be issued for certain land pre-empted by him in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Admiral Charles Wilkes, praying for the passage of a law to relieve him from liability for the payment of certain moneys alleged to have been heretofore paid by him to Paymaster Hosford, United States Navy, to report a bill for his relief and recommend its passage. This is a small sum, due, undoubtedly, to an old and faithful public officer; and I think there will be no objection to its immediate passage.

The bill (S. No. 993) for the relief of Admiral Charles Wilkes was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask to have the bill read at length subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let that go over.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think if the Senator will hear a statement of this case he will consent to let the bill pass.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no doubt of that. I only oppose it on the principle that I do not think any claim bill ought to go through on the day it is reported, be it ever so good; that is all. I have no doubt I shall vote for the bill when it is taken up to-morrow. I think it is a wrong principle to act on a bill of this kind at once, for once in awhile we get very badly mistaken. That is my only reason.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objects to the present consideration of the bill, and it will be placed on the Calendar.

SOUTHERN CLAIMS.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to state that I shall ask the Senate, immediately upon the disposition of the present pending order, to proceed to the consideration of the bill known as the southern claims commission bill. I do this out of protection to myself, because of the numberless inquiries and constant importunities which are made with reference to this bill, and also for the purpose of saving some friends who say they do not see how they can live possibly unless the bill is disposed of. I shall therefore ask the Senate, immediately upon the disposition of the pending appropriation bill, if I can get the floor, to proceed to the consideration of this bill.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 994) to amend section 2931 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, so as to allow repayment by the Secretary of the Treasury of the tonnage-tax where it has been exacted in contravention of treaty provisions; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

ESTATE OF AMOS IRELAND.

Mr. MERRIMON. I move that the Senate take up Senate bill No. 781, which is a small bill for the relief of the estate of Amos Ireland. I think when the report is read it will be sufficient to pass the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 781) for the relief of Margaret Ireland, widow of Amos Ireland.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, in line 6, to strike out the words "the amount due, if any, for his services;" in line 7, after the word "to," to strike out the words "his widow, the said Margaret," and insert "the administrator of the estate of Amos;" in line 8, after "Ireland," to insert the word "deceased;" and after the word "deceased" to strike out the words "and a sufficient sum is hereby appropriated for that purpose out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated by law" and insert "the sum of $208.33 for his services from January 1, 1861, until May 31, 1861, upon producing proper evidence of qualification as administrator of his estate; and a sufficient sum is hereby appropriated for that purpose out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated by law;" so as to make the bill read:

That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to adjust and settle the account of Amos Ireland, as captain of the light-vessel at Brandt Island Shoals, North Carolina, and allow the administrator of the estate of Amos Ireland, deceased, the sum of $208.33 for his services from January 1, 1861, until May 31, 1861, upon producing proper evidence of qualification as administrator of his estate; and a sufficient sum is hereby appropriated for that purpose out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated by law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report read.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask the Clerk to read the report.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Claims, June 21:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Margaret Ireland, widow of Amos Ireland, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report as follows:

Your committee find, from the evidence filed in the case, that Amos Ireland was loyal to the United States throughout the war; that he was employed under contract as keeper of the light-vessel stationed at Brandt Island Shoals, in North Carolina, at a salary of $500 per annum, and that he performed service in that capacity from December 31, 1860, up to June 30, 1861, for which he received no pay. Your committee addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, and received through him, from the Light-House Board, the information that Amos Ireland was employed as keeper of the light-vessel at Brandt Island during the year 1860, at a salary of $500 per annum; that the accounts of the superintendent of lights show that he was paid up to and including December 31, 1860; that no accounts were received from the superintendent during the year 1861; and, although the presumption is that some service was rendered, there is no positive evidence of the fact on file in this Office, and that it is not known positively at what time light-house service was discontinued at the said station, as no direct order or instructions were issued from the Light-House Office with reference thereto. Your committee find the reply of the Secretary confirmatory of the facts set forth in the evidence, as far as the records show anything in relation to the case and are satisfied that the claim is a just one. In view of the fact that service was discontinued on all mail-routes on May 31, 1861, at which time all authority of the United States was suspended in North Carolina, your committee recommend payment only from December 31, 1860, until May 31, 1861, at the rate of $500 per annum, payable to the administrator of the estate of Amos Ireland, deceased, upon furnishing satisfactory proof of qualification as administrator, and recommend the passage of the bill as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina, who is undoubtedly familiar with it, at what time the authorities of the State of North Carolina, or the rebel authorities, assumed control of the coast upon which this light-house stands?

Mr. MERRIMON. I am unable at this moment to inform the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, cannot the Senator tell us somewhere near what time did the State of North Carolina secede, as it is called?

Mr. MERRIMON. The truth is I am not at all familiar with this claim. I go by the report of the committee. I know this to be true, that a great many of the people who remained along the banks, as they are called, that is, the coast of North Carolina, adhered to the Union long after the war began and many of them during the whole war. I take it this person was a loyal person. He was in the service of the Government, and, it seems to me, the committee have limited his claim very much.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not any right to doubt at all, and I do not, that this person was a loyal person, because the committee find he was. I take that to be a fact; but the committee propose to pay him, if I rightly heard the reading of the bill, down to the 31st day of May, 1861. I have a general impression that the confederate authority, whatever that may have been called, either rightfully or wrongfully, was in sway there for two months before that time; and, if so, this poor fellow, loyal as he may have been——

Mr. MERRIMON. I will remind the Senator—he may remember the fact; it is historical—that North Carolina did not secede until the 20th of May, 1861.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is just what I was trying to get at.

Mr. MERRIMON. That is the fact.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the very question I asked the Senator a moment ago, and he said he could not tell.

Mr. MERRIMON. And the State, after the ordinance of secession, did not get control of the light-houses and other public works along the coast until after that time, not until May 31, 1861. I am very sure the State did not, though I would not state positively. I think it did not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; that being the state of the case, this claim is perfectly correct undoubtedly. I tried to get exactly that information from my friend.

Mr. RANSOM. There is no doubt, if the facts were known, that this man served the Government up to the 31st of May.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That appearing, Mr. President, I have no objection at all to the claim.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of the estate of Amos Ireland, deceased."

CHARLES F. CHANDLER.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 722) for the relief of Charles F. Chandler.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It declares that the letters-patent of the United States dated January 21, 1873, No. 135014, granted to Augustus H. Seyerth, shall be good and valid in law for the full term for which the letters-patent were granted by the Commissioner of Patents, in the same manner and with the same effect, and no other, as if letters-patent for the invention described in the letters-patent of the United States had not been granted and expired, or may not expire, in foreign countries, during the period for which letters-patent may have been granted in foreign countries.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there a report in the case?

Mr. WADLEIGH. There is a report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. WADLEIGH, from the Committee on Patents, June 21:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the petition of Charles F. Chandler, submit the following report:

The petition prays for the declaring valid for the full term for which the same were granted—that is, seventeen years from January 21, 1873—of United States letters-patent issued to Dr. Augustus Seyferth, and which letters-patent, having become forfeited in England, might, under the laws of 1870 (Revised Statutes, section 4887) be construed to have expired in this country.

We find that Chandler purchased his interest in the said letters-patent in 1869. He immediately proceeded to apply through an attorney to obtain letters-patent for the same. The grant was delayed in consequence of circumstances wholly beyond his control, and by two interferences which were decided in his favor. But for these circumstances he would have obtained his patent for the full term of seventeen years under the act of 1861.

We also find that the letters-patent for this same invention which have been forfeited in England were not so forfeited by any neglect or carelessness on the part of either Seyferth or Chandler.

We find that any doubt or uncertainty as to the validity of this patent, and as to whether it is in force or not, should be removed.

We find also that no laches or negligence can be charged against either Chandler or Seyferth, and that Seyferth is entitled to his American patent for the full term for which it was granted, and we recommend the passage of bill S. No. 722, for the relief of Charles F. Chandler.

Mr. CONKLING. For what is the patent, I inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. WADLEIGH. For a process for refining sugar.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire what the process is in general? I do not want the particulars; but enough to enable us to know. It seems to be a very important matter.

Mr. WADLEIGH. It is a chemical process for refining sugar; and parties in England who held an assignment there did not consider it worth enough to make the payments necessary to keep their patent alive in England, and on that account the patent was forfeited here under the law of 1870, passed after the applicant had made application to the Patent Office for his patent. It is a very just case, Mr. President.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the bill reserve the right of people who have used the invention before this patent becomes valid, it being now invalid?

Mr. WADLEIGH. The patent was granted for fourteen years, and this bill merely gives him the same right that he has under the patent as granted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the object of the bill, then?

Mr. WADLEIGH. The patent in England was assigned to certain parties there, and it was assigned in the United States to this Chandler. He made application to the Patent Office of the United States for a patent in 1869. In 1870 the Congress of the United States passed a law which, as construed, invalidates patents here, provided they are invalidated from lapse in foreign countries. The parties who held the assignment in England, probably from not deeming the patent to be very valuable there, forfeited the patent there by not making certain periodical payments required by the law of England; and our law of 1870, passed after the application was made to the Patent Office and while it was pending there when the patent lapsed in England, deprived the assignee here of any rights under the patent. His patent lapsed on account of the neglect of parties in England.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In accordance with the general law?

Mr. WADLEIGH. In accordance with the general law passed after he made his application here. He made his application in 1869, and it was pending in the Patent Office until after the passage of the law of 1870. These parties in England did not make the payments there which they should have made; and the patent lapsed, so that, though the patent granted for fourteen years, he has held it but two months.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 332) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1867, and for other purposes," approved June 22, 1874.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 3896) granting a pension to Maria Custer and Emanuel H. Custer.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1807) for the relief of Anthony Lawson, surviving partner of the firm of Lawson & Brewis, of Alexandria, Virginia;

A bill (H. R. No. 2118) to provide for the construction of military posts on the Yellowstone and Muscleshell Rivers;

A bill (H. R. No. 3486) for the relief of James F. Buckner;

A bill (H. R. No. 3490) for the relief of James W. Love, postmaster at Patriot, Indiana;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) for the issue of silver coin; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 146) to amend the act approved June 18, 1874, relating to the admission of articles intended for the international exhibition of 1876.

CHARLES C. CAMPBELL.

Mr. CAPERTON. I move to take up House bill No. 429.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 429) for the relief of Charles C. Campbell, of Washington County, Virginia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Charles C. Campbell, of Washington County, Virginia, of $6,000, for property taken and used as supplies by the armies of the United States, under Generals Stoneman and Burbridge, in the year 1864, while upon their marches in the States of Virginia and Tennessee, which sum is to be in full satisfaction of all claims of Campbell against the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

Mr. WRIGHT. I can state in a moment what there is in this bill. As to the taking of this property there is no question. It is abundantly established. As to the loyalty of Mr. Campbell, there is no one who raises any question. He is a man of unexceptional character, of the very highest integrity, and of the most thorough devotion to the Union. He had this claim, handed it over to an agent of the southern claims commission, and supposed he had presented it until it was too late, and then finding it was too late he comes to Congress.

Mr. WITHERS. Before the report is read, I will state that this man is from the southwestern part of the State. There is no question that the character given of him by the Senator from Iowa is perfectly correct. He had the reputation during the war, I know, of being a Union man all the time. He was engaged in manufacturing salt for the people around there. His original claim for property destroyed amounted to nearly $20,000; but the Committee on Claims cut it down to this small amount.

Mr. WRIGHT. What he would be entitled to under other circumstances would be much more than the committee agreed to give him.

Mr. CONKLING. For whom was he manufacturing salt?

Mr. WRIGHT. In Virginia, I believe it was.

Mr. CONKLING. But for whom; for what market?

Mr. WRIGHT. He had salt-works there for a number of years before.

Mr. CONKLING. For what market did he manufacture during the war?

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not understand that he was manufacturing for any market at that time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Virginia says he was. I should like to hear the Senator from Virginia state again what this gentleman was engaged in during the war and where.

Mr. WITHERS. He was engaged in his ordinary occupation. He was engaged at this time in manufacturing salt at the salt-works under a contract with some of the people in East Tennessee at and around Bristol. He was residing at that time at Bristol, on the borders of Virginia and Tennessee; his loyal character is unassailable.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How extensive was his salt manufactory?

Mr. WITHERS. That I cannot tell you; but he must have had a good deal of material and horses and one thing and another connected with it for hauling wood and so forth from the fact that he claims to have lost about $20,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it the salt-works that this allowance is made for?

Mr. CAPERTON. No, supplies.

Mr. WITHERS. It is for supplies, provisions, corn, &c., taken from him by the Army. General Burbridge certifies to the claim.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report read in full. There is a little too much salt in it, I am afraid.

The Secretary read the following report submitted by Mr. CAPERTON from the Committee of Claims on the 1st instant:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Charles C. Campbell, of Virginia, praying compensation for certain property taken by United States forces during the war, together with the House bill No. 429, have had the same under consideration, and report as follows:

Petitioner represents that during the late war he resided in Washington County, Virginia, and was the owner of a large property, consisting of salt-furnaces, salt-store goods, salt-sacks, horses, mules, wagons, harness, and cotton yarn, to each of which items he attaches a value amounting in the aggregate to $19,210; that the salt-furnaces and salt were taken and destroyed by the Union armies under the commands of Generals Burbridge and Stoneman, and the other articles, amounting in the aggregate to $8,500, were taken and used as supplies by the armies aforesaid. He therefore prays compensation.

In addition to his own affidavits, the petitioner filed with his petition the depositions of eight witnesses, establishing beyond question his loyalty to the Union, his ownership, and the value of the personal property, and the fact that it was taken under orders and used by the Federal forces.

In the course of the investigation before the House committee the petitioner seems to have surrendered his claim for compensation to a portion embraced in the list set forth in his petition, and to have confined his claim to the horses, mules, harness, wagons, salt, and flour, the total value of which he placed at $6,762. From the prices offered by the petitioner the House committee seem to have made deductions which reduced the amount to $6,000.

Your committee, after an examination of the testimony, are satisfied that no further deductions would be justified, and they therefore conclude to report back the House bill without amendment, and to recommend its passage.

In explanation of the delay attending the prosecution the petitioner has filed his affidavit, in which he states that within the term for filing his claim before the southern claims commission he did place his claim in the hands of one William Mullenix, a lawyer living in Bristol, a commissioner appointed by the southern claims commission, who resided within three or four miles of petitioner, who promised petitioner to put it in proper form and file it before the board; and that he did not know of his neglect to do so until after the expiration of the period within which it should have been filed; that petitioner was entirely ignorant of the provision relating to the time within which claims should be presented, and relied upon Commissioner Mullenix to do all that was necessary for the proper prosecution of his claim, and believed in good faith that when he had placed his claim in the hands of said Mullenix, he being commissioner, that he had done all required of him in order to put in his claim in the way of adjustment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the House report. It seems there was one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no House report with the papers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think this is a claim of so much importance in principle that we ought not to pass it without clearly understanding the exact grounds upon which it is supposed to rest. The first proposition is that this claim being what it purports to be, it confessedly should have gone before the southern claims commission, where testimony can be taken and witnesses can be cross-examined by the counsel for the Government under oath, and the exact nature of this gentleman's occupation ascertained at these salt-works, which it seems the Army found it necessary to destroy (or else they were guilty of a very wanton outrage) as being a kind of structure and manufacture like a powder-works that was distinctly useful to the rebellion. I suppose that must have been the principle upon which the salt-works were destroyed. This man should have gone to the commissioners of claims, it is agreed. He did not go there. The excuse for his not going there is that he so misunderstood the law as to suppose that a commissioner appointed by the claims commission to take testimony, like a master in chancery in an ordinary case, or a notary public, was the authorized agent of the United States to receive and file claims, or else that he was this gentleman's attorney, which seems to be the more probable statement of the case, and promised his client that he would file this claim within the time required by the statute and did not do it. Now, therefore, the first question is whether it is within the just duty of Congress to relieve claimants of this character—I might say of almost every other character but it is enough for this purpose to say of this character—against the statute of limitations where the accident or the fault has been that of some agent of the party himself.

It is scarcely necessary to say that if you do it in one case you must do it in all cases resting upon the same general facts, and I am not ready, for one, to have Congress declare that wherever in the Court of Claims, or in the southern claims commission, or in any claim against the United States the statute of limitations has become a bar, we are to open that bar and try the case in Congress ourselves, and allow a man to come in after the evidence may have been lost that would have defeated the claim in the first instance, upon the ground that through some fault or accident or mistake of his or his counsel he did not get into the regular tribunal in season. It is a principle that we ought never to take up, because it would be destructive, in my opinion, of the public interests, and would make a great raid, if I may say so, upon the Treasury, and in respect of claims and cases that we cannot after a great lapse of time know anything about; and that is the precise ground on which this action of Congress rests, that we are to remove the bar of the statute of limitations which has prevented this man, through the fault of his counsel, from getting into the tribunal we have established to try the cause and give him the money without trying it except as we do on ex parte testimony before a committee, and thereby establish the principle that wherever a man can satisfy Congress that through his own neglect or accident or that of his attorney he has failed to move his claim within the time when the United States can know something about it and try it in the regular way and before the witnesses against it are dead, we shall open the doors to all such cases. It does appear to me that that is a very unsafe principle.

Of course I can scarcely expect to produce much impression against the report of so able a committee as this; but, still, I feel bound to say what I am saying on that principle which is directly involved in this bill.

Then, when you come to the claim itself, it appears that, as presented to this committee, this was a claim for the destruction of this man's salt-works, and for taking and carrying away his horses, and wagons, and mules, &c. It does not appear to be the case of supplies taken up in a friendly country, when the army is on the march, and the quartermaster's voucher is given because it has not money to pay, to be turned in and delivered as quartermaster and commissary stores of the War Department; but as he states his own case, he—was the owner of a large property, consisting of salt-furnaces, salt-store goods, salt-sacks, horses, mules, wagons, harness, and cotton yarn, to each of which items he attaches a value, amounting, in the aggregate, to $19,210; that the salt-furnaces and salt were taken and destroyed by the Union armies under the commands of Generals Burbridge and Stoneman, and the other articles, amounting, in the aggregate, to $8,590, were taken and used as supplies by the armies aforesaid.

It was a taking and at the same time and of the same nature as that other part of the act, which was the destruction of these extensive salt-works, which must have been upon the theory that it was contraband of war, to use a short phrase. Now, the question is whether we ought not to have further evidence upon the subject of how extensively this man was manufacturing salt; whether he was supplying the confederate army with it, or whether, as was suggested by the Senator from Virginia, it was a little one-horse neighborhood affair, where he was making salt for the neighbors. If it was that, that is one thing; but if it was the other thing, then, I take it, we should all agree, until we change our policy with the next administration, if that happens to be the wrong one, and pay for all claims of this character, that it is not admissible. As it stands, I, for one, cannot vote for it, and I shall ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I hope we shall have a vote.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment and ordered to a third reading.

Mr. WRIGHT. If the yeas and nays are to be called on this bill, I wish to say one word, not to take up time. There is no claim in this bill for any injury to or loss of the salt-works; it is for property that was taken and used by the Army by competent authority. That is settled by the very terms of the report, and no claim could go through our committee that was not thus settled. The case is exceptional in that the application was not made to this person as attorney, but to one whom he recognized as acting and who was acting for the southern claims commission. We have passed no bill through our committee yet where the person had failed to go to the Court of Claims or to the commission merely because he relied on some attorney who failed to do his duty. We put the case on its exceptional ground. Here was a loss of property taken for the use of the Army, and a loss by a loyal man. That is all there is of this case.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to ask the Senator a question that was asked a while ago, but the answer failed to be elicited. I have no knowledge of this case myself, but I know something about salt-works down South, and I want to know who this man made salt for during the war.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not understand that he made salt for any person during the war.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from Virginia said he did.

Mr. WRIGHT. The suggestion of the Senator from Vermont was that he would like to know whether this man was not making salt for the rebel army. We have found upon that subject because we found his loyalty. If there had been any suggestion of anything of that kind in the papers, that he was making salt for the enemy or for any other than the neighbors, we certainly should have looked into it closely.

Mr. LOGAN. I have a distinct recollection of the destruction—at least the information of it; I was not there—of certain salt-works in Virginia by our Army, on the ground that they were manufacturing salt for the confederate army. It has dropped out here that these works were destroyed. I want to know what they were destroyed for. If they were destroyed because they were manufacturing salt for the confederate army, the owner could not be a loyal man.

Mr. WITHERS. I can tell the Senator from Illinois that the salt which was manufactured in Virginia for the rebel army was at a different place and by a different firm entirely, a much larger establishment than this, and one which was supplying the army with salt by contract.

Mr. LOGAN. I know nothing about this man's salt-works, but the question I want to know is for whom was he manufacturing salt when the salt-works were destroyed?

Mr. WITHERS. For such of the people of the neighborhood around him as chose to go there and buy from him.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask whether or not he was manufacturing and selling to the confederate army?

Mr. WITHERS. Not to my knowledge, and, so far from that, I believe to the contrary, though I cannot say of my own knowledge that not a particle of his manufacture ever went to the army; but I know the confederate army's supply of salt was drawn from a different source, a different establishment, owned by different parties.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator have any knowledge why these salt-works were destroyed?

Mr. WITHERS. I have no knowledge except the general fact that when these raids, as we called them, were made, the officers in charge were not very particular as to what property they did destroy. Salt was considered contraband of war, I presume, at the time, and all the salt-works that they came across they destroyed, whether the salt was devoted to public or private use.

Mr. LOGAN. Until I can get that question definitely answered, I shall vote against the bill. I see many loyal men coming here now that I did not find during the war.

Mr. WITHERS. It would be very difficult or impossible for Mr. Campbell to prove a negative in the case.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not ask anybody to prove a negative; but I do say, inasmuch as these salt-works were destroyed and the owner is not asking pay for the destruction of the salt-works, it is a very suspicious circumstance, to my mind. Here his salt-works were destroyed by our Army and he was a loyal man, and they were not destroyed because they were violating the law or because they were manufacturing salt as contraband of war for the rebel army; but he is entitled to pay for the salt-works because he does not claim pay for the destruction of the works. That is a very suspicious circumstance, in my mind; so much so that I will not vote for it until I know something about why the property was destroyed that he does not ask pay for.

Mr. WITHERS. It seems to me that the Senator's position is rather illogical, if he will pardon me for saying so. The claim is not made for the salt-works. Salt was regarded as contrabrand of war at that time.

Mr. LOGAN. Not the salt, but the salt-works.

Mr. WITHERS. Of course I mean the works for the manufacture of salt.

Mr. LOGAN. Salt-works, if they are not running, are not contraband of war; and if they were destroyed without doing something, that was improper to be done, and he is entitled to pay for it. That is the proposition, and I ask why he does not ask pay for his salt-works?

Mr. WITHERS. Simply because the salt-works that were in operation then were regarded by the military authorities as contraband of war and as calculated to furnish aid and comfort to the enemy, I suppose, and consequently were destroyed wherever they were met with. But this man was not engaged in the manufacture of salt under contract to supply the rebel army at all, because that salt I know was supplied from a different source. The question is as to pay for his horses and his mules and his harness and his food, which were admittedly taken by the military authorities and used for the Army—so acknowledged by the commander of the forces—from this man, whose loyalty has not been questioned and who I can undertake safely to say has fully proven it before the Claims Committee. Whether he shall not be paid for this private property taken for public use is the question before the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator has told us that salt-works were property contraband of war.

Mr. WITHERS. In the estimation of the military commander, I have said.

Mr. CONKLING. In the light of that sentiment I ask the Senator to listen to these words from the House report:

That the memorialist, Charles C. Campbell, is a native of Virginia, and resided in said State during the war of the rebellion; that in the year 1864 he was the owner of certain salt-works at Saltville, in the State of Virginia, used and occupied by him at that time in the manufacture of salt; that he was also the owner of five four-horse and mule teams, fully equipped with harness and wagons used in hauling supplies for said salt-works and for other purposes.

I ask the Senator from Virginia to distinguish, if he will or if he can, in respect of their being contraband, between the salt-works, the realty, and the fixtures, and the five fully equipped mule-teams and wagons owned and operated in connection with those works to haul supplies to them and carry them on. Can there be such a distinction? Of course, we all know, applying our common sense, that the mule-teams used in connection with the salt-works were employed not only in hauling materials to the salt-works, but in carrying away and delivering wherever it was to be delivered the product of the salt-works. So they were the apparatus, the material, the property used, not only in connection with these works but to carry them on and to give them that effect which we are told made them contraband of war. Being so regarded, they were destroyed. The memorialist comes here assuming that, so far as this application is concerned, they must be regarded as properly destroyed; but distinguishing between the salt-works, whatever that term may cover, and the personal property used in connection with them, and by dint of which personal property and its use alone these works were or could be operated and made contraband of war, he is entitled to recover for the personal property.

Now, Mr. President, had the salt-works, the buildings, the evaporating-vats—if that was the theory on which they made salt,—the boilers in which they boiled the salt, been there disused, in repose, they would not have been contraband of war more than so many other boilers and tubs and vats; but because, as the Senator has explained to us they were used in manufacturing one of the prime necessities not of life only but for military operations in the country of an enemy, they were despoiled and prostrated by military force. Now how it can be that the impedimenta, if I may use a military phrase, which belong to this establishment and carried it on and characterized it and made it contraband of war, do not partake of the character of the salt-works, I confess my mind is not microscopic enough to discover.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, I do not claim to possess a microscopic mind, and I certainly cannot compete with the distinguished Senator from New York in drawing nice legal distinctions, and yet it is very clear to my mind that there is a distinction, and one that should be properly recognized, between the personal property, the horses and harness and food, which by no possible stretch of authority could be considered contraband of war in any community, and the salt product which seems to have been so regarded, and which I believe for the first time in civilized warfare was regarded as contraband of war. But assuming that the military authorities so construed it to be contraband of war, I can see readily how they would have destroyed the salt and destroyed the machinery used in the manufacture of salt for which the claimant could recover nothing, and yet when the destruction extended further, not the destruction merely, the effect of which would have been to deprive this hostile community of a necessary of life, and there was an appropriation for Government use of horses, mules, harness, and wagons; it seems to me that some legal distinction ought to exist between the two cases, and that the principle which would be applied to the one should not properly apply to the other.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, is not a flouring-mill situated in an enemy's country, turning out flour for the enemy, contraband in that sense in which a wagon-train loaded with that flour is contraband?

Mr. WITHERS. Provided they are engaged in the manufacture of flour for the public enemy; and if this manufacture of salt had been to supply the armies of the confederacy with salt, then it would have been properly considered contraband of war. But I contend that a flouring-mill where flour is manufactured for Tom, Dick, and Harry, the neighborhood bringing in the grist and carrying it home for their wives and children to eat, is not contraband of war; nor do I believe that salt manufactured for private use through the country is so contraband. But admitting that it shall be regarded as contraband of war, I believe that the horses and the harness and the wagons, which were merely incidentally used in the manufacture of that article, but were also used for other purposes, when they were not destroyed but appropriated and receipted for and used for the military purposes of the Government ought to be paid for as any other private property taken for public use.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia to his distinction between the horses and the vats and the wood to another distinction on the same principle, or rather the same one extended. Suppose the army of General Burbridge and General Stoneman had taken a few sacks of this salt, and the soldiers had salted their porridge with it, on his principle I suppose we ought to pay for that. The salt itself was innocent. It is not the badness of the salt that makes it contraband of war, neither is it the wickedness of the mule that makes him contraband of war. It is the application of those forces of nature and those subjects of manufacture to the aid of the enemy that makes them contraband of war. If making gunpowder for the support of the enemy is an illegitimate transaction, and you have a right to come down upon it when you can reach it with your army, it is rather an extraordinary idea to say that the wood that is piled up to make the charcoal and that the saltpeter that is accumulated and not yet gone into the powder and the horse that is drawing the wood are perfectly innocent; that they are within the protection of the law; but it is only the perfected substance that we can do anything about, and all the destruction of the rest is illegal. Now, suppose this army had shot down the mules and had burnt up the wood and destroyed the wagons, would anybody contend, supposing the salt-works were contraband, that it was not a lawful destruction? Of course nobody would. Then suppose, instead of destroying the contraband of war, there is a military confiscation of it, the salt and the vats and the horses and everything are taken up and distributed among the Army, either as loot or as for use, does that make any difference in the principle? It certainly does not.

The Senator struck the key-note of the thing when he said it was incidental to carrying on this illegal trade, this illegal business, that horses and wagons and mules were used. Everybody knows that the incident goes with the principal thing; and if these salt-works, therefore, were going on contrary to the laws of war, so that we were entitled to destroy them, then we were entitled upon the principles of the laws of war to take for military use as of right everything that was connected with the carrying on of that business. That I understand to be the law and to be justice. Of course, it is a misfortune to this loyal man, as he is called, that he was in the midst of the enemy's country making gunpowder or making salt for them. He may have been very loyal indeed; but if he was supplying the rebels with the munitions of war, then I take it his loyalty is not of that kind which entitles him to redress when we destroy and confiscate the property which he is making use of for such purposes.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CAPERTON. I hope the Senate will dispose of the bill. It will take but a few minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of twelve o'clock has arrived. If there is no objection the consideration of the bill will be continued.

Mr. HOWE. Does the report find as a fact that this property was situated in the enemy's country?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think it does, but I will tell you what the owner himself says. I have the affidavit here, which is rather rich reading:

In the year 1862 I purchased an interest in the salt-works in Washington County, Virginia—

Which is the southwest corner of Virginia, or near the southwest part of Virginia. I believe we all know, politically and judicially and every other way, that the southwestern portion of Virginia in the year 1862 and down in fact to the year 1865 was in the enemy's country. There cannot be any doubt about that, I take it. He goes on—in connection with a partner.

Who that partner was the committee does not inform us; whether he was Mr. Jefferson Davis or Mr. George T. Beauregard or Mr. R. M. T. Hunter, or whoever it may have been we do not know. It seems convenient for this gentleman not to give the name of his partner.

We erected two furnaces and bought one other, making three in all—

This was during the flagrance of the rebellion and in the enemy's country. What sent this loyal man into that place called Saltville into the extensive business of making salt in the midst of the enemy's country would be a subject of curious inquiry. He goes on—and proceeded to make salt on private account. We bought horses, mules, wagons, harness, and everything that was necessary to carry on the manufactory of salt successfully. We had our three furnaces making salt at the time Generals Burbridge and Stoneman made their raid into Virginia.

I take it that is tolerable evidence that it was rather a forcible eruption at that time, and they were in very successful operation, giving it, I suppose, by the spoonful to the poor neighbors about! Let me see what he says he was doing:

We had five four-horse and mule teams, with a complete outfit of harness and wagons, together with an extra wagon, in case of breakage to keep the work moving, running and hauling wood to the railroad near Emory and Henry College, some ten miles by rail from Saltville, from which point we shipped the wood by rail to Saltville. Generals Burbridge and Stoneman, in their march or raids into Virginia in December, 1864, came upon and took away from us all the above-described property, with the teamsters that were colored men.

That was very cruel; these wicked Union generals to carry off into captivity the colored men that this Union man was hanging on to make salt! I am very glad we have got at that. How unhappy those colored men must have been! Just think of it; carried away to the North, away from their loyal master!

together with three fine horses and a very fine mule that I kept at my house in Bristol. In addition to the above Generals Burbridge and Stoneman took from me one hundred bunches of cotton yarn, one stock of goods, and destroyed three carloads of salt.

That was the way the neighbors were going to have this salt. They could not get it unless the salt was loaded on the railroad cars to be distributed to the neighbors about the village, I suppose!

That was taken in the town I live in, (Bristol.) At Marion, forty-four miles east of my residence, they took from my mill about one hundred and nine barrels of flour.

It seems this loyal man was milling flour pretty extensively, as well. That, I suppose, was for the neighbors, to be dealt out on railroad cars. What is the name of that railroad, may I ask the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. WITHERS. The Virginia and Tennessee, now the Atlantic and Mississippi and Ohio.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What were the principal points it ran to in the confederate territory at that time?

Mr. WITHERS. That railroad is a continuous line from Norfolk through Lynchburgh, Abingdon, and Knoxville, to Chattanooga.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That railroad at that time was under confederate control, was it not?

Mr. WITHERS. All that portion of it was.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And yet this loyal man was loading his salt into confederate railroad cars in order to deliver it to his loyal neighbors in the immediate vicinity of this mill to keep up life! If that is what you call a loyal man, I beg to be excused, Mr. President.

Mr. WITHERS. I merely want to explain one or two circumstances connected with this matter which my friend from Vermont has certainly misapprehended. In the first place, I want him to recollect that this is not a claim for powder or saltpeter, nor is it a claim for salt, but it is a claim for horses and harness, mules and flour. According to the extended construction given by my friend from Vermont to what constitute articles contraband of war, every barrel of flour, every ear of corn, and every pound of meat that is raised in any community during the progress of a war is an article contraband of war. I dissent entirely from that doctrine. If this flour was being manufactured for the confederate army, for the supply of the rebellion, then I admit the distinction might be a good one; but it is in proof that it was not so manufactured, and the fact that it was shipped on the railroad does not constitute evidence that it was designed for the use of the rebel army or for any person in the military employment of the Confederate States. I will here state a fact, which perhaps may not be within the knowledge of some who hear me, that the salt-works in that section of Virginia supplied the salt not only for the rebel army under a contract with the proprietors of the large salt-works which were located in the same neighborhood, but communities all through the South everywhere appointed agents and purchased and made contracts with individual and private operators and manufacturers for the salt for their respective neighborhoods. They sent these men there and they manufactured the salt and distributed it sometimes by lines of railway and sometimes by private conveyance, as the necessities or location of the parties required; but that was the mode of distribution which was used for the communities from which this gentleman hailed, at and around Bristol, some forty miles distant. If transportation on a railway which was located within the southern confederacy convicts an article of being contraband of war, then I presume I should have to give it up; but I deny the fact that such evidence is proof that the article was contraband of war. But I recall again the fact that it is not the salt which he claims for, but the horses, the provisions, the food, the harness, and those matters of private property which were not destroyed but which were appropriated and receipted for by the military officers; and I take it that any one who knows the personnel of the committee who have investigated this claim must know that they never would have passed upon the claim and recommended the passage of the bill if the proof of loyalty had not been conclusively satisfactory to their own minds.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust that we shall have a vote.

Mr. WITHERS. I will not delay a vote.

Mr. CONKLING. Has the morning hour expired?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and by common consent the bill has been continued.

Mr. INGALLS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust there will be no objection now to a vote on this bill.

Mr. WITHERS. I appeal to my friend from Kansas to let us have a vote on the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. This is a case of extreme hardship, and it is better to have it settled one way or another, and not trouble the Senate with it again.

Mr. INGALLS. The morning hour has expired, and I observe that the managers and counsel are here. We have already had a postponement of the trial for several days. I think we had better go on.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas calls for the regular order. Legislative and executive business will be suspended and the Senate will proceed to consider the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate then proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap having adjourned then resumed its

LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes its legislative business.

Mr. CONKLING. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask the Senate to take up the bill from the House for the relief of Mrs. James K. Polk.

Mr. DAWES. I should like unanimous consent to withdraw a motion I made some days since to reconsider a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York calls for the regular order, which is the unfinished business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The river and harbor bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Now, I move that the order be postponed for the present for the purpose of taking up the bill for the relief of Mrs. James K. Polk, widow of a former President of the United States. It will not take five minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The question being put, there were, on division—ayes 19, noes 18.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I voted against postponing this river and harbor bill, not because I am at all in favor of the river and harbor bill as it stands, though I hope we shall get one that I can be in favor of, but because this matter of Mrs. Polk was reported the other day, and since that time some information has come to my possession, which of course I know nothing about personally, but from a respectable source, touching her loyalty, which I have handed over to one of the members of the committee. I do not think we ought to press the matter until that can be inquired into. That is all I have to say.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I think I could give some testimony about the loyalty of Mrs. James K. Polk. I do not think anybody who knows her doubts that at all. She has been living in retirement in Nashville for twenty-five years in the house in which her husband died. During the war she nursed the soldiers of the Federal Army when they were in Nashville and did more acts of kindness of that kind than anybody there. While she was here she was a pattern of everything that was excellent in woman. Never has there been in the White House a lady who was more popular than she was; never was there any one who did more acts of generous kindness than she did while she was here. This bill asks for only $1,500.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to make him a suggestion? Has he not already discovered that by moving this bill at this time he will force a great many to vote against the bill who would be glad to vote for it? This is after the expiration of the morning hour; the river and harbor bill is the unfinished business and that is in a crisis, and there are a great many Senators who do not feel at liberty to postpone that for a minute for the consideration of anything else. I think if the Senator would allow this to go over for the present and move it at any time in the morning hour, it would pass in less time than we have already spent upon it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. The Senator from Wisconsin is a wise man and I will take his advice, hoping that he will help me to-morrow to get this bill through. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. KERNAN, it was Ordered, That the papers relative to the claim of Mrs. Ellen J. Brosnan be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and, with the accompanying additional papers, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to make House bill No. 58 the special order after the disposition of the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the military bounty bill be made the special order to follow the present order, which is the river and harbor bill.

Mr. WHYTE. I object.

Mr. INGALLS. It can be done with the concurrence of two-thirds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Two-thirds by fixing an hour. The river and harbor bill is now before the Senate. The Senator from Illinois moves to postpone it for the purpose of offering a motion that the bounty bill be made the special order for some hour that he may name.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that it be made the special order after this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Some definite time must be fixed.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I will say two o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves that the bounty bill which he has named be made the special order for two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. WHYTE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL. Is the first vote upon postponement of the river and harbor bill, or directly on this proposition of the Senator from Illinois?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator asks unanimous consent to make the motion. If there be no objection the Chair will put the question on that. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question now is on the motion to make the bounty bill the special order for one o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. STEVENSON. My colleague [Mr. MCCREERY] is detained at home by the illness of his family.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bontwell, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dawes, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Key, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morton, Oglesby, Patterson, Spencer, West, Windom, and Wright—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Barnum, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Caperton, Cooper, Eaton, Gordon, Hamilton, Kelly, Kernan, Merrimon, Norwood, Sargent, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Burnside, Clayton, Cockrell, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Howe, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Morrill, Paddock, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sharon, Sherman, and Wadleigh—24.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Two-thirds not having voted for the motion, the order is not made.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 333) for the relief of Major Foster A. Hixon, late a paymaster in the Army; and

A bill (S. No. 952) to remove the political disabilities of G. T. Beauregard, of New Orleans, Louisiana.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. No. 779) to provide for the sale of the reservation of the confederated Otoe and Missouria Indians in the States of Kansas and Nebraska, disagreed to by the Senate, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. C. H. MORGAN of Missouri, Mr. WILLIAM W. WILSHIRE of Arkansas, and Mr. W. A. PHILLIPS of Kansas, managers at the conference on its part.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 147) to authorize the Secretary of War to pay expenses incurred by the State of Oregon and citizens of California in suppressing Indian hostilities in the States of Oregon and California in the years 1872 and 1873;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 152) instructing the Secretary of War to forward to the State of North Carolina authenticated copies of certain State records captured in 1865; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 153) to correct an error in the enrollment of the post-office appropriation bill.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker pro tempore of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 332) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1867, and for other purposes," approved June 22, 1874; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask the Senate to consider the joint resolution correcting an error in the post-office appropriation bill. I think it will only take a moment.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 153) to correct an error in the enrollment of the post-office appropriation act was read twice and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend the act approved July 12, 1876, making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, in line 36 of section 7, as printed by authority of the Department of State, by striking out after the word "sums" the word "not."

Mr. HAMLIN. This is the way it now reads:

Three-tenths of 1 per cent. on all sums over $320,000 and not exceeding $640,000; 2-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums not over $640,000 and not exceeding $1,000,000.

That word "not," before "over $640,000," got in there in engrossing or printing improperly, and the Department cannot execute the law until the change is made.

The resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to reduce the aggregate amount of the appropriations contained in the bill to a sum not exceeding $4,000,000.

Mr. THURMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I trust that the Senate will not adopt either the bill as it came from the House or the bill as it has been amended by the Senate. The bill as it came from the House appropriated $5,872,000; and the Senate has added to that sum $900,000 more. As gentlemen on the other side on Saturday appealed to the friends of this bill to stand by it, I appeal to Senators who believe we should only appropriate the lowest sum consistent with the public good not to pass this bill either as it came from the House or as it has been amended in the Senate.

It is idle for us to talk about economizing or reducing taxes if we do not stop making appropriations of the character of these. The Senate have had from the committee information on all, or a large portion, of these appropriations; all that information was desired upon; and this bill appropriates money in the face of the reports by your engineers that there is really no need of appropiating money at all; and we appropriate $5,000 or $10,000 in the face of their recommendations that the public will not suffer if the work stands as it is now or the river stands, without any appropriation at all, but that, if we ever do the work talked about in the appropriation, it should be done as one job for the sake of economy. Now, I ask the Senate whether we shall go on and appropriate this large sum of nearly $6,000,000 by the one bill, and nearly $7,000,000 by the other, when I submit that every gentleman who has listened to the information we have received must be satisfied that there is a very unwise, not to say a very wasteful, expenditure of public money to a very large amount in this bill. It is not for continuing necessary work, it is not confined to that; it is not for commencing works which will be really beneficial to the commerce of the country. But large appropriations are here—for what? To clear out bowlders and snags in streams that there is no pretense will ever be channels of commerce in the proper sense of that term.

I appeal to the Senate in a time when the business of the country is depressed, when taxation is heavy, and when our revenues will run short of the estimates, as it is believed, whether we should go on appropriating either the one or the other sum. My judgment is that the sum named in each of the motions which have been made is too large; that the business of the country and the country itself will be as well served and as prosperous if we do not appropriate more than $3,000,000 by this bill to improve and protect and preserve rivers and harbors, instead of making appropriations where, as in the case of one of the rivers the gentlemen favoring it say they hope to make a channel of water three feet deep, and not confined to anything which can be called streams to carry commerce, and thus benefit the Union. It is a bill to begin a system of internal improvements of small streams within a State, and I hope that we shall not pass it.

It has been said that we ought to defer greatly to the House of Representatives. I hope in regard to this, the first bill that comes here largely increasing expenditure and not cutting it down, we shall not carry that deference too far. Moreover, I have looked at the proceedings of the House as contained in the RECORD, and it seems that this bill on the 11th of April was reported back and the previous question was ordered. The Speaker had to rule that there was to be no debate or amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York is out of order in referring to the proceedings of the House of Representatives.

Mr. KERNAN. I am reading from the RECORD before me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator cannot refer to proceedings of the House as bearing on a bill before the Senate.

Mr. KERNAN. I will not do so, then. I have great respect for the House, but as to this bill I think we should exercise our judgment on the facts we have here, and not concur in the bill of the House. It is a wasteful expenditure of public money. It is one that will not subserve the public good, in my judgment. This is a time when we should not appropriate a dollar unless it be really necessary for the welfare of the country in its national character; and that is not the nature, in my judgment, of largely more than half of these six or seven million dollars. Therefore I shall be constrained to vote for the motion to refer the bill back and limit the appropriation to a much smaller sum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to recommit the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I shall vote against the motion to recommit, but not upon the ground that I am in favor of the bill as it came from the House, for I believe, with all respect to the House, that it is preposterous and extravagant in the last degree. I am speaking of the bill, not of the House, of course. Nor will I vote for it as it has been "perfected," as we call it, in the Senate, because in respect of extravagance and "preposterosity," as the late Mr. Sumner would say, we have made it about just as bad as it was when it passed the House, considering the relative position of the two bodies. We have not doubled the money, but when we have fixed up this bill, taking it substantially as it came from the House, and have ridden it with three-quarters of a million more, I think we cannot shake our "gory locks" at the House of Representatives and say that they are deserving of any special malediction. Taking the bill as it stands, I cannot help saying it will be far from graceful—it would not be in order for me to say disgraceful—for the Senate of the United States to pass it. Here are seventy-eight instances in which our own committee, charged with this special work, (and I believe with the full concurrence of the whole committee, or all who were here, who had the matter originally in charge,) has stricken out House provisions as being under existing circumstances absolutely improper; and in at least seventy-five of those instances, if not the whole seventy-eight, we have overruled the careful and unprejudiced examination of our committee and have put the bill back as the House had it. That is our account.

I say that I shall vote against the recommitment. I do not do it on the ground that I am in favor either of the bill as it came from the House or as it now stands. It would be a pretty hard piece of work to vote for it as it came from the committee, not on the ground that they have not made careful and intelligent changes, but on the ground that as they have left it it calls for more money than we can on this occasion afford to appropriate, I fear.

What will happen if the bill goes back to the committee just as it stands with these instructions? They are at once embarrassed with what is an almost insuperable difficulty. They are to take $4,000,000 and spread it around—how? The instructions do not say how. That point is perfectly free. The honorable occupant of the chair, who descended from the seat of Jove the other day and thundered at us about Michigan, would naturally be expected to say, "Michigan is in such an insular position that it is necessary we shall have every dollar that is appropriated in the House bill for that State, possibly excepting the cove of Mr. McCargoe," if that is his name. I should say as a matter of course that the great State of Vermont, which has three little appropriations for her share, ought not to be cut down. To be sure, out of those ports and harbors she puts nearly a million of dollars into the Treasury every year in the way of customs, which is a slight circumstance to be considered. I on the same ground should be expected to go before the committee and to contend, up-hill and down, "You must not throw off anything from Vermont; we have only got the widow's mite as it is, and we are pouring into the lap of the Treasury hundreds and hundreds of thousands of dollars in the way of customs," and so on. I only mention these two States by way of illustration, and cannot mean any offense to the Chair by taking those States; and so it will be all over the Union.

Therefore, Mr. President, we are putting in the way of this committee work that, situated as they are, it will be almost impossible for them to perform. Suppose they perform it and report the bill back in the best way they can, as undoubtedly they will do if we compel them again to undertake the work, how long would their report stand? McCargoe's Cove, and Otter Creek, and New River, and Little Sodus Bay, and Sandusky, which my friend over the way [Mr. THURMAN] is so much interested in in spite of the report of the engineers, would all cry here like "the pelican in the wilderness," and we should have to put them back; and we should find ourselves at the end of three or four days again just where we started. I think what I have proposed, with due deference, is the true thing to do; and that is to provide as we have done on two occasions before, of one of which my amendment is a copy, to put into the responsible Executive Department that has charge of these works all the money we can afford to spend to preserve and repair and continue works in progress for this year, and make that Department responsible for applying it to the places where there is the greatest necessity for the public service. That was found in 1869, when we got into just such a state of things as we have now, (the bill ridden down in the two Houses with preposterous propositions,) to be the only way out; and what was the result? I venture to say that there never was a year when the public money thus appropriated was more prudently, economically, and fairly spent and applied to the best objects than that year. Let us do that now. That is my reason for voting against this proposed reference.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the river and harbor bill as it came to us from the House is a pretty good illustration of the spirit that has prevailed in regard to appropriations at this session. The bill as it came here from the House embraced appropriations for $5,872,000. I am advised by my friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] that the Senate committee and the Senate have added to it about $800,000, making it something like $6,670,000. Last year the appropriations were $6,662,000; so that if the bill passes now with the amendments made by the Senate it will be within a few thousand dollars of what it was last year.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the Senator is a little mistaken in saying the committee added so as to make so much. They also subtracted in other places; so that it is an increase of only $36,000. I only correct the Senator in respect to the use of the word "committee," lest it be misunderstood. The Senate has done it.

Mr. MORTON. The members of the House and of the Senate of both parties are not influenced by the pressure of any necessity for contracting appropriations. Where their local interests are involved there is money enough for that purpose; there is no falling short of the revenue. If this small river and that small harbor and the other creek require improvement in their particular States or neighborhoods, there is no determination to diminish the appropriations. I am not going to find fault with them, but I am going to contrast that with the cutting down of appropriations in other respects. While members will not permit their local interests to be affected by this demand for small appropriations and cutting down the expenses of the Government, yet we find large reductions in other respects where it does not fall upon them locally, but where the effect is simply to cripple the operations of the General Government. That seems to be the spirit. Take the general appropriation bills. There is no objection to crippling the Army or to crippling the Navy. Take the Court of Claims, where we are bound to appropriate for the payment of their judgments, nearly all of which have been re-affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, requiring about $2,000,000 to do it. There they make no appropriations at all. There is retrenchment, but it is retrenchment by repudiation. Take your navy-yards and your naval stations. I have heard it said that the property of the United States at these different places amounts to $50,000,000, and from its nature requires improvements and repair every year to make it serviceable. The repairs for this year were estimated by the Department at a million and a half, and yet no appropriation was made for it. The property was to go down, to become unserviceable for the use of the Navy. Why? The only effect is to cripple the operations of the General Government, impair the efficiency of the Navy, and make the impression of retrenchment, that the democratic party is running this Government at a diminished expense, and consequently that the republican party must have been extravagant and corrupt.

You may run through these retrenchments, and so far as I am advised you can point to but few that do not indicate the simple purpose of making political capital and not because money can be honestly and justly saved. In many respects there must be large deficiency bills next year or public works will go to ruin and the public service in many respects be seriously impaired or perhaps destroyed.

I do not propose to vote for the recommittal of this bill. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] sees that this bill does not comport with other bills. He sees very clearly that the character of this bill shows the purpose and spirit with which retrenchments have been made in other bills, and shows that that has been done for the purpose of making capital, and not for the purpose of subserving the best interests of the Government. I am not surprised that one so shrewd as the Senator from Ohio sees the importance of recommitting this bill and cutting it down also.

But, Mr. President, this Government is established for the good of the people, and the improvement of rivers and harbors and keeping them in navigable condition pertains to the interest of this people. Some of the appropriations, I doubt not, are not deserving. That has always been the case; but the most of them, I presume, are worthy. A little river may be open; it may benefit a hundred or two hundred thousand people in that neighborhood. It is not of national importance, but it is of immense importance to the people in that State or that Territory; and so with regard to others, and thus, spread all over the country, these improvements and appropriations are for the general benefit. If our object is to build up our country, to improve it and to better the condition of this people, let us take the best means to do it. Sometimes we will be mistaken. Sometimes the money will be thrown away; but in the main it will be well expended. The interests of this country have been built up immensely by these improvements from time to time, although some of them have been frauds and mere speculations.

Without attempting to go into the details of this bill, I will say that in the main I approve of it. If any appropriations here can be shown to be improper, I will vote for striking them out; but I will not vote to recommit the bill in the wholesale, because in the aggregate it is too large and it does not comport with the general action of the House in regard to other appropriation bills. That is all my friend's motion means. It means that the bill as it stands is a criticism and a rebuke upon other reductions that have been made. It is a condemnation of them. Here is where the local and the direct interests of the members are affected. They will not remit anything; they will not withhold a dollar; but when it comes to those general appropriations that only go to the operation of the Government, to the credit of the Government, they are willing to reduce the appropriations millions for the purpose of making the impression upon the country that the democratic party is for reform, retrenchment, and economy.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I am in favor of just and wise economy. I recognize the distress of the people of the country. I know that labor all over the country is without employment. I know that debt hangs heavily over the Federal Government, over the States, and over the cities, counties, and people. If I looked at this great question which is now before the Senate from that single stand-point, I would agree that this appropriation for the improvement of rivers and harbors ought not to be made; but in so far as the proposition of the Senator from Vermont amended by that of the Senator from Ohio is concerned, whether the appropriations were $4,000,000, $1,000,000, or $40,000,000, it could by no possibility ever receive my assent. I hold this Government to be a government by the people, of the people, and for the people. I understand that it is a representative Government in which the other House of this Congress represent the people in their primary capacity, and this body represents the States of the Union in their corporate capacity. Whenever I bring myself to the point, as I never will, that I will make any one man in all this land, whether he be the Chief Engineer or whether he be the Secretary of War, or any other man, overseer of the rivers and harbors of this country, of the necessities for their improvement, and to place in his hand the autocratic power of disposing of $4,000,000 in such manner as to him may seem best, I will yield all my ideas of a representative republican form of government.

No, sir; that is a species of autocracy. That is in direct and palpable violation of the very spirit, purpose, and intent of the Constitution and of the principles upon which it is based. In this Government it was designed and intended that whenever appropriations were to be made for the use and benefit of the people and in discharge of the constitutional duties of the Government, they should be made specifically by the joint action of these two Houses, and that every specific appropriation made to that end should be pointed out by the law-making power. Carry out the idea of the pending proposition of the Senator from Vermont, amended by the Senator from Ohio, and what consequences inevitably follow. If you can place $4,000,000 in the hands of the Secretary of War or the Chief of Engineers for the purpose of improving rivers and harbors, then you can place all the money for the Army in the hands of the Secretary of War; all the money for the Navy in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy; all which is designed for foreign relations in the hands of the Secretary of State; that which is designed for Indians and internal concerns in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior; put these sums in gross in their hands and tell them to distribute as to them may seem best. In short, let this Congress declare before the American people that we have not the capacity in ourselves to do what they sent us here to do. This great power they have intrusted in our hands and our action will in effect say that we have farmed it out to other men who have more brains, greater capacity, and who better know how to dispose of it. It is violative of the very elementary principles of free government.

I will examine the question of river and harbor improvements in the light of a business proposition. It is said that the appropriation asked for here, sent up by the House, $5,882,000, increased by the Senate some $900,000, is the largest appropriation that has ever been made by any Congress. That may be so; but gentlemen forget that this is a great, a growing, and a progressive country. They say we are in debt. How does a good, prudent business man get out of debt? Suppose you had a plantation of five hundred acres of land, and you had the hands, as well as the land and the mules, to run a place of a thousand acres, but you had not the money for the needed implements and provisions and forage; yet you had every other thing necessary to run a plantation of a thousand acres. Your crops of a thousand acres would make say $10,000 over and above all the expenses, while your five hundred acres would yield but $5,000 profit. You, by the use of your credit, increase that plantation to a thousand acres, and your profits over and above all expenses are doubled. I ask if any prudent man would say that you should not use your credit for the purpose of increasing your business in order to enable you to increase your profits and thereby pay your debts? It is business; it is prudence; it is common sense. Again, suppose a merchant, who by his prudence, his sagacity, his integrity, is running a business of $100,000, and is enabled to increase that to $200,000. Necessarily he must employ more clerks, pay larger house rents, his freight and other bills will be larger; but the net profits after deducting all these expenses are greater. But according to the theory of keeping the expenses down to a fixed figure, you must lose all these increased profits, because it costs a greater outlay to get these increased profits. In other words, notwithstanding our country contains a population of 44,000,000 people, notwithstanding that the commerce and productions of this country are wonderfully increasing everywhere, we must take the commerce of this young giant, lay it upon the bed of Procrustes and say to the producers, "If you dare to go beyond four million expenditures we will cut you off at the knees; you shall not do it." That may be business, it may be prudence, it may be economy. It does not so seem to me.

The Senator from New York greatly opposes this bill. If you will turn to the expenditures in the State of New York for rivers and harbors, as shown by a letter of the Secretary of War transmitted to the other House on the 3d of February, 1876, and published for the use of the other House, accompanied by a letter of the Chief of Engineers of the 1st of February, you will find a full and complete statement of all expenditures in each State of this Union for rivers and harbors from the year 1824 down to March 3, 1875, inclusive. In the State of New York alone those expenditures amount to $7,332,603.46. Thus it will be seen that the American people have paid for the benefit of the single State of New York more money for the improvement of these rivers and harbors than is asked in this bill, increased as it has been by the Senate amendments, for the whole American Union. The State of New York alone has had this vast sum of $7,300,000 appropriated by the whole people of America for the improvement of her rivers and harbors. They are mainly completed, although we have in this very bill appropriated several hundred thousands more for that State. It will be remembered that in the West and in the South there are States which are rising, progressing, coming up in wealth, in commerce, in improvement, in population. For the purpose of opening up these rivers and harbors, these arteries of commerce in order that what they raise may get into the commerce of the world, sound judgment, wisdom, prudence, economy demand that appropriations should be made.

I have taken the largest State in the American Union. I come down then to the State of the Senator, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] who had something to say in regard to the bill, the smallest State, the State of Delaware. I say that State has received $2,709,759.70 out of the pockets of the American people for river and harbor improvements.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator be kind enough to point out for what improvements, for what rivers?

Mr. MAXEY. Precisely; with the greatest pleasure.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Does the Senator include the Delaware breakwater?

Mr. MAXEY. I am speaking of what the Senator's State got for rivers and harbors. I can give the items if you desire them.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I prefer you to give the items.

Mr. MAXEY.

Improving New Castle Harbor, Delaware, $177,000.
Improving Wilmington Harbor, Delaware, $79,356.
Delaware breakwater, $2,168 403.70.
Improving Broadkiln River, Delaware, $10,000.

I suppose that this last is one of your great national improvements:

Piers at Lewes, Delaware, $275,000.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire, if the Senator will allow me, to say that everybody who knows anything about the character of the Delaware breakwater knows that, while it is situated within the territorial limits of the State of Delaware, it is a work of national importance and is not designed to benefit the commerce of Delaware. It is situated at the mouth of Delaware Bay, where shipping from the ocean can take refuge in time of storm. It is comparatively of no value whatever to the commerce of the State of Delaware, and never was designed to be. Again, with reference to the ice-harbor at New Castle, we have but comparatively very little commerce at that point, but it is a very valuable point to all the commerce going up the Delaware Bay to the city of Philadelphia. When the ice forms in the river, it is necessary that the shipping coming in from the ocean should have some place of refuge. Hence that ice-harbor at that point was established, not for the benefit of the State of Delaware or the commerce of Delaware, but for the general commerce of the whole country. I say now, with the exception of the appropriation of $10,000, to which the gentleman has referred, for Broadkiln Creek, which was obtained some few years ago by a colleague of mine in the other House of Congress, and with the exception of the appropriations for Wilmington Harbor, there has scarcely ever been a dollar appropriated to streams within the State in which I live.

Now, with reference to the appropriations for Wilmington Harbor, in the whole history of this country the appropriations have been some $79,000. That is a very important commercial point. That in fact is almost the Clyde of America, where iron ships are being built and iron vessels repaired. These are not works of local importance——

Mr. MAXEY. I did not propose to yield to the Senator from Delaware to interject a speech. He has gone very far beyond the point for which I yielded.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wanted to correct an error in the statement of my friend.

Mr. MAXEY. I have heard the statement. I do not care to have a speech interjected into mine. I prefer to make my own speech, and then the Senator is at perfect liberty to answer, if he can, anything I may have said.

I learn now that what is dignified in this letter of the Chief of Engineers as Broadkiln River is simply Broadkiln Creek, and that Delaware has gotten an appropriation for this great national thoroughfare of Broadkiln Creek. But the Senator says what has been done for Delaware has been for great national purposes. We heard the eloquent Senator from Georgia ask last Saturday for an appropriation for a river in Georgia, which bore upon its bosom to the commerce of the world one-fourth of all the lumber shipped in the Union. If that is not a great national enterprise, what is a national enterprise? So much, then, for Delaware.

I find by reference to the same letter with the statistics furnished that Maryland received $1,041,537.50. I find that Ohio received $2,046,928.18, and this exclusive of the Ohio River, which washes the entire eastern side of the State of Ohio and drains many of her richest and most beautiful valleys, the improvements on which river inure to the benefit of the State of Ohio as much as they do to any other State in the entire Mississippi Valley. Yet outside of that river the State of Ohio has got within her borders and for her benefit $2,046,928.18 for her rivers and harbors. I will read some of the items:

Huron Harbor, Ohio	$97, 273 71
Black River Harbor, Ohio	168, 204 77
Cleveland Harbor, Ohio	391, 244 84
Grand River Harbor, Ohio	204, 670 29
Ashtabula Harbor, Ohio	263, 901 21
Conneaut Harbor, Ohio	106, 629 93

The Senator from Ohio said the other day that Ohio had never asked for one solitary dollar nor had obtained it for anything within its borders peculiarly Ohioan. Here is another appropriation:

Cunningham Creek, Ohio	$19, 781 12

That is scarcely, I presume, a national highway. It is in the State of Ohio, I presume. The Senator from that State knows much better than I do, for I never heard of it before. I find that Sandusky River, not the harbor of Sandusky, but Sandusky River, within the limits of the State of Ohio, received $30,000. So they can appropriate there when they set their heads to it moneys for improvements of their own waters, within their own borders, for both creeks and rivers. I, therefore, cannot see that the State of Ohio is any better than the other States which are claiming something.

I want to look at another little item for the benefit of the distinguished Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Burlington Harbor, Vermont, $371, 172 20.
Deepening channel between the Hero Islands, Lake Champlain, $21, 000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator, deepening what?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont appeals to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I inquire of the Senator from Texas to state again, deepening what channel?

Mr. MAXEY. I will leave that out. I will start out with the Senator's favorite.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I prefer the Senator to state, if he is kind enough to state, what he has just read.

Mr. MAXEY. I first read this item:

Burlington Harbor, Vermont, $371,172.20.

The next item in this table is:

Deepening channel between the Hero Islands, Lake Champlain, $21,000.

I will now read the Senator's favorite, the creek which has existed since the Declaration of Independence, according to his speech of Saturday; and which, according to some, is an utterly unconstitutional creek, and has no business to be in Vermont:

Improving Otter Creek, Vermont, $15,000.

I understand, Mr. President, that the records of the Department will show, as I will state for the benefit of my democratic friends, that a bill for the improvement of Otter Creek, which according to the Senator from Vermont is ten times deeper than any stream in North Carolina, although but seven miles long, was approved by General Jackson himself. So that we have tolerably good democratic authority for it.

So I might go on in every one of these improvements. I am not blaming the Senators for whose States the appropriations were made, the question here being on making these appropriations for rivers and harbors now necessary to be improved. If these appropriations aided in developing the great commerce of the country and making this a richer and more powerful and more prosperous people, the appropriations were right.

I find also in this table:

Providence River, Rhode Island, $50,000.

I do not suppose that that is any more a great national river in the State of Rhode Island than many other rivers that are down in this bill—

Pawtucket River, Rhode Island, $52,000.
Pawcatuck River, Rhode Island, $50,000.

My knowledge of geography is at fault. I never heard of Pawcatuck River before; but the people of America heard of the Pawcatuck River to the tune of $50,000.

Then follows—

Newport Harbor, Rhode Island, $28,500.
Wickford Harbor, Rhode Island, $10,000.
Breakwater at Block Island, Rhode Island, $245,000.

I find that the State of Connecticut comes in for her share, and so all the way through, running all along.

Several SENATORS. What is the document?

Mr. MAXEY. This is an official document signed by General Humphreys, the Chief Engineer of the United States, called out by the chairman of the Appropriation Committee of the House, printed and published by authority for the use and benefit of all concerned.

The theory presented here by some Senators is that we ought to stop improvements. I remember, and I am not an old man, when wheat was cut by the sickle. That cost from six bits to a dollar. I remember we passed from that on to the scythe and cradle, costing, I think, from $4 to $6. I know that now we cut wheat with reapers that cost from $150 to $400. That is economy. Every good farmer knows that it is economy to buy the reaper instead of attempting to cut his wheat with a sickle or with a scythe and cradle. The world moves and we move with it. I remember, when I was but a boy, seeing on the plantation of my old grandfather the servants there flailing out wheat with a flail made of two pieces of wood tied together with a string. I do not know that any gentleman here has ever seen it. I have no doubt the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] has. That cost nothing. We passed from the flail on to the tramping-floor, and from the tramping-floor we passed into the magnificent thrashers. There can be seen upon every plantation in the North and Northwest that class of implement which the genius of man has given to save muscle and to save labor. The thrasher costs from $400 to $600. Yet according to the theory of these gentlemen progress should stop; farmers should never spend from $400 to $600 on the thrasher, because it costs more than the flail which costs nothing. What economy!

If I were in debt and had the means at my disposal, with my energy and what I hope is my integrity, backed by a good credit, if it were necessary to use my credit to pay my debts, I would combine credit, with energy and brain, to work out that debt. That is the way when a man is in debt to get out of it. Here we find by these magnificent improvements in agriculture in the great West and in my own country where we now have on large plantations the steam cotton-gin—and where in my own State we have the thrasher and the reaper as well—we find agriculture moving ahead as it is gloriously. I thank God that it is moving ahead. I am one of those who believe in labor. I believe that an honest man is the noblest work of God, and I believe that the honest man is a laboring-man. When you get into that magnificent country you find we are developing our wheat interest, which but a few years ago in the commerce of the world was unknown, by the addition of these new implements of agriculture, the splendid plows that we have, the turning-plow, the gang-plows, and all the various other improvements in plows, the buggy-plow, and so on, and by the reaper and thrasher. We to-day send to the markets of the world seventy million bushels of wheat. What are we doing down in the South? The largest crop of cotton ever sent to market anterior to the war was 5,250,000 bales.

With the labor system entirely changed by the war, with the people of that country thrown on their own resources, and everything organized afresh, we have by energy, by enterprise, and by brain lifted up the prostrate commerce, the prostrate agriculture of that country, and to-day we send again five million bales to market. In my own State that but a few years ago was unjustly held out all through the world as made up of desperadoes, robbers, and murderers, in the last commercial year six hundred thousand bales of cotton were sent to market, and I am proud to say that the city of Galveston, in my own State, is to-day the third cotton-exporting city in the Union. That is what brain will do coupled with energy, with enterprise, and integrity, and all the improvements in agricultural implements of the day. The theory of placing commerce on a procrustean bed, cutting off its legs if it grows too large, is a theory behind the age we live in.

I am not surprised that some of the Senators who, or their predecessors, or both combined, have secured for their States these magnificent appropriations from the Federal Government, from the pockets of the whole people, should come forward now and preach economy. I remember of hearing of an old woman in a neighborhood who was a universal pest. She would borrow every neighbor's kettle in all the country. They finally became tired and worn out with her, and raised a purse and bought a kettle and presented it to her. After the old lady got to use it she said she had studied about the thing a long time, and for her part she could not see how people could do without a kettle, and she neither intended to lend nor borrow. Now my friends who have got their kettle do not want to lend or borrow; but we who are coming up from the great new West and the great new Southwest and from the rejuvenated South come forward and say to you, "Give us something in order to place us upon that great level of prosperity, progress, and development that your States have reached aided by the generosity of the American people." It is right, Mr. President, it is fair, it is democratic, if there be any truth in figures as I have shown, because you cannot find a State in any administration that has not got its appropriations for rivers within its own limits. Ah, but the theory is that on these $4,000,000 we could get along. Yes, we could get along, no doubt, and so the farmer could have got along with his old flail; he could have got along with the thrashing-floor; but he gets along far better and becomes far richer by the use of the thrasher. So it is with all things. In old times we could get along without steamboats, we could get along without railroads, we could get along without steam printing-presses, we could get along without the telegraph; but the Lord deliver me from such getting along!

I trust that I am up with the spirit of the age. I belong to that younger class of men who believe in developing the great resources of this magnificent country. I live in a State that is progressive and among a progressive people; a State which to-day may be justly termed "the empire State of the South," and in a short time will become the empire State of the Union. Give us means and facilities of commerce and we can in that State on full development produce the cotton and wool to clothe the world, the wheat for its bread, and the beef for its meat. Such is the State of Texas with its magnificent future.

Now, sir, have I asked for one solitary dollar for my State which does not come within the strictest rule of the strictest construction of the Constitution? But two appropriations for rivers have I asked for my State. Each of those rivers runs through two States, the Cypress Bayou heading in Texas, the navigation beginning in Texas and running into Louisiana; the Sabine River, the boundary line between the State of Texas and the State of Louisiana, emptying into the Gulf of Mexico. All the other appropriations I have asked for are around the Gulf coast on salt water fronting the Gulf, and according to any construction are for national enterprises. I did not ask, nor did my colleague, for the addition of one solitary dollar to what was given us by the House, because we saw—for I have seen such things before—that the effect, if not the purpose, of the amendments which were being piled on the bill in the Senate would be to destroy the bill, and thus prevent any appropriation whatever for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. MAXEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to ask him what amendments he refers to when he speaks of amendments that were piled on to the Senate bill. The only amendments that have been piled on the bill of any kind whatever, except for two or three very large works that everybody agrees to be of great importance, were in striking out items in the House bill to the number of seventy-eight. If that is going to destroy it by making it worse than it was before, I do not understand it.

Mr. MAXEY. Well, Mr. President, I do not propose to go into details in what I have to say. The RECORD, and the bill, and the amendments will show for themselves. I say that I have asked for no additional appropriation. While, as I have said, the city of Galveston is the third cotton-exporting city of the Union; while its commerce is constantly and rapidly increasing, and while there is a vital necessity for opening up the commerce of that harbor, which is the only harbor now immediately available, where all the railroads concentrate, where we can get everything in the whole State out, and where the cost to the people in lighterage by reason of obstructions needing to be removed is above $500,000 annually, yet on consultation with my colleague we agreed that we would ask for not one solitary dollar more than what the House had given us; because, although right in itself, it might endanger the bill; and so the Senate I am glad to say, and I am grateful to the Senate for so doing, restored to the bill the items which had been stricken out by the committee, but we asked not a dollar, nor was a dollar given to us, over and above what was in the bill as it came from the House.

Sir, it is said that it is proposed here to abandon the right of the Senate to amend appropriation bills. Not one thing of the kind; nothing of the sort. If the Senate in its judgment and wisdom believes the bill as it came from the House a better bill than the bill encumbered as it is with amendments, then it is their judgment, it becomes their judgment by indorsing the judgment of the House, precisely as when a bill is sent up which has passed the other House, we pass it here without amendment, the judgment of the House becomes the judgment of the Senate, and we are not simply obeying the dictates of the House.

But it is proposed to let the Chief Engineer take all this money, this $4,000,000, which the Constitution contemplates shall be distributed and apportioned where it rightfully ought to go by act of Congress, by the action of the Senate and House of Representatives; and we shut our eyes and close our ears and say to him, "We cannot determine what to do with this money; please take it and distribute it for us; put it where you think it will do the most good." Sir, I want the people's Representatives and the States' Senators to put the money down where they say it ought to go, to leave it to no man's dictation where that money shall go. I recognize as the key-note the sentiment which was uttered by the Senator who occupies the chair, [Mr. FERRY,] that the people's Representatives know better the wants of the people than the Secretary of War or the Chief Engineer of the United States Army. It may be that there are items in the bill which ought not to be there. If there are not, it is the first omnibus bill that I ever saw or heard of that did not contain items which ought not to be in it. But the question is, is the little of evil which there may be in the bill superior to the greater good which is in the bill? Does the evil outweigh the good? Where the evil may be inappreciable and the good is abounding everywhere, I say that wisdom is to take the bill notwithstanding there may be something about it that ought not to be there. Should the mariner stop his ship in mid-sea because barnacles have fastened themselves to the keel, and thereby stopped to a certain degree the progress of the ship through the waters? That would be very unwise; and yet that would be the result here.

Sir, the House of Representatives came by a vote—I have sent and got the number from the RECORD——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator cannot refer to the votes in the House on a bill pending in the Senate.

Mr. MAXEY. I will not refer to the vote of the House, but I will say that the bill comes up to us here stripped, so far as we can know, so far as we have a right to read the official RECORD which is published and placed on our table every morning—stripped of politics. I trust that is within the parliamentary rule, and that is true.

Now, sir, having an abiding faith in the integrity of the Representatives of the people; believing that those Representatives when they cast their votes hold themselves responsible to the men who sent them there; believing that they will have to give when they return an account of their stewardship; believing that the House bill as it came here is a better bill than the bill as amended; looking upon it as a bill that we can all go before the country upon, that we can all stand upon, that party capital cannot be made out of because there are too many in the same boat—believing this to be the case, and that it is a wise bill notwithstanding there may be here and there, as it is asserted, some items which ought not to be there, still upon the whole it is a good bill, and such a bill as this Senate ought to pass, and I believe should pass.

Now, Mr. President, I refer to the appropriations which have been received for my own State. Up to about three years ago the State of Texas, so far as I am able to find from the records, never received a dollar of aid in any form, shape, or manner. The city of Galveston since the war has increased from a population of 10,000 to a city of 40,000 inhabitants, the third cotton, exporting city in the Union. The city of Houston, which is——

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from Texas just stated that this was a good bill and ought to pass in his judgment. I desire to know whether the Senator refers to the bill as it came from the House or the bill as amended in committee here?

Mr. MAXEY. I referred to the bill as it came from the House. I have not touched the other branch of the question for a reason which might be drawn very easily from what I have said. I am not responsible for any of the amendments made here; and Senators who have made the amendments of course can explain them much better than I can. That branch of the case I have not touched.

I was going on to say that the city of Houston had about eight thousand inhabitants at the close of the war and to-day it has over 20,000; it is at the head of the Buffalo Bayou, which empties into Galveston Bay. The principal appropriations which have been made in Texas are for the benefit of getting commerce out and in to these two central points of the commerce of the State of Texas, and altogether there is appropriated $411,200. The entire Gulf coast of the State is twelve hundred and nine miles. We have been in the Union thirty-one years, and that is all we have received during all that time. Our State in the mean time has doubled its population since the year 1870. We must look at these facts, Mr. President, when we talk about improving. I remember that twenty years ago I traversed the State of Iowa, so very well represented by the distinguished Senator before me, [Mr. WRIGHT,] from the Mississippi River to the Missouri in an open wagon. It was difficult to find a house then where you could stay all night. I was there two years ago, and it is a magnificent State. They have kept pace with the improvements of the age, and their rivers and harbors have been liberally improved by the Government.

The improvements in the means of getting your commerce out, must keep pace with the commerce itself. Must you not have an equilibrium between commerce and the facilities of commerce? It seems to me that this is fair and reasonable. Look at the United States now, with forty-four millions of people, with its railroads going in every direction, with the Atlantic and Pacific bound together by iron ties. You can now get in a Pullman car in the city of New York and traverse the whole United States down to the city of Galveston, on the Gulf coast, or go across the continent to the Golden Gate. You can go anywhere you please by railway. Your rivers are bearing off commerce in every direction. And when you have forty-four millions of people; when art, industry, enterprise are pushing forward with nerve and energy, with skilled intellect in every direction, it does seem to me that it will not do for us to talk about what was the way fifty years ago. If we want to return to the days of the flail, let us return there; if we want to keep pace with the world as the world moves, let us move with the world.

Mr. President, I have spoken without note, but according to what I believe to be the true spirit and true theory of national enterprise; I believe that this thing of river and harbor improvement should be conducted on business principles; I believe that a good, sound business man would do precisely what the Congress of the United States is asked to do in these matters.

I do not think that the bill as it came from the House is an unreasonable bill. I do not think that it will oppress the American people. I believe it will vitalize the industries of the American people; I believe that it will open up the arteries of commerce and will increase trade, foster labor, give employment to hundreds and thousands of the unemployed, develop our resources, and add to the wealth of the country, put capital and muscle in combination with land, with machinery, with all the arts of industry, and develop our resources; and when you have got this great commerce opened up then furnish the facilities of shipping that commerce to all the ports of the world. In this way I believe, and sincerely believe, that the prosperity of the United States as a nation will be increased, the means of paying the public debt will be enlarged, and the happiness of the whole people will be forwarded. And I am sustained in these views by the action of Congress under every political party that has had control of the Government through a long series of years, running back for more than half a century.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas in quest of sectional comparison has fallen upon the State of New York. Going back fifty years for his material, he has brought to the notice of the Senate two facts; first, that during our history $7,000,000 has been devoted by Congress to improving waters within the territorial limits of that State: and, second—and this he made matter of reiteration and of weighty emphasis—that the whole nation has been taxed to pay this money for New York.

In half a century national highways, and the chief gate-ways of the nation, situated in the State of New York, have been improved, and the nation has contributed $7,000,000. Having heard the comments of the Senator on these two facts, I have some words of comment.

In the first place, standing, as New York has ever done, by the country, and upholding its honor, its power, and its credit, she has herself been a great tax-payer and contributor—whenever the "whole nation has been taxed," in the words of the Senator, New York has been a large part of the whole. Down to 1860 90 per cent. of all the revenues the General Government enjoyed from the beginning were derived from the State of New York. That period embraces some epochs and trials both in war and in peace; it embraces the epoch which ushered in the State of the Senator as a member of the Union; it embraces the cost of some wars, and among them the war fought for the annexation of Texas. I repeat again, that, from the morning of the Republic down to 1860—down to the hour when half a continent, including Texas, stood under the uplifted banners of revolt, the State of New York yielded 90 per cent. of the revenues, whether taxes, customs, excises or loans which had given the American Republic its claim to primacy among the powers of the earth.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from New York permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. MAXEY. Referring to the war which was brought on by the annexation of Texas, I would state that that war brought in the Territories of New Mexico, of Arizona, of Nevada, of Colorado, and of Utah, and the great State of California; and the gold mines of California alone have yielded over $2,000,000,000 of gold, to say nothing of the silver of Nevada, and that the annual income resulting from the improvement opened up by the annexation of Texas and the various countries brought in as a consequence would pay the debt created by the Mexican war.

Mr. CONKLING. Let me complete the picture for the honorable Senator. It brought into the coffers of the State of Texas also $10,000,000, of which New York and every other State paid its quota, as consideration for the release of a title the validity of which I forbear to pronounce upon.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator will pardon me. I will say that during the day the illustrious Rusk, my lamented predecessor, represented the State of Texas on this floor, the true boundary-line between the United States and Mexico was disputed, and consequently between Texas and New Mexico, and it was settled here by a solemn vote of this body, and $10,000,000 was paid for the release by Texas of her claim to New Mexico, which I assume to be a just and honest claim, or it would not have been granted.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, when the volume is closed, the student who explores the facts will in vain look for the ground on which the State of Texas may taunt the State of New York with the appropriations made to improve the national channels of commerce and trade.

Mr. MAXEY. I trust the Senator will pardon me; I dislike very much to interrupt him; but I will say to the Senator that so far from taunting her, if he will look to the RECORD, when the committee of the Senate asked an increase of appropriation to improve your harbor at Hell Gate, looking, as I do, upon your great city of New York as the commercial metropolis not only of the American Union but of the Western Hemisphere, I voted for it. I do not wish to detract in the slightest possible degree, and I stated this morning that I had no complaint to make of those improvements, that the interest of commerce demanded them, or otherwise, I presumed, they would not have been granted; but New York had been thus improved, and from that I deduced that others should be also.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I think I did not misapprehend the Senator. My colleague made some observations, wholesome as they seemed to me, and he was met by the honorable Senator from Texas with several comments and one story. An anecdote was told about a woman who having obtained her kettle at the expense of other people, said at once that she would neither lend or borrow; and the illustration was transferred to one or both Senators from New York who disapprove the pending bill as it came from the House. The State of New York was cited in illustration of the alleged unfairness of those who having profited by appropriations, hesitate to vote these proposed appropriations. I rose to examine the allegation touching past appropriations for rivers and harbors in New York, and the further allegation that the whole nation has been taxed that New York might receive these contributions. The taxes paid by New York prior to 1860, I have referred to, and I now speak of the truth since. While the income tax existed—a war tax, brought on by the rebellion—New York, with one-tenth of the population, paid more than one-third of the entire tax. New York, with one-tenth or one-eleventh of the population, yields to the General Government now nearly, if not quite, one-third of the entire present revenues. Sixty-odd per cent. of customs duties are collected at the port of New York, and a proportion of the internal revenue of which I do not stop to speak exactly, making in all a total of well-nigh one-third, to speak within limits, of the entire revenue which supports the Government.

These facts will determine the weight and value of the statement that the whole nation has been taxed for the improvements of New York and her harbors. Of taxes, New York has had the lion's share to pay, wherever or however the taxes have been expended.

Now a few words about the $7,000,000, and where it has gone. The figures will show that nearly one-half the sum has been bestowed upon three works. What are they? Hell Gate, as it is called, rocks lying in the throat of Long Island Sound, hidden rocks endangering all the coastwise trade of the nation, lying in the pathway of all the boats passing up and down the Atlantic coast through a great and crowded strait within the geographical limits of the State of New York; a work no more local in New York than the winds which sweep her plains, or the waves that wash her shores.

What is the next work? Improving the Hudson River; that river flowing in a valley which together with the Mohawk was decreed by nature to be the carrying-place to the markets of the world from the granaries of the West—from that great basin, between the two watersheds, two thousand miles long and fourteen hundred miles wide, blessed with fertility capable of feeding the world. Between the prairies and tide-water there can be no such northern route; it has been impaired by rival powers, but it remains the great carrying-place for the cereals and products of the West. Canada by building the Welland Canal, by so adjusting ocean toll-sheets that English bottoms from Montreal, Halifax, and elsewhere, may just underbid American bottoms, has somewhat impaired this route; other causes have produced like effects, but the Hudson River and its continuation, the Erie Canal, have long floated, and still float a commerce far greater than that on the river Rhine, traversing, as it does, seven sovereignties in the heart of Europe. It was to preserve and enlarge this channel, running to the wheat-fields of the West that about a million dollars during half a century have been appropriated.

What is the third work which the table of the Senator will speak of? The harbor of Buffalo; the harbor at the east end of Lake Erie; that harbor which land-locks and protects not the propellers of New York, not the barges or the craft of New York but the vessels and cargoes of Wisconsin, Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, and every other State whose capital is embarked on the great lakes. The products of every wheat-field, mine, forest, and pasture west of the city of Buffalo, seeking movement to tide-water, are protected and kept in safety by the harbor of Buffalo.

These three works, Mr. President, constitute about one-half—I speak from recollection—of the table which the industry of the honorable Senator has produced. If in viewing them, if in contemplating the history and the facts, Senators can discover an argument in favor of dredging a creek in the hope of obtaining twenty inches of water, and helping out the cord-wood or saw-logs of a little neighborhood, so be it. If the Senate can see the analogy between these works and improvements made on little inland streams wholly within States and even single counties—streams which the Supreme Court has decided are not national highways, are not public navigable rivers, but which lie wholly within the domain and jurisdiction of the States,—streams which the States may bridge, or dam, or divert—streams belonging to riparian owners, so be it. I think it will puzzle the honorable Senator from Texas to vindicate the provisions of the House bill in various of its provisions, by finding that in the greatest harbor of the country, and in the track of the greatest commerce of the hemisphere it has been found wise, in the estimation of Congress, regarding the general welfare, to bestow appropriations upon indispensable works.

Mr. President, I have no doubt of the power of Congress to appropriate money to improve navigable rivers; they are the public highways,—and harbors; they are the national gate-ways. I have no doubt of the wisdom of exerting that power, and I would go a great way, believing I should keep within the agency with which New York honors me were I to go a great way in voting for these improvements. But, sir, from comparatively small beginnings we have grown to great abuses. Prior to the war these appropriations, as other Senators have said, were very limited. In 1869 they had reached $2,000,000; in 1870 they amounted to $3,745,900; in 1871 $4,408,000; in 1872 $5,602,000; in 1873 $6,287,900; in 1874 $5,248,000; in 1875 $6,662,000. How comes this? The vice is in the process; and if the members of this body would address themselves to that process, legislation of this nature would be corrected.

Let me state the method which begets these bills.

In the first place, upon almost any application a survey is ordered by law. When once a survey is made, the Government is like a man who puts his fingers between the belt and the wheel; his hand, and then his arm, will be drawn in, and so will he. The survey having been made, estimates follow. That is the natural, intended, and inevitable result. The work is found to be feasible, and the engineers state how much it will cost. This year these surveys and estimates brought to us amount to $14,000,000. Then what happens? Everybody must see that all the estimates cannot be adopted and the money appropriated. There must be picking and choosing, and somebody must pick and choose. How is that done? Members in each House, members from localities where for any motive—and I will not deal in motives—there is a strong disposition to obtain an expenditure of money, members in the House, members in the Senate, members in committee join a strife and competition for two purposes, first to get that which they want, and second by a process, sometimes called "log-rolling," to combine enough that others want to give legs and wings to the bill; and we have the product of such methods in the bill before us. I am going, notwithstanding an admonition given another Senator from the Chair, to say, and I speak with a belief that I violate no rule, that this House bill passed without one word of debate. That is not out of order. I say the bill passed under the previous question, without any amendment being allowed, and I hold up the Manual of parliamentary law when I deny that such a statement is out of order. I say this bill, like the three or four preceding river and harbor bills, was made up, as we know,—and I speak of no proceedings in the House,—by a subcommittee; made up by a subcommittee of two or three or perhaps four men; passed as so made up through the Committee on Commerce; and was carried into the House where the previous question operates, if I may borrow the words of Mr. Webster, with the precision of a trip-hammer and somewhat of its monotony. Now, sir, I repeat, all this is not out of order, and it is true. And thus we have in this case and in other cases a survey and estimate for all manner of things with a total of fourteen millions; then two or three gentlemen sit down and pick and choose from that fourteen million the items for which a vote shall be asked, these items are located here and there, perhaps for reasons distilled from the pure alembic of judgment, perhaps for reasons concerning the commerce of the country and that only, and perhaps for reasons which have nothing to do with the ostensible objects of the bill. Being passed through the House as it is presented, without discussion, without amendment, without debate, without the possibility of understanding, it comes here. It has been by two committees of the Senate the subject of careful consideration. The Committee on Commerce, as more than one Senator near me knows, devoted night after night to its provisions, and days to the ugly puzzles they presented; and then, because by the order of the Senate so many members of that committee were sent to a distant State that it was long without a quorum, the bill was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Appropriations examined it with great care and came here with various recommendations, recommendations of two sorts, first that a large number of these appropriations, not less than seventy-eight in number, ought not per se to be granted; and, second, recommendations showing that if the amount of money is to be expended it should not be expended on the appropriations designated by the House, but upon others instead. Four days when this day is completed will have been devoted by the Senate to these amendments; and now we are told by our honorable presiding officer, who avowedly speaks for Michigan, who does not blink the idea that a river and harbor bill is what the children call a grab-bag into which everybody is to plunge and get what he can, who does not blink the doctrine

> That they should take who have the power,
> And they should keep who can;

that the House bill is the true solution of the whole problem.

He calls on "the friends of the bill," as he denominates them, to rally each for his locality and his interest and do—what? Discard by one single understanding all the amendments adopted by the Senate, adopt by one single understanding all the propositions made by the House, incurably vicious as some of them are conceded to be, and accept as an ultimate product of perfected legislation the schedule made by two or three members of the House who sat down and selected from $14,000,000 $5,872,000. Mr. President, what a comment is this upon those infirm processes of legislation of which Thomas Jefferson wrote! What a comment it is upon his cup-and-saucer illustration—his saying that the two Houses, one like a cup in which the tea might be too hot, and the other the saucer which would cool it, together would produce healthful temperature! After all the ado of legislative action, after all the action of two committees of this body and four days given in the dying hours of this session to a consideration of the bill, we are conjured to go back and accept the work, necessarily crude, done by two or three members of the House, which received in bulk as matter of little more than form the imprimatur of a House by which it never was considered.

This would indeed be a lame and impotent conclusion.

Dropping now all discussion of this particular bill and its oddities if oddities it has, I venture to make one general observation. I assume from the response which some of us saw and from the other response which we all heard to the hailing cry of the presiding officer, "that the friends of the bill," not only the dwellers in the valleys but in the hill country round about on every side who have little pet interests or large objects of concern in this bill are to come up, not with a chorus but with a vote each, to reject, good, bad, and indifferent, all the Senate amendments and adopt, good, bad, or indifferent all the items put in by the committee of the House, and so to pass the bill. The motives for this are so obvious that one of them would teach me its probability. If the bill should be amended at all, it would go back to the House, and going back to the House no man knoweth that the previous question would prevent one lisp of explanation or even the reading of the bill, and for aught we know if it were committed to the wild winds and waves of the House it might be read aloud in the hearing of the members—nay or it might be amended; and remembering the zeal which attends it, all this would be too slow. I assume that the dwellers in Mesopotamia, and in Sandusky; that the democrats of the strictest sect, especially the Jeffersonian democrats, the strictest constructionists of the Constitution, the democrats who believe that States ought to carry on State works, that the State of New York illustrated the Constitution when she expended many millions of her own to make an artificial river three hundred and thirty-five miles long and seven feet deep, held in artificial banks, a river carried over steams by aqueducts and through mountains by excavations, and other artificial rivers in all twelve hundred miles long; all the democrats who approve of a construction of the Constitution which commits wholly to States the exertion of such powers, will perhaps make haste, and see which shall be the first in flinging down his representative crown before an opportunity to gain a local appropriation. We shall see when the yeas and nays are recorded. It has been said that it is an ill wind that blows nobody any good. The process and habit of river and harbor legislation is radically wrong. In this bill stand appropriations for which no Senator would answer. In this bill stand appropriations to be expended in localities which no member of this body knows. In this bill are appropriations for the smaller States at places the location of which neither of the Senators from those States knows; the name of which we never heard, and which are not found in Colton's atlas, or in any gazetteer we are told. I rest a remark on these facts.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Does the Senator refer to the port in Michigan called McCargoe's Cove?

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator think I referred to that?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. If that is what the Senator refers to, I can give him the information.

Mr. CONKLING. I have so much more confidence in my friend than I have in myself that I leave it to him to say whether that is one of the places.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I heard the remark made.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, this bill is brought forward at a time when we are told prosperity lies bleeding in the streets, when we are told that every branch of industry is languishing and that the people are bowed down under a weight of taxation, under a crush of public burdens which no patriotism can support.

I think the presence and success of such a bill at such a time, will make and leave an impression. I hope that some of the able members of the House, and the Senate—those whose lead we follow—will consider whether there should not be some substitute for this random inexact method, a commission, if you please, of men expert in such affairs, and above all things responsible for their plans, and acts, and recommendations, men to inquire and ascertain and determine and certify on their oaths a definite projet, a budget, each year for public improvements to be submitted to Congress; the matter to be so guarded that like any other board, or commission, or special tribunal, it will be responsible, to the end that appropriations for rivers and harbors may not be, as has been said of foreign mission donations, the application of a dollar to an object and the expenditure of $5 in the process of applying it. I believe some such expedient should be substituted for all this. I believe that this very bill at this time, if Senators and others are sincere in the appreciation they say they have of the general poverty and distress, will be considered an era in this species of legislation, an occasion to which thought should be given, and which action should follow.

Mr. President, this bill appropriates many items, making up a large aggregate, which ought not to be appropriated, sometimes because the amount is wholly inadequate; sometimes because it is entirely inopportune now, owing to the condition of the work; sometimes because it is entirely needless and will be improvident in the end at any time; and this money if it shall buy anything of value to the country, will purchase attention to this subject, and to the vice of this kind of legislation. If its expenditure does not do that, it will be wasted indeed.

One word more and I have done. I believe it to be the duty of the House of Representatives and of the Senate to scrutinize this bill and every other, to reduce to the lowest sum, compatible with the public interest and the considerations honestly involved, the amount of money to be appropriated. In so far as any member of this body, in so far as any Department of this Government, legislative or otherwise, has striven to do that, no man has heard, no man will ever hear me charge him or charge it with revolution, with usurpation, with repudiation. I do not believe honest retrenchment to be blamable anywhere. I believe that if the House of Representatives say "We will not appropriate needed money unless you will agree to repeal the resumption act; we will not appropriate money unless you agree to repeal the election law; we will not appropriate money unless you agree to transplant the Indian service from the Interior Department to the War Office, or unless you will agree to do some other matter independent of appropriations and concerning existing law"—if the House shall do these things or any of them, I believe the Senate has a right to do all things of rightful resistance, and then, like the apostle, stand. But when the question touches the improvemeunt of a harbor, or the amount that should be paid for any service, graduating the sum which shall be received by an individual or a corporation under an appropriation bill, I believe it to be fair matter of legislation, of consideration, and of action in one House and in both Houses; and in so far as the Senate under the lead of conference committees has consented to the reduction of appropriations where those reductions could be properly, safely, suitably made, I believe they have done service to the country and that the Senate has done service in following their lead. In what cases these reductions will turn out to have been wise and safe, and in what cases unwise, I do not know. I make no observation upon it; I am speaking merely of a principle, and I speak of it to ask Senators, to ask Senators especially on the side of the Chamber which just now specially affects a heroic and I might say spasmodic virtue on the subject of retrenchment and economy, how they can reconcile it to themselves in this era of scrutiny and care, to vote for a bill which confessedly—yes, confessedly—contains appropriations unjustifiable at any time, improper ever to be made according to the report of the engineers, according to the admission of the Senators from the State in which the work is to be situated, a bill which contains appropriations improvident, unnecessary, unfit, wrong at any time—how they can reconcile it to their new evangel of economy, retrenchment, and improvement, to swallow such a bill whole, to take it "with all its imperfections on its head" as it emanated from a subcommittee and received the stereotyped imprimatur of the previous question without amendment or debate. No, Mr. President, if there is any sincerity in the idea that appropriations shall be reduced, I ask Senators to observe that sincerity in dealing with a bill, some parts of which no Senator has risen to justify.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I shall not follow Senators in the very discursive debate that has occurred this morning on this bill. I shall endeavor to be very brief in what I shall say, and confine myself to what really, in my judgment, demands the earnest attention of the Senate. First, however, let me dispose of a little matter preliminary. Last Saturday afternoon I find by the RECORD—for I did not happen to be in the Senate at the time the words were spoken—the Senator from Iowa who has this bill in charge [Mr. ALLISON] addressed an argumentum ad hominem to me in these words:

> When this bill came back into the Senate every item of appropriation struck out by the Committee on Appropriations was re-inserted in the bill, and the Senator from Ohio who now favors a reduction of the total appropriation to $4,000,000 voted for the increase of every appropriation in his own State above the recommendation of the committee, and notably so in two instances where the engineer officer in charge of the very work stated to us that the amount suggested by the committee was sufficient to carry on that improvement for the present year.

I do not know what are the two instances alluded to by the Senator from Iowa, but this I do know, that in every case the appropriation I advocated was far less than the estimate of the engineer.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Ohio, if I remember correctly, advocated the appropriation of $30,000 for Sandusky Harbor and $75,000 for Cleveland Harbor. The Committee on Appropriations recommended $25,000 for Sandusky Harbor and $50,000 for Cleveland Harbor, and did so on the recommendation of the engineer in charge of each of those particular works that he could get along with that sum; and therefore I said that inasmuch as the Senator from Ohio had increased the appropriations in this bill as they came from the Committee on Appropriations, to that extent he was responsible for the increase of this bill. That is all I meant to say.

Mr. THURMAN. That will be responsible to the amount of $30,000. I can stand that pretty well.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If you are not obliged to pay it yourself, but pay it by taxation.

Mr. THURMAN. O, yes; we shall see about that. What did I say about Sandusky? Let me see.

> There is a very small difference between the House bill and the proposition of our committee, $5,000. I wish to say that I have a personal knowledge of the harbor at Sandusky City, and I know of no harbor that requires an appropriation much more than that harbor It is one of the most tortuous channels that I know of on Lake Erie into the port, and my own impression is that $30,000 is a small appropriation. I do not, however, want to call any yeas or nays upon it or make any division. I should be glad if the appropriation should be left for Sandusky as the bill came from the House. It is a matter too small, however, for much contest.

I think that was rather modestly put, and the whole amount of difference was $5,000, and the amount in the House bill was far less than the estimate of the engineer. Of course the engineer said he could get along with $25,000. He might have said he could get along with $2,500. Then in regard to Cleveland the engineer estimated $200,000, and the House gave $75,000. Our committee cut it down to $50,000, one-fourth of the estimate of the engineer, and why? Because the engineer said he could get along with $50,000; and what I have just said will apply to that: he could get along with $5,000, I suppose. So that in no case have I advocated any appropriation up to or equal to the estimates made by the engineers; indeed, far less than the estimates.

Well, Mr. President, the appropriations made for Ohio in this bill are very small. I do not complain of that. They were small even in the House bill. Retaining the House bill, they will be still small for Ohio. I do not complain of it. I do not ask to increase any amount that was in the House bill. Nay, more, if my motion shall prevail and there are more meritorious works than those in Ohio, and it is necessary to reject works in Ohio in order to cut the bill down to four millions, I say now to my friend, cut down the Ohio appropriation; take only those that are most meritorious, for which there is the greatest necessity. Do it if you can; but I think you will find some trouble in selecting a more meritorious work or one of more national importance than the harbor at Cleveland, or one that deserves better than the harbor at Sandusky. I think it will be found a little difficult to discover any more meritorious appropriations than these. But I say again, let every appropriation stand on its own merits, and if there are places that are more deserving of appropriations than those of Ohio named in this bill, and it is necessary to reject in order to get down to four millions, then I say reject those in my State.

I am quite in earnest about this matter, Mr. President. This bill is a monstrous bill, in my humble judgment, as it now stands. I say nothing about motives; I say nothing about the history of the bill; but I say right on the face of the bill itself, the idea of appropriating in round numbers $7,000,000 for river and harbor improvements at this time is to my mind a monstrous proposition. I know very well that in the eloquent speech that we heard from the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] this morning very much was said about the fruits that we were to reap from the seed that was to be sown by this bill; but before I take any notice of that let me notice another thing that was said by that Senator.

He called our attention to the fact that in fifty-one years the appropriations for ports in Ohio amounted to $2,000,000—$2,000,000 in fifty-one years. Well, sir, let me tell the Senator that one single county in my State pays four times that amount of internal-revenue tax in a single year; let me tell him that the State of Ohio has paid within the last nine years $200,000,000 of revenue tax alone; and let him then ask himself whether or not that State is not entitled to some care of her ports and her harbors.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator permit me a word?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MAXEY. I am not disposed to detract from the State of Ohio; very far from it. I admit the greatness of that State, its growing and increasing prosperity; but the point I make is that these very appropriations to the amount of over $2,000,000 which they have received from the Government have aided them in developing the wealth of that country; and that we, the undeveloped West and the undeveloped Southwest, want also that which he has received, so that we may be great and prosperous, and have one country to pay this great tax.

Mr. THURMAN. Beyond all question these improvements have been of service, otherwise they ought not to have been made; but in the face of the facts I have stated—and I have said not a word about the amount of the customs duties that Ohio pays, which will amount to about $20,000,000 a year, estimating it upon her population, or nearly that—certainly it must be admitted that the Government has not been lavish with the State of Ohio.

Again, I said in the remarks I submitted last Saturday that Ohio; never had asked for an improvement of a river wholly within her borders. The Senator calls my attention, in answer to that, to a document which he produces, and he reads from it: "For the improvement of Cunningham Creek." Why, does the Senator know what Cunningham Creek is that is here spoken of? Does he know that it is a port right on Lake Erie, not the improvement of a stream wholly within the boundaries of the State of Ohio for navigation along that stream, but the improvement of a port?

Mr. MAXEY. There may be a misapprehension of language. I never did understand a creek to be a port.

Mr. THURMAN. I will show the Senator another case right here, and I can show him plenty. The Chicago River at Chicago is improved in the same way, because it is part of the harbor; and the same is true of the East River and the North River at New York. Take the other case which he cited, "Sandusky River, Ohio, $30,000." The river to which that appropriation applies is just as much a part of the port, and any part of the bay of Sandusky is a part of the port. If the Senator had been there and gone up that stream he would have found that he would go but little way until the river falls over a ledge of rocks; and it is only that deep part below the ledge of rocks and within the city of Sandusky, and forming a part of its port as much as the East River between Brooklyn and New York is part of the port of New York, that is covered by this appropriation. I am glad the Senator has produced this report; and it affirms the truth of what I stated, that for the improvement of any river or stream, not a port, but for the navigation of a river or stream lying wholly within the boundaries of the State of Ohio not one dollar ever was appropriated by the General Government.

Now, Mr. President, having disposed of those matters which are preliminary, I have only a few words to say upon the subject of this bill, for I do not believe that any great good is to be derived from debate. I am not going to follow the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] who made somewhat of a partisan speech this morning; but I do commend what he said to the consideration of my democratic friends on this floor, for if this bill passes you will hear much more of the same sort between now and November next, and I think you will deserve to hear it, too.

Mr. MERRIMON. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MERRIMON. The bill as it came from the House is a retrenchment bill. It appropriates in the neighborhood of a million dollars less than the bill of last year.

Mr. THURMAN. I am speaking of the bill as it now is.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I have not been here during the discussion of this bill; but I am advised by those who have been that the Senate amendments striking out certain parts of the House bill were voted down by both parties here, and largely by my democratic friends; and that the additions which have been made to this bill in the Senate have been largely made by the votes of the democratic members of this body. In other words, they were made by the votes of all parties; so that this bill as it stands here to-day is as much the bill of the democratic members of this body as any other portion of the Senate; and if that is so, that is an end to the talk about retrenchment.

Mr. MERRIMON. But it is the bill of the Senate; and the bill of a republican Senate at that.

Mr. THURMAN. Both gentlemen are right, no doubt. This bill breaks over all party lines; that is the truth about it. It is stronger than the resolutions of 1798 by a long way; that is perfectly clear; and it is stronger than any interpretation of the Constitution that ever was given by the most latitudinarian man who ever held a seat on this floor. That is true, too. It breaks through everything. It is like a great freshet that carries everything before it, blots out all lines, scatters desolation everywhere.

But, Mr. President, one word more about this bill. I believe that we cannot afford to appropriate more than $4,000,000. I do not think we ought in the circumstance of the case to do that. The Senator from Texas says we have 44,000,000 people, and I often hear the expression that we have boundless resources; and yet we hear every day people talking about a million or a million and a half of men in this country being without employment. Why, sir, there is a country that has more than 200,000,000 people under one government, and yet we would not set them up as an example to be followed, nor do we envy their condition or the condition of the laboring-men in that country. There never was a greater fallacy in this world than to advocate extravagance, whether it be extravagance in private life, extravagance of municipal governments, extravagance of State governments, or extravagance of the Federal Government, under the idea that the people of this country have boundless resources. No, sir; they have not boundless resources. The resources of no people are boundless, and there never were a people so rich that extravagance might not bring them down to poverty. That argument will not do.

A word now as to the proposition of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] which I foresee is to antagonize a recommitment of this bill. Although there is an example of it, a precedent for it, I do think that it is not a good way to appropriate money.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator says there is a precedent for it. Is not the Senator aware that for the first ten or fifteen years of this Republic, in its pure days, the appropriations were almost all of them made in that way for the foreign service and for the internal service and so on?

Mr. THURMAN. I do not think there was a river and harbor bill in the first fourteen or fifteen years.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There was what came exceedingly near it, if the Senator will look at the statutes.

Mr. THURMAN. It was so small that you would not recognize it as the progenitor of this bill which is before us.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You would on the Darwinian theory.

Mr. THURMAN. Who would say that we should make appropriation of $20,000,000, and place it in the hands of the Secretary of War, to conduct the military affairs of the country and pay the expenses of the Army? Who would say that we should do the same thing for the Navy or any of the other Departments? The truth is, we were accustomed a few years ago, and I remember very well that the Senator from Vermont helped to correct it and I had a little, humble part in helping to correct it, to group together nearly all the objects of naval appropriations in a bill a page long or two pages long and then appropriate so many millions in bulk, leaving it absolutely in the discretion of the Secretary whether he would apply a cent to one object or appropriate all to another object. That was a very vicious way. The Senator from Vermont opposed it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So I did; but if the Senator can show that the cases are parallel there will be something in his point.

Mr. THURMAN. I think they are parallel. I do not think that mode of appropriation or this mode of appropriation is according to the spirit of the Constitution, which requires that no moneys shall be drawn from the Treasury except upon appropriations made by law, which means that we are to exercise our judgment as to the objects for which money is to be spent. At all events, Mr. President, whether that is the case or not, it does seem to me that that ought to be only the last possible resort, and that we ought not, unless all other means fail, to vest so great a discretion as the expenditure of $4,000,000 in one man, and he a political officer, with power to use what objects he will foster and what objects he will give nothing to. Just look at it. You put this $4,000,000 into the hands of the Secretary of War; he may expend as much as he pleases upon one object or as little as he pleases. He can select just where he pleases and reject just what he pleases. I do not know, with the single exception of the precedent read by the Senator from Vermont the other day, of any such thing in the history of the Government, always excepting the naval appropriation bills of which I spoke a while ago. I think that was an abuse. I opposed it. It has been to a great extent corrected, and I do not like the idea now of setting a worse and looser precedent than even that.

I hope, therefore, that this bill will be recommitted, and recommitted with the instructions; and while the Senator from Michigan, the President of the Senate, warned the friends of this bill that they must rally to its support, I say to them in perfect good faith, you are in danger of losing everything by asking too much.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of replying to anything that has been said by the Senator from Ohio or anything that has been said in the discussion of this bill particularly, but to give in a very brief manner my judgment in reference to the bill and my views in regard to this character of legislation.

There has been something said here this morning in reference to remarks of a partisan character. I have nothing to say in reference to that except to call the attention of the country to some of the provisions of this bill and some of the omissions in other bills. When I hear the sound in all directions of reform and economy and assaults made, too, upon this and former administrations and upon the party that has been in power on account of its extravagance, which extravagance, if that is a proper term, was produced certainly not by its own conduct but by the conduct of others, this bill as it is strikes me as a very strange kind of economy. From the arguments and speeches made this winter in both Houses of Congress, I had begun to think that the object of legislation this session, so far as appropriation is concerned, is to appropriate money, especially on bills of this character, for such points or places as work was absolutely demanded on and money absolutely demanded to be expended upon, and that other places, rivers, harbors, creeks, spring branches, or whatever they might be termed, certainly were not to be incorporated in this bill at this particular time, especially by the economists of this country.

Before referring in detail to this particular bill, I want to call the attention of the Senate, and especially of the Senators on my left, to a proposition that was made in the House and the Senate. A letter was written by William A. Potter, Supervising Architect of the United States, to the House of Representatives, in which he says, prior to the passage of the sundry civil bill:

> TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
> June 14, 1876.
> I have to inform you that the amount, $250,000, included in the "estimate of appropriations required for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877," is absolutely necessary to be appropriated for the proper and economical continuation of the work upon the construction of the United States custom-house, court-house, and post-office at Chicago, Illinois. With this sum made available, in addition to the balance now in the Treasury, I feel confident of being able to place the roof upon the building and protect the work from the severities of the coming winter season, and advance the entire work during that season to such a point as will enable me to fit the building for the accommodation of the Post-Office Department on or before the 4th of July, 1877. I cannot urge too strongly the making of this appropriation, the necessity for which is apparent from the fact that the public offices in Chicago are now located in buildings totally unsuited to their wants, and for which enormous rentals are paid annually. The work upon the new building has been delayed by a series of events unequaled in the construction of any building under the direction of this Office, and its completion at an early day is not only a necessity to supply the demands of the public service, but will result in a large saving to the Government from rentals and furnish proper facilities for the citizens of Chicago.
> Very respectfully,
>
> WM. A. POTTER,
> Supervising Architect.

I read that to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Supervising Architect held that it was absolutely necessary that a certain amount of money should be appropriated for the purpose of roofing in certain buildings in Chicago belonging to the Government in order to protect them against the inclemency of the winter season. The House of Representatives absolutely refused to appropriate one cent. When that bill came to the Senate, the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate did appropriate the $250,000 for the purpose of preserving those buildings absolutely necessary, as recommended by the Supervising Architect; and in a committee of conference, of which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] was one on the part of the Senate, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] another, and I do not remember the third member, the House absolutely demanded that that appropriation should be stricken out, and the Senate agreed to it, leaving the public buildings in the city of Chicago without being covered in, to be exposed to the weather during the winter season; and this was done by the House committee on the ground that economy demanded that it must be done. That very same Congress that is so economical that it cannot appropriate money to cover in buildings the roofing of which is recommended as being absolutely necessary, can appropriate over $1,000,000 for surveying creeks and spring branches and hollows, and places where water never runs except when it rains, for political purposes all over this land. That is the character of economy that we have now. That is the kind of reform that we have. The Government is to let buildings be destroyed that absolutely need appropriations for their protection, and the money of the country is to be squandered for the purpose of electing somebody to Congress.

Now, in order to make this thing plain, so that we may all understand it, I want to call attention, and I propose in my feeble manner to defend somewhat the Committee on Appropriations in the Senate for what they have done on this bill, and I want Senators as I go along in the different States where these appropriations are made, if they desire to do it, to explain something about the character of these rivers and harbors that the House feel such a great interest in having surveyed and having money expended upon; and I desire to call the attention of the country especially to the location of these particular appropriations. First, beginning on line 142:

> For the improvement of the French Bread River between Brevard and the Buncombe County line, North Carolina, $15,000.
> For the improvement of Pamlico River, North Carolina, $25,000.
> For the improvement of Clinch River, Tennessee, $12,000.
> For the improvement of the Hiawassee River, Tennessee, $10,000.
> For the improvement of the Powell River, Virginia and Tennessee, $10,600.
> For the improvement of Cumberland River below the city of Nashville, Tennessee.

"Above" the House had it:

> From Nashville to the Kentucky line, $25,000, and thence to the foot of Smith's Shoals, $20,000; and for Smith's Shoals, $30,000.

While the House of Representatives will not appropriate money to cover in public buildings that are absolutely going to loss, they appropriate thousands of dollars in certain localities where there is no necessity, in my judgment, in many instances for it. For what purpose? I will not say for political purposes, but somehow or other, singularly it strikes democratic districts every time:

> For the improvement at Sabine Pass, and for improvement of Blue Buck Bar and Sabine Bay, and for deepening the channel over the bar at the mouth of the Sabine River, and for deepening of the channel over the bar at the mouth of Neches River, where these rivers enter Sabine Bay, $60,000.

All these propositions that I have read were put in by the House and stricken out by the Senate Committee on Appropriations and reinstated by the Senate over the head of the committee, and I notice, too, by a solid vote on the left of this Chamber, aided by a few gentlemen on the right, the balance of this side necessary to make a majority being absent.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to correct the Senator. I voted to sustain all the amendments of the Senate committee. I did vote for one amendment for the State of Maryland, an appropriation of $5,000 for Wicomico River, and really apologized to the Senate for doing that.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. We will make the Senator from Delaware an exception. I did not notice that he sustained the committee, but a single exception is immaterial. The Senate did not sustain the committee. I am only comparing this appropriation bill with what the House and Senate did for the public buildings in the city where I live, not appropriating one dollar when it was recommended by the Department, the estimates made for it, and when the Supervising Architect said it was absolutely necessary. In that case the necessity for economy and reform was so strong that no appropriation was made where it was necessary, but in these instances appropriations are made. I leave the country to draw the inference:

> For deepening the channel over the bar at the mouth of the Trinity River where it enters Galveston Bay, $12,500.

That was stricken out by the Appropriation Committee of the Senate and re-instated by the Senate.

> For the improvement of Pass Cavallo, inlet to Matagorda Bay, Texas, $40,000.
> For the improvement of Aransas Pass, and approaches to Rockport and Corpus Christi Harbors, Texas, $10,000.
> * * * * * * *
> For the improvement of the Tombigbee River, Alabama, $13,950.
> * * * * * * *
> For breakwater at Wilmington, California, $30,000.

These appropriations were all stricken out by the Senate committee and re-instated by the Senate.

> For the improvement of Mackey's Ferry, North Carolina, $3,000.
> * * * * * * *
> For the improvement of Pascagoula Bay, Mississippi, $10,000.
> For the improvement of White and Saint Francis Rivers, Arkansas, $15,000; of which there shall be expended $10,000 upon White River and the remainder upon Saint Francis River.
> For the improvement of the Perquimons River, North Carolina, $3,000.
> * * * * * * *
> For the improvement of the Rock Castle River, Kentucky, $2,000; and, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, to be expended on Cumberland and Rock Castle Rivers above Nashville, Tennessee, $25,000.

* * * * * * *

For the improvement of the Ocmulgee River, Gergia, $25,000.
For the improvement of the port of Darien, Georgia, $5,000.
For the improvement of New River from the lead-mines in Wythe County, Virginia, to the mouth of Greenbrier River, West Virginia, $25,000.
For the improvement of the Mattapony River, Virginia, $10,000.
For the improvement of the Pamunkey River, Virginia, $6,000.

* * * * * * *

For the improvement of the Warrior and Tombigbee River, Alabama, $15,000.
For the improvement of the Choctawhatchie River, Florida and Alabama, $5,000.
For the improvement of the Apalachicola River, Florida, $5,000.
For removing obstructions and deepening channel at the Pass of Brazos Santiago, Texas, $10,000.

* * * * * * *

For the improvement of the French Broad River in Tennessee, $15,000.

* * * * * * *

For the improvement of the Wicomico River, Maryland, $5,000.
For the improvement of Big Sandy River, Kentucky and West Virginia, $25,000.

The Senate will notice there are a great many other propositions that were stricken out also by the Appropriation Committee of the Senate. The Senate will also notice, and the country will notice, too, that the Appropriation Committee of the Senate struck all these appropriations out of the bill. Why? Because they considered them of no utility at the present time, or else because they considered the economy that had been so much talked about of so great necessity that they did not wish to allow these amounts to be appropriated; but in the economy of the Senate the body has re-appropriated until the bill is swelled to such a character that no one now desires to own it.

The bill as it came from the House of Representatives has been denominated by both republicans and democrats as monstrous. I have but little to say in reference to it, and what I shall say will be couched in a very few sentences. Senators and Representatives preach economy to this country for a purpose, the effect of which has been to cripple the Army of the country, to cripple the Navy of the country, to cripple the diplomatic service of the country, to cripple the civil service of the country. The purpose has been to go before the country and claim that they have produced economy by legislation in these halls, and then by one fell swoop on a river and harbor bill they pile on millions of dollars that are of no use whatever, of no benefit to anybody except to certain districts of the country, out of which political capital can be made.

Senators may not believe this, but I believe it. I am constrained to believe it when I take the different districts and localities for which this money has been appropriated by the House of Representatives. It is our duty to appropriate money for all the service of this country, every dollar that is necessary, and not one cent more, but not to strangle, stifle, or cripple any of the service, either civil or naval or military. I will go as far as any man to do that; but when it becomes a political jobbery in legislation, drawing a veil over the eyes of the people, I do not believe in any such economy. Appropriate as much money as is necessary for the Army, the Navy, and the civil service, and if you can demonstrate a necessity for a reduction in that way, make the demonstration to the country and satisfy them that you are honest in what you attempt to do; but when you attempt to make that demonstration and then upon a bill like this scatter the money of the Treasury all around the country where it is not necessary for any purpose whatever, except political purposes, I say the people of the United States are too intelligent to be hoodwinked in any such manner. It only is an evidence that men can cry economy when they themselves thrust their hands into the Treasury up to their arm-pits and rob the people of this country and distribute the money for political purposes where it is not needed. It demonstrates that fact, and demonstrates it clearly. They cry economy before the country and demonstrate that they are in favor of economy by crippling the Army because they may dislike it, by crippling the Navy because it has been of no particular service perhaps except to the country which we propose to maintain, by crippling the civil service, by cutting down $50 in the yearly pay of a poor clerk who can hardly obtain boarding and lodging and decent clothing in the town on his present salary. That is the cry of economy that is given to us here to dish out to the people. They will cut down $50 on a poor woman's or a poor man's salary and force the poor clerk to live in a way not decent hardly for people to live, and then go before the country and say to the people, "Why, we are for economy. Did we not strike the poor clerks? Yes, we did. Did we not strike the poor women in the Departments? Yes, we did. We cut down salaries; that is true. We cut down the numbers. There is economy for you equal to a hundred thousand dollars which we have saved by striking them down." They have cut them down so that the work cannot be done. Did you not cripple the Army? Yes, you did. You tried to cut down their salaries; you tried to muster officers out of the service; you tried to cut down the regiments; you tried to destroy the Army by putting it in a shape that no man would know whether it was an army or a confused mass of individuals thrown together without anything to guide or support them. Did you not cut down the Navy? O, yes, you did; you tried to cripple it. Did you not cut down the salaries of yourselves? O, yes, you did that.

Every man has a right to estimate his own capacity and his own worth; and the people may be satisfied that these reformers knew better what they are worth than anybody else; but it was not sincere. The evidence shows it. Some of the very men who have been howling the loudest for cutting down the salaries of members of Congress are men who themselves voted like myself for an increase of salaries some two or three years ago. Therefore it is not an honest economy. It is such economy as a man will preach before an election for the purpose of obtaining votes and for no other purpose. You may tell us that you crippled poor clerks; that you cut down their salaries; that you cut off a few clerks here in the Senate, a few messengers in the Senate, a few in the House, a few in the custom-houses and in the post-offices. We admit that you have done all that. You have stopped the fast-mail trains. We agree to that. You have crippled the mail service of the country. You have done all these things, and for all these things I am willing you shall have all the credit the country will give you. You are entitled to it all for you have certainly done it. I am willing you shall have all the credit for it. When you present this bill showing hundreds of thousands of dollars appropriated for the purpose of satisfying certain districts and certain members of Congress in order to make political capital, you will satisfy the country that there is no honesty in your economy.

In reference to my position on this bill, I will say that I am not in favor of striking out all the amendments and leaving it as the House had it. I will agree to no such proposition. I will not agree that the House of Representatives is the only legislative body in this country. I will not agree that they are endowed by the Constitution of this country with the sole power to legislate for it, and that the Senate has only to bow assent. Whether my State might be benefited by taking the House bill or not, is immaterial to me. There is a principle involved that I will not agree to. I have not made the calculation to see whether the State of Illinois would receive more money by the House bill than it would by the Senate bill, for I do not care; it makes no difference. It is improper; it is not proper legislation. It is not according to the design of this Government or our Constitution that we should submit alone to one body to legislate for the country; and for that reason I will not agree to such a proposition.

I only wish to say further that if we cannot agree upon a proper bill to be passed distributing these funds properly to harbors and rivers where a necessity absolutely exists for the appropriation, then I am in favor of the proposition of the Senator from Vermont. But first I am in favor of the Appropriation Committee themselves seeing whether or not this bill cannot again be put in proper shape. I believe the bill as it came from the Appropriation Committee in the Senate was very nearly a fair bill. I think it appropriated too much money. That is my judgment about it; but if we were to give the amount of money that was in the bill I believe it was as fairly distributed as probably it can be done. If there is a necessity for cutting down further, which a great many Senators think there is, then I am willing that the committee themselves shall take the bill and cut it down in accordance with the sense of the Senate. I am in favor of referring the bill back to the committee for the purpose of giving them an opportunity of rereporting it, either as they did report it or cutting it down in accordance with whatever the sense of the Senate may be. Then, if the House cannot agree upon it, I will take the proposition of the Senator from Vermont as the best proposition we can get; and if we cannot get that let us have no bill at all.

Mr. MAXEY. I have no purpose, Mr. President, to make any additional speech at all; but if I correctly understand the distinguished Senator from New York, I wish to correct a misapprehension under which he seems to be laboring, that I had referred to the State of New York in a sectional sense. Certainly nothing was further from my intention. I referred to the State of New York as the greatest State in the American Union and showed what had been appropriated to New York. That is a northern State. I then referred to the State of Delaware, which is the smallest State, I think, among the old States of the Union, and showed what that State had got; and I then referred to the State of Vermont and the State of Rhode Island in the East, to the State of Ohio in the West, and to the State of Maryland in the South; so that certainly my remarks cannot be construed to have been sectional, nor were they so intended.

I desire further to say that there is not in the State which I have the honor to represent in part the slightest possible sectional feeling toward the State of New York. On the contrary, the city of New York receives more than half of the magnificent crop of cotton which Texas produces. Millions and millions of dollars of commerce and trade flow between the State of Texas and the city of New York. Undoubtedly I have no sectional feeling toward that city or toward that State, and I do not indulge in sectional remarks.

I desire to make a further remark in connection with what I said to which the Senator from Ohio replied. It is perhaps because I do not understand the English language very well that he and I could not look alike. I said that the appropriation was $19,781.12 for Cunningham Creek, Ohio. The Senator says that is a harbor. I took the official report of the engineer, and I could not look at it other than as I have it here. I could not make creek mean harbor. When I came to the appropriation for Sandusky River the Senator said that it is not for Sandusky River, but for a harbor at Sandusky City; but I see in separate and distinct items—

Sandusky City harbor, $176,580.

* * * * * * *

Sandusky River, Ohio, $30,000.

The enginner makes the distinction between the river and the harbor, and I cannot make river mean harbor any more than I can make creek mean harbor. In every instance in this bill, so far as I can judge, where an appropriation was made for a harbor the word "harbor" is used, where for a river the word "river" is used, where for a creek the word "creek" is used. I simply took the English language precisely as I found it. I think the tabular statement which I presented abundantly sustains what I said in regard to the appropriation for Ohio.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to say to the honorable Senator from Texas that if I seemed in my remarks to misunderstand what he said about the State of New York, I am very glad to hear him disclaim a disposition to reflect upon it.

Mr. MAXEY. Unquestionably I had not the slightest sectional feeling.

Mr. CONKLING. And I have only to add, Mr. President, that when I remember all the contributions which have been made by the State of New York for the general welfare; and when I remember on the other side what has been received by that State in return, which I forbear to characterize, I hope the honorable Senator from Texas, if he saw anything too animated in my remarks, will pardon something to the consciousness that I have of the truth of history.

Mr. CAPERTON. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senate for a brief period while I attempt to answer some of the objections made to this bill. I will address myself first in order to the objections taken by the Senator from New York to the manner in which the passage of this bill was obtained. He referred to the action upon this bill when it was before the committee of the lower House. He said that he had a right to refer to that. I have no objection to the reference, whether it is within the parliamentary rule or not. He referred to the fact that this bill had been committed to three persons composing a subcommittee; that those three persons had concocted a bill, and that that bill was introduced into the House and passed by that body. He seeks in this way to take from the bill all the credit of the House imprimatur.

In the first place I will correct the Senator as to one fact. The Committee on Commerce, I believe, is composed of eleven members, and, so far as I have been informed, the subcommittee was composed of seven members. This subcommittee reported the bill to the main committee and that committee reported it to the House.

The Senator then complained that it was passed under the operation of the previous question; but he did not refer the Senate to the fact that that previous question could only have been had by a vote of two-thirds; so that if there is anything to be inferred from the action in the lower House from the facts as far as we can gather them, without a violation of the parliamentary rule, I think the imprimatur is very strong.

Mr. CONKLING. Shall I understand the Senator to say that the previous question in the House is ordered only by a two-thirds vote, or does he mean in this instance that the House suspended the rule?

Mr. CAPERTON. It was a suspension of the rule.

Mr. CONKLING. O, yes; a suspension of the rule, so that the report might be made, without of course knowing what the report was. Nobody knows what the report is when he votes to suspend the rule.

Mr. CAPERTON. It is the same thing. The rule was suspended for the purpose of permitting this bill to be reported.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly it was.

Mr. CAPERTON. And to suspend that rule requires two-thirds. The previous question requires only a majority. This bill was well known. It had been printed probably for a week before and it is to be presumed that every member of that House was familiar with the provisions of the bill. The very fact that the suspension of the rules could be obtained is proof that there was a very general concurrence in the provisions of the bill on the part of the House.

Mr. CONKLING. May I interrupt the Senator once more?

Mr. CAPERTON. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I understand the Senator now to say that when the rules of the House were suspended to enable the bill to be reported, it was then passed instanter, and that the presumption is that every member of the House knew what the report was.

Mr. CAPERTON. Yes, when we take that fact in connection with the other fact, which is very familiar to the Senator, that it is customary to print a bill of this description and place it upon the desks of the members.

Mr. CONKLING. Before it is reported?

Mr. CAPERTON. Before it is reported.

Mr. CONKLING. I will take that into the account when I know it. I do not know any such rule now.

Mr. CAPERTON. I understand that it was recommitted and printed a week or ten days before this action was had. I think this is pretty strong evidence that there was a pretty general concurrence on the part of the members, the immediate representatives of the people, as to the provisions of this bill. I do not think, then, that any prejudice should result from the fact which has been adverted to by the Senator from New York. It is a little extraordinary, it is something upon which we ought to felicitate ourselves, that in regard to a bill of this importance there should be that general concurrence of opinion on the part of the members of the lower House. This bill which operates not sectionally, this bill which applies to the East and to the West, to the North and to the South, this bill which affects Michigan and Maine, Colorado and California, Missouri and Virginia and all the States to some extent, all agreeing and uniting in it, is framed to suit the views, the interests, and the wishes of the people throughout the whole length and breadth of the land, as these facts evidence. I shall not take up the time of the Senate in dwelling longer on this point.

I desire now to speak of the character of objection made by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] and the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] The Senator from Maryland indulged in a good deal of severe denunciation. He said that this bill ought to bring reproach and shame upon the representatives of the people; that it is contrary to all his notions of governmental policy; that it is in violation of the doctrines of the fathers from which he had gotten his teachings, and that he should oppose the bill, as it came from the House, first and last. It is a singular sort of opposition that that Senator is making, as well as the Senator from New York. They propose to build up this bill, they propose to freight this horrible vessel that is to carry so much dismay and destruction to our financial interests. I believe the Senator from Maryland proposed to incorporate in the bill something in reference to the Upper Potomac, and I believe he proposed to reinstate some other amendment which had been stricken out by the Senate committee. I think he wanted to get that in.

Mr. WHYTE. No.

Mr. CAPERTON. At all events his colleague did, and I suppose he concurred and united with his colleague.

Mr. WHYTE. Excuse me. I sustained the committee, but proposed an amendment for the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.

Mr. CAPERTON. I believe the Senator did offer an amendment to appropriate $150,000 for that improvement. I believe the Senator from Ohio offered an amendment for the Sandusky improvement and the Cleveland improvement. I do not understand the ethics of these gentlemen. I do not understand why, if they are so terribly opposed to a bill of this description, they should be willing to put their little all in this bill and to avail themselves of thus putting it in if it should happen to become a law.

Mr. RANSOM. Will my friend from West Virginia allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CAPERTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANSOM. I did not have the pleasure of being in the Senate on Saturday, but my observation on Friday was, and the Senator will correct me if I am in error, that nearly every amendment which had been made by the Committee on Appropriations in this body striking out items from the bill which the House had placed in it, was invariably restored, without exception, on the motion of a Senator from the State to which they applied. I hope the Senator comprehends me.

Mr. CAPERTON. Yes, I understand that perfectly. There is no question about that. It is to that point I was addressing myself.

Mr. RANSOM. That is the way I understood the Senator.

Mr. CAPERTON. I say that the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Maryland were the advocates for the restoration of such amendments, as well as the Senator from New York, I believe, and I am sure the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] was interested in a little Otter Creek improvement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; and if the Senator will allow me to say so, it was after I voted with the committee, believing that their judgment must be better than mine, on every item, until my friend over there and all his compeers had overruled them and until there was only seven of us left. Then I said as they say in tanneries, "Let the tail go with the hide," and put in Otter Creek.

Mr. CAPERTON. Yes, sir; and hence it is that I say I do not understand the ethics of these gentlemen. If they think the bill is wrong, that it is a monstrosity, a great vessel carrying away something it ought not to carry, if it is carrying contraband, why will you put your goods on it and say, "If you can get through safely I want to have the benefit of it." Is that the principle, the ethics of these gentlemen who speak against the bill?

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will pardon me, as he did me the honor to refer to me, will he point out in the bill any instance in the State of New York which illustrates what he is now saying?

Mr. CAPERTON. I do not recollect.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator will hardly be able to do it. He will find the harbor of Dunkirk and he will find three harbors on Lake Ontario, which has long been called an inland sea. If the honorable Senator will institute an analogy between those harbors on the great lakes and some creek where after it is improved twenty inches of water will be found on which a man can run a scow to float down his cord-wood to market——

Mr. SARGENT. And by which the trout fishing will be improved.

Mr. CONKLING. And whereby, as my friend says, the trout fishing will be improved, (and that makes me suspect that he is not a fisherman,) I will admit that the cases are parallel.

Mr. CAPERTON. The Senator does not comprehend me at all. I understand that he and the Senator from Vermont and the Senators from Maryland and Ohio all oppose this bill. The Senator from New York opposes it. I do not recollect his epithet, but he used some exceedingly harsh epithet. It was a monstrosity. Should any of these Senators help this monstrosity by incorporating their provisions and by connecting their names in that manner with it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly; "the hair of the same dog effects a cure," they say.

Mr. CAPERTON. The Senators say "although it is a monstrosity, although we think this is a great steal, yet if we can get our provisions in, if we can participate in the steal a little, we will go along and do it." The question must resolve itself to that. I have not analyzed all these various appropriations; some of them may be, as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] very well expressed it this morning, of exceeding propriety. I do not know particularly abont them, except those that concern my own State. The Senator from Maryland made reference to them. I think one or two Senators referred to the New River improvement as a river which is not much more than equal to the floating of canoes. Gentlemen speak in regard to such matters without thinking or without information. I call the attention of the Senator from Maryland, as well as the Senator from Ohio and other Senators, to the fact that the portion of that river which is proposed to be improved is a river which extends through the two States of Virginia and West Virginia. More than that, it is upon a line, and it is to be improved for the purpose of affording an outlet from the Chesapeake and Ohio road to the great Virginia and Tennessee road at a distance of some fifty-five or sixty miles, when, if you desire to get from the one point to the other now, you have to go a distance of three or four hundred miles down by Lynchburgh. It does not fall within the objection taken by these gentlemen. It does not fall within the objection taken by the Senator from Ohio, that it is making an improvement upon a river within the limits of a State. I shall not go into that subject, and will only remark that it is well settled that although a river, its source and its mouth, may be within the limits of a State, yet if it discharges itself into another stream upon which there is considerable commerce, it is as much within the contemplation of the Constitution as if it discharged itself into the ocean.

But the Senator from New York says that this is contrary to all the old doctrines of the democratic party; that it is contrary to all of its teachings, and is in the face of a veto which was made of a river and harbor bill by President Pierce. I have a book here which I commend to the attention of the Senator from Maryland, inasmuch as he proposes to set up a new school of political economy, or rather an old school which he proposes to revive and re-establish. I commend this work to his attention, from which he will ascertain whether or not the doctrine which he now maintains has been the doctrine of the democratic party. I see that General Jackson signed three bills for improving the navigation of the Hudson River, and Mr. Van Buren one. I see that bills numbering some dozen for the improvement of the Cumberland road, east of the Ohio River, in Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, were signed by Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, John Quincy Adams, Jackson, and Van Buren. I see that Jackson and Van Buren both signed bills improving the Pamlico River below Washington, North Carolina. I see that Jackson and Van Buren both signed bills improving Neuse River, the harbor of New Berne, North Carolina. I see that Adams and Jackson, Adams signing one and Jackson six, approved bills for improving Cape Fear River. I see that John Quincy Adams and Jackson and Van Buren signed bills for improving the navigation of the Savannah River. I see that Adams and Jackson and Van Buren all signed bills for improving the navigation of the Red River, in Louisiana; that Jackson and Van Buren signed bills improving the navigation of the Arkansas River, and that Adams and Jackson and Van Buren approved a number of bills for the Cumberland road in Indiana. I see that bills were approved for improving the navigation of the Huron River in Ohio. I do not know whether that is a river entirely within the confines of the State or not.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes; it is in the State.

Mr. CAPERTON. It lies altogether within the State of Ohio?

Mr. THURMAN. It is a port.

Mr. CAPERTON. It is a small river altogether within the limits of Ohio?

Mr. THURMAN. My friends are not quite as well acquainted with their geography as I am. The Huron River is not a navigable river at all. Nobody pretends to navigate it except in a canoe; but below the falls, within a very few miles of the lake, is a port. Sometimes these appropriations have been in name for the river and sometimes for the harbor or port, but they are all really for the port.

Mr. WITHERS. I will ask my friend if the harbor is at the falls?

Mr. THURMAN. No; the harbor is below the falls.

Mr. WITHERS. So I supposed. What do you call the portion between the falls and the harbor? Is it the Huron River, or what?

Mr. THURMAN. The harbor extends up to or quite to the falls. There have been no appropriations for the river above the falls.

Mr. CAPERTON. Still it is a river within the State of Ohio.

Mr. THURMAN. It is the mouth of a river.

Mr. CAPERTON. The mouth is within the territorial limits of Ohio.

Mr. THURMAN. The mouth is on Lake Erie.

Mr. CAPERTON. I understood the gentleman to say on Saturday that Ohio had never asked for an improvement of a river within the State limits.

Mr. THURMAN. Not unless it was at the mouth of a river, and so constituted a port.

Mr. CAPERTON. I see that eleven appropriations were made, signed by Adams and Jackson and Van Buren and Tyler. Here is another bill improving the navigation of Black River, Ohio. That is another river all within the territorial limits of Ohio, I understand.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes; on Lake Erie.

Mr. CAPERTON. I am answering the gentleman's statement that Ohio had never asked for an appropriation for a river lying altogether within the limits of Ohio.

Mr. THURMAN. Either I cannot make myself understood or else gentlemen are very dull of apprehension or cannot understand me, one or the other. I repeat that, so far as I know, Ohio has never asked for a dollar or received a dollar for the improvement of the navigation of a river wholly within the boundaries of that State. These appropriations in name may be for a river; but they are all appropriations for the month of the river where the port is, on Lake Erie.

Mr. CAPERTON. Here I see an appropriation for removing obstructions from the mouth of Ashtabula Creek, Ohio.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes.

Mr. CAPERTON. I see one for improving the navigation of Conneaut, Ohio.

Mr. THURMAN. A very fine port, indeed.

Mr. CAPERTON. Then there is an appropriation for improving the navigation of Cunningham Creek.

Mr. THURMAN. That is a port on the lake, of which I have before spoken to-day.

Mr. CAPERTON. I call the attention of gentlemen who are looking back to the lessons taught by their fathers to these facts.

Mr. MERRIMON. Whom are the bills approved by?

Mr. CAPERTON. By Adams, Jackson half a dozen times, Van Buren, Tyler, and so on, all democrats. These are the fathers to whom the Senator from Maryland proposes to refer us and by whom he proposes to be guided. I do not see that there were any appropriations approved by Mr. Pierce. I understand from the Senator from Maryland that Mr. Pierce did veto a harbor bill on the idea perhaps that Congress had no constitutional power to pass a harbor bill. I do not propose to be taught by Mr. Pierce if that was his doctrine. I do not propose to be guided by the Senator from Maryland if he invokes to his aid the teaching of such men as Mr. Pierce.

Mr. President, I used to hear in old times a great deal about the doctrine of strict construction, and a great deal of opposition to works of internal improvement. It made at one time, as I think the Senator from Maryland said, one of the planks in the platforms of parties; but it has long since rotted out. It never can be re-established. I hope and trust in God it never will be. I shall never take my stand upon it for one. The Senator from Maryland is younger than I am. My mission is but short compared with his. He may succeed in establishing it, but as long as I can wag a tongue I will oppose utterly the doctrines of the old fathers as he maintains them and is illustrated by the veto of President Pierce.

It is almost within my life-time when the State of Virginia was equal in commerce with the State of New York. It is not as much as a century ago when her commerce was equal to the commerce of New York; when her exports were greater and her imports about equal. This equality continued for some little time, up to about 1796, when New York commenced to shoot ahead and Virginia to retrograde, until in the course of not much more than a quarter of a century New York outstripped her 30 to 1 in trade and commerce. That was about the time Washington had pointed out this great line of improvement extending to the West by the Kanawha, for which a little appropriation is provided in the bill, to his countrymen as the line by which was to be opened up an intercourse between the East and the vast valley of the West, when Chief Justice Marshall approved it and surveyed it and held it up. Unfortunately about that time our illustrious men became politicians and ceased to look after the commercial interests of the country. They attached more consequence to the political condition of the country. About the time the doctrines of 1798 and 1799 were coming, this retrograde movement took place. It took place when there was no reason for it; when, so far as all the elements necessary to constitute a great, a rich, and a powerful State are concerned, Virginia was far ahead of New York. She had more within her borders of all those elements which make the foundations of commercial strength and greatness than the State of New York. But they were neglected; and history will bear me out in it, because our great men instead of pursuing the important commercial career which was pointed out by the great man of New York, De Witt Clinton, devoted themselves only to politics and let the commercial interests of the State die.

I say I do not want to be brought back to the ideas of the past. I do not desire to see the fathers, whom the Senator from Maryland relies upon, and that class of politicians re-instated in order to put another obstacle in the way of our advancement. I hope that this great scheme, which found its origin in the brain of Washington and its approval in such men as Marshall, will be revived and that we shall yet see this vast highway opened to connect the East and the West in all their commercial relations.

Now, Mr. President, I have but a word or two more to say. It has been a most pleasing spectacle to me that the subject of this river and harbor bill has engaged the attention and the hearts and the wishes of so many men composing this Congress. There is nothing that conduces so much to bring men together, to soften the asperities which arise sometimes from sectional differences, as the contemplation and the working up of these river and harbor schemes. The Senator from New York and the Senator from Illinois seem to apprehend that it is for mere political purposes. I do not know how much of politics there may have been in it. I do not know how many members of Congress may have secured their election by it or how many members of the Senate may secure their return by it. I never stop to inquire about a thing of that sort. I only know that in the operation, the mere effort to bring about these things, you are conducing greatly to that national harmony which it ought to be the desire of every member of this body and the other House to bring about. I think, unless there be some more solid or well-grounded objection to this bill or to some important provisions of it, there ought to be no hesitation in passing it. It was brought about after great care, after great deliberation, after a comparison of views on the part of all the members who might be affected by the various appropriations provided for in the bill; and I will say that respect ought to be paid to the wishes of those who represent those various places.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, the pending motion is one to recommit with instructions to reduce the total to four millions. I shall support this motion of the Senator from Ohio mainly because of the instructions it contains. I regard this bill in its present proportions as a monstrosity, as it has already been characterized on the floor of the Senate, and I will take any parliamentary means in my power to reduce its proportions. The first of those, it seems to me, is to send it to the proper committee in order that they may endeavor there to bring it down to what it ought to be. Following that, if that shall not prevail, comes the motion of the Senator from Vermont, which is to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a provision by which there is to be appropriated $4,000,000 for rivers and harbors, which are to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War. To such a proposition I cannot agree. It is exceedingly bad, in my judgment. There is no safety or propriety in intrusting to any officer of this Government, it matters not whether he be the Secretary of War or the Chief of Engineers, or the President himself, the power that belongs to the representatives of the people to make distinct and specific appropriations of their money to legitimate objects of the Government. Short appropriations, distinct appropriations, specific appropriations, are to be made by Congress to carry out the theory that is embodied in our institutions, which the fathers regarded as vital and essential, which is plainly written in the organic law and is as clear and plain as anything that has come down to us from the past. A specific appropriation by the House of Representatives, to be expended under the direction of the proper officer with the necessary safeguards for expenditure and accountability around the Treasury, has come to be an indispensable American principle, and I cannot vote to give to any man the right to expend an enormous amount of the money of the people without control and without direction. These are no times for loosing the bonds of official accountability or for loose appropriations.

But, sir, beyond and above all this, what is this proposition? It is, sir, a confession of the impotence of this body and of its co-ordinate branch of the Government to perform the very duty for which the people have sent them here. This Congress, vested by the people with power to make appropriations, to expend their money, confesses its impotence and practically says, "We are unable to pass an appropriation bill; the Secretary of War shall expend the money at his pleasure." This is the position in which we would be placed by the adoption of the proposition of the Senator from Vermont. I cannot consent by my vote to any such proposition.

So far as I am concerned, I shall endeavor with all my power, as I already have done, to reduce the proportions of this bill. I beg to correct the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber who have said that all on this side have voted to increase its proportions by voting to restore the amendments stricken out by the Senate committee. I have endeavored throughout not to increase its proportions, but to sustain the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. WALLACE. I am about to answer the Senator. When the Senate by test votes upon at least three propositions settled the question that the policy of the Committee on Appropriations was not to be followed by the Senate and refused to permit the amendments made by that committee to stand as the sense of the Senate, then, at the request of a member of the lower House, I asked the Senate to restore one of the appropriations that was in the bill of the House, and which had been stricken out by the committee of the Senate. For that amendment, which was $6,000 for the ice-harbor at Chester, I voted. For all the other amendments reducing the size of the bill, as made by the Senate committee, I voted. Have I answered the question of my friend, the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALLACE. I cannot vote for this bill in its present form on two grounds. First it appropriates money for improper purposes, and second, it is extravagant in amount. Whence comes our power to make these appropriations? It comes from the power in the Constitution "to regulate commerce among the States." "Commerce among the States" are the words of the Constitution. As I understand the authorities, commerce means and includes navigation; commerce among the States means and includes intercourse between them. Navigation, as applied to this clause, means as well ascending as descending navigation. Without both the stream is not a navigable water of the United States. Intercourse means not commerce and traffic simply from one State by a water-course at its flood into another without the power and means of returning, but also an opportunity for the productions of that other State to traverse the highway and carry its productions to a market. A navigable highway is a water which possesses the capacity of ascending as well as of descending.

Intercourse means interstate traffic. When we find a river that has at its flood a descending navigation, but is naturally in such a condition that it is not navigable in the other direction, then we have no navigable water of the United States within the meaning of the Constitution and the decisions under it to which we can lawfully appropriate money. If I rightly understand the decisions in The Montebello, 20 Wallace, and The Daniel Ball, in 10 Wallace, this is now the doctrine of the law. Although there may have been in the former case the recognition of the right of an appropriation for improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, which points beyond this, yet careful study of that case satisfies me that the law is as I have stated it. That case was peculiar. This line was an old thoroughfare. It had been used for many years, and its public character was recognized by the ordinance of 1787, and traffic was shown to have existed there since 1718. The general principle is that where a river is not navigable in fact that Congress has no control over it, but that its control belongs exclusively to the States, and that whether such a stream is a part of a continuous line from a navigable stream, naturally navigable, into another State or whether it lies wholly within the State is immaterial. If a river be navigable in fact within a State as a part of a continuous line of communication Congress has the power to appropriate money to improve it so far as it is so navigable under the power to regulate commerce. If it lie wholly within a State and be navigable in fact, if not a part of a continuous line of communication, Congress has no control over it, and it belongs to the State to regulate its commerce. If it be part of a continuous line from without to within a State, but its character is such that no ascending navigation in fact exists, nor can naturally exist, the Congress has no control over it under this power, but the jurisdiction of the State is exclusive.

Apply these doctrines, these rules of law, the now settled law, not the theories and dogmas of fifty years ago but the law that has grown up from the necessities of your ever expanding commerce, that which has come from the growth of your country, that which has crystallized itself through the decisions of the Supreme Court upon the power to regulate commerce among the States. Apply these doctrines to our present bill for improving rivers, for appropriating money to that object, and we have the question settled, because the court has given us settled doctrines. The rivers to which we may give the money of the United States are those which the Constitution of the United States, as interpreted by the Supreme Court, have recognized to be navigable waters of the United States, and those, and those alone, are such as are navigable in fact, and are avenues of interstate commerce.

In this bill as it came to us from the House there are at least twenty instances of appropriations of money to rivers which are not navigable rivers within the meaning of the Constitution and laws. It is not a question of a short river reaching from a lake into a State. Such a stream may be navigable for but ten miles and still be within the purview of the general power. It seems to me, then, that there is no room for difference between my friend from West Virginia and my friend from Maryland. They will both agree that the doctrines of the Constitution as interpreted by the Supreme Court are our platform, and that the decisions of the court have followed the progressive march of that commerce which the intense desire of our countrymen for gain has pushed to its furthest limits in the development of the natural highways and internal arteries of our great net-work of lakes and rivers.

Take my own State. What would become of the finances of the Government if under the doctrines that are inculcated in this bill that great State were to come here by her representatives and demand that because the Susquehanna is connected with the Chesapeake Bay and bears upon its bosom annually millions of dollars' worth of commerce from its headwaters to tide-water, because that river is navigable for descending in its flood, that therefore the General Government is bound to appropriate the money which would be at least $40,000,000 to create ascending navigation, to clean it out and make a channel by which to ascend to our mountains and draw therefrom the vast treasures of coal, of iron, of grain, and of lumber that we annually produce. No such wild theory has ever been entertained, and we of Pennsylvania prefer that none such ever should be.

Yet that is the doctrine upon which many appropriations in this bill rest. That is the inevitable result of the appropriation of money for these small and non-navigable streams. We believe in no such doctrine. The Susquehanna, like many of the small streams named in the bill, is properly and legally under the control of the State in which they are. The State has exclusive control of them. It is sound theory and good democratic doctrine that the State is to control the streams that are within the State when they are not navigable in fact by ascending navigation.

The bill, Mr. President, is too large in its proportion, too profuse in expenditure. I have nothing to say about what the House did in reference to the bill. Whether it was or was not considered there does not enter into the question in my mind, but I take the bill as I find it and I but state my conviction when I say that it is enormous in its proportions.

In 1866 and 1867, when we had good times, when there was a redundancy of money, when the revenues of the Government were larger than ever before or since, the river and harbor bill was but a trifle over $3,000,000. Yet now, in these times in which every man is economizing, in which all are retrenching, in which the necessity for retrenchment comes to the Government as it does to the private citizen, this bill is doubled in its proportions. In place of being $3,000,000 and a trifle over, as in 1866, we find it now nearly $7,000,000. It is said that political capital is to be made from this. Then if the bill in the House contained but $5,800,000 and political capital was made out of it in the House, what is to be made of it in the Senate when it is swollen to the proportion of nearly $7,000,000? It necessarily follows that the Senate has taken the same line that the House took, and is inclined to make political capital too. But, Mr. President, it is nothing of the kind. We understand the process by which this bill has been made to assume these unwieldy proportions, and I for one will go as far as I can to reduce its size. If I fail to obtain a reduction of its proportions I shall vote against it. Rather will I permit no appropriation for rivers and harbors this year than to permit a bill with such proportions as this to go on the statute-book when the condition of the country is as it is to-day.

Economy is necessary now; and the taunts of our friends on the other side that we are not honest in economizing, that we are not honest in retrenching, come with ill-grace when they look to the amount which the House of Representatives has reduced the appropriation bills up to this time. When we find, as we do now, competition in every calling, surplus production on every side; when we find and recognize, too, the fact that the increase of but a trifle upon the cost of production that increased taxation makes means, if it means anything, the destruction of some important branch of your manufactures; when it means the shutting off the blast of the furnaces, the filling up of your mines, the throwing broadcast upon the country of hundreds and thousands of artisans and laborers, as it has done in the State that I represent; when increased taxation means this, is it for us to fail to pursue the line that endeavors to reduce taxation, to fail to pursue the line of retrench and economy? We must reduce our expenditures as the beginning of ease in taxation.

Sir, increased or heavy taxation means decreased production, shortened time, unemployed labor, artisans and laborers thrown out of employment. It means, sir, more than this: It means starvation, privation, death in many an American home; it means wife and children pining for want; it means the father upon the bed with fever for the want of the generous food that would come from proper wages to follow from full time of labor and legitimate employment. These, sir, are some of the results that come from increased and ever increasing taxation; and representing such a people as I do, I should be faithless to my highest duty if I did not appeal here in my place for a reduction of expenditure, whether it be upon a river and harbor bill or upon any other bill given to us to pass upon.

But it is said distribute your money, give employment to idle men. It would be a strange paternity, a singular specimen of governmental policy for us to undertake by this process to give to the starving artisans and laborers of this country employment. It would be quenching the smoke of the furnace, putting out the fires of the puddlers, and turning thousands out of employment to mock them with a pittance. Such a paternity would be that which would give to the children who cry for bread a stone. No, sir, let us reduce taxation by reducing our expenditures; let us stop this system which is driving out of existence our manufactures, and let us by a just economy and reduction of taxation enable them to recuperate their exhausted energies.

Mr. President, I shall vote against this bill because it is unconstitutional in many respects, as I view it; because it takes from the States jurisdiction over streams on which the States have the control, and not the General Government; because it sends the agents of the General Government to destroy rights vested under State laws; and because it is extravagant in amount and unjustifiable now. But before I shall vote against it, I shall make every effort in my power to reduce its proportions to a fair amount.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania spoke about a proposition to increase taxation and of his being in favor of a reduction of taxation. If any bill has come from the House at this session to reduce the taxes I am not aware of it. Does my friend now of any?

Mr. WALLACE. The appropriation of a less amount for continuing the expenses of the Government necessarily reduces taxation. The Senator knows that as well as I do.

Mr. MORTON. O, no; my friend is entirely mistaken. The taxes are not paid on appropriation bills, but on tax bills. The amount of tax to be collected depends upon tax bills, and it has to be paid whether you make any appropriations or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And that is on the tariff and whisky in the main. Which does the Senator from Pennsylvania propose to reduce?

Mr. MORTON. If the burdens of the people are to be reduced by diminishing the amount of taxes they have got to pay, then we must have reform tax bills, and nothing of the kind has been presented to us. It is simply a reduction of appropriations.

My friend from Ohio said a while ago that I had made a partisan speech. My friend dislikes anything partisan, I know; he is so strictly impartial in regard to everything of a political character that for fear of being partial he leans a little to the republican side.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not recollect the instance. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORTON. And I presume nobody else does but myself. [Laughter.] This whole subject of appropriations is political, and every member of this Senate knows it, every member of the House knows it. Talk about keeping politics out of it! I am simply frank and ingenuous, and my friend is simply disingenuous. This whole question of appropriations in the House and here is political, and we all know it, and the object has been to reduce the appropriations, in most cases improperly and to the injury of the public for the simple purpose of making a little political capital. My democratic friends understand this just as well as I do. The whole thing is a state of preparation for the coming election, and every one of the appropriation bills, except this one, is simply a method of preparing to carry this country for the democratic party. We all understand that. It is no use of disguising it for a single moment.

Mr. THURMAN. Do I understand the Senator from Indiana to say that there can be no appropriate reduction of the expenditures of Government, that they have reached their lowest point, and that any reduction is a mere sham and a partisan trick?

Mr. MORTON. My friend must not put it precisely in that way. I did not say that. I have no doubt there can be some reductions in appropriations, always; it is the business of every party, of every Congress to be looking out for such reductions. Sometimes there comes a necessary increase in appropriations, where it is just as virtuous and just as patriotic to make an increase as it is on the other hand to make a reduction; but what I do mean to say, and what I believe, is that the great bulk of these reductions have not been in the interest of economy, have not been in the interest of the country, but simply in the interest of a party to enable them to carry the next election, to go before the country and with a great show of economy and retrenchment say, "See here how much we have reduced the appropriations." But if they were asked "Have you reduced taxes any," they would be compelled to say "No, we did not think about that; we thought you had to pay on the appropriation bills, not on the tax bills; and consequently we confined ourselves exclusively to the appropriation bills."

Mr. BOGY. The Senate was in the way.

Mr. MORTON. Well, it was just as much in the way on the appropriation bills as it was in the way of the reduction of the tax bills; but the House tried it very strongly on the appropriation bills.

One word in regard to the merits of this bill. A good deal is said about improving little harbors and creeks and rivers. My information—and I believe it is true—is that very much good is often done by these small improvements, and that as much is added to the commerce of the country in proportion to the amount appropriated by small improvements as is done by the large ones. Some of our friends who come from States that have received large appropriations think now that there ought to be retrenchment and that we ought to enter upon a different system, and especially when they come from those States that are finished or nearly so; but those that come from States where the commerce is not yet fully developed and where they need this relief take a different view. So far as the Eastern States are concerned they have been liberally treated. They have had none too much, but their improvements are nearly all made. They stand now in need of but very little, although I see in regard to Hell Gate (we have been going at that gate for a long while) there is $300,000 in this bill yet. New York has received an appropriation of seven or eight millions—none too much; it is a great State.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me? New York has received $7,000,000; but the Senator says nothing about what has been appropriated for Michigan. Michigan received 11,000,000 of acres of land.

Mr. MORTON. That is a little diversion, and its exact purpose I do not understand.

Mr. THURMAN. The lands were given for internal improvements.

Mr. MORTON. I was speaking in regard to the State of New York. I said it was a great State and had received none too much; but New York does not constitute, after all, 90 per cent. of this whole country by any means. New York City is the great entrepot of commerce. What comes to the whole country goes through there, and most of what goes out from the whole country goes through New York, and it pays both ways.

Mr. President, a part of the statement made by my friend from West Virginia was very interesting. He showed what had been the practice under democratic Presidents, but he referred especially to the diverse history of New York and Virginia; that as early as 1795 or 1796 New York had turned her attention toward her material interests, and what had been the result? She had grown in power, in wealth, population, and capital; that Virginia had turned her attention to abstractions, and she had followed them up until they had led her to civil war and almost to ruin and bankruptcy. But I think a change has come over the spirit of the South. I think the Southern States now see the necessity of looking to their material interests, and dropping this business of political abstractions which had been followed to their great detriment and the detriment of the nation for so many years; and for one I am glad to see it.

Mr. President, the common run of speeches in this body and the other would indicate that the nation is on the eve of bankruptcy, that our revenues have fallen off until we can scarcely carry on the Government, and that it is necessary to reduce expenditures very largely upon that account. We are told that the people are at the point of starvation. What said Mr. Tilden? I am afraid this will be regarded as partisan. If so, I apologize to my friend from Ohio; but it is a part of the current history of the country. Mr. Tilden, who was nominated by the democratic party for President the other day, was serenaded at Albany two or three nights afterward, and in his speech he said that the wolf was at the door of nearly every house in this country gaunt and hungry; and he said that the product of the centennial year—I think I can give his very language—was licensed evil and wickedness and those crimes for which our fathers left the Old World and planted themselves in this new wilderness. It is that kind of talk which is to enter so largely into this campaign, and that is so largely false, absolutely false. There is distress in this country, but no such distress as that. There are many men out of employment. There are those who are suffering for the means perhaps of living. But this is nothing like so general as we are told. The country is not upon the brink of ruin and starvation. That statement, in substance, in the body of it, is absolutely untrue, put out for political effect; and these appropriations are to be reduced, in many cases so improperly, upon the statement that the National Government is upon the eve of bankruptcy, that our revenues have gone down to a very small amount, and that we are compelled to make these reductions for the purpose of paying our way.

Mr. MERRIMON. I would call the Senator's attention to the fact that the number of failures in this country for the last six months was near five thousand, and the amount for which they failed over $100,000,000.

Mr. MORTON. There have been a great many failures, and there are going to be a great many more, I fear. We have had a panic, and it will take us some years to get over it. It is said the issues of the war are all passed; but my friend should bear in mind that these are a part of the consequences of the war inevitably. They have come upon us, and time alone can cure them all. But what I mean to say is that they are not one-half as bad, they are not one tithe in their magnitude what is represented for political purposes.

Mr. President, the Secretary of the Treasury now, recently a member of this body, in a speech the other day which was the result of very careful preparation on his part, made a statement in regard to the revenues of the country. I desire now to call the attention of the Senate to that statement. He was better informed than I am.

Mr. LOGAN. I would call the Senator's attention to a fact that he well remembers, that it has not been but a few years since large appropriations every winter were made to feed the starving people of Washington City. There has been no such appropriation this winter or the last two years; so that the distress has not increased specially here.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator is entirely right about that, and it is one of the circumstances that enter into the general statement of the situation. I will ask the Secretary to read the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury as a member of this body a few days ago on this very question.

The Secretary read from the RECORD of July 8 as follows from remarks of Mr. Morrill, of Maine:

> Now what is the fact? The late Secretary of the Treasury in his report told us that the receipts for the next year would be equal to all the obligations of the Government, including the sinking fund. I know, in answer to that, it will be said that since that time there has been a falling off in the customs revenue. That is true; but how much? Not above $6,000,000. And do those who reckon in that way know that the balances saved from the appropriations of the last year nearly meet the deficiencies up to this time? That is never taken into account; nobody has even observed that so far as I know. Ah, it may be said that we appropriated extravagantly last year. No, not at all. Under the present accountability of the Departments it has become the policy of Congress, and no sounder policy ever did exist, to say to these Departments "You shall not spend one dollar for anything except for that for which it was specifically appropriated." Therefore, it will be seen that it has become the necessity of Congress to appropriate amply for the service, and the balance goes into the public Treasury. That accounts for the latitude in some of the branches where appropriations have been made. But what has been the result? The accountability under the act of 1870 has become so strict and so exacting that whoever is disposed to read the estimates, the appropriations, and the expenditures of the Government can tell what they are for each year with as much certainty as he can tell the state of his own private account, unless there is fraud and forgery in the exhibit. Now what I mean to say is that the expenditures of this year fall short of last year over $6,000,000.
> As to next year, the latest estimate that I know anything of from the Treasury is: From customs, $150,000,000; from internal revenue, $122,000,000; from miscellaneous sources, $19,000,000; making $291,000,000 in all. If those receipts are to be realized, and they stand as against $303,000,000 last year, then the revenues of this Government are ample for all its purposes. Of course, it does not lie in human wisdom to say with entire accuracy whether that will be so or not. General causes operate upon our customs receipts and upon our internal revenue; but the probability, from the best information the Department has upon the subject, is that our revenues from all sources will amount to $291,000,000, which will be, according to the appropriations of this year, ample to meet all the obligations of the Government, including the sinking fund.

Mr. MORTON. That I believe to be a correct and fair statement, so far as I know. The statements made by Mr. Tilden, and they are the common talk of his party, that the wolf is at the door of nearly every man in this country; that the Government is on the brink of ruin, and that the centennial products of this year are the licensed wrongs and wickedness that brought our fathers to this country, I believe in their substance and in their body are false, and I do not want to see currency and strength given to them by what is said in this body. It shall not be said and go unrebuked, at least while I am present.

In regard to this bill I care very little. I spoke of it this morning simply for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that this bill was a rebuke to the action of the House and of the democratic party upon all other appropriation bills; that as this bill went to the local interests of Senators and Representatives the appropriations were maintained and even increased, while upon other bills where the appropriations were not local, did not go to the personal interest of members but went to the general interest of the Government, the appropriations were largely reduced; and my friend from Ohio confessed that I was right, and called the attention of his friends not long ago to what I said on that subject and said they would be told of it time and again this year. My friend could not fail to perceive that, and he warned his party friends that this bill would be held up as a contradiction of the avowed purpose for which other reduction in the appropriations have been made.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I have urged on this body, I have urged it believing it to be true, that the condition of the people of the country, the condition of their business, and the condition of their currency called on Congress to appropriate as small an amount out of the Treasury as would enable us to get along without serious detriment to the public service. I shall be very happy to know that I am mistaken; but I am surprised to hear the argument that there is nothing in the condition of the country or of the Treasury that calls upon us to scrutinize bills that we pass appropriating public money.

Mr. MORTON. If my friend from New York refers to me, he has not correctly understood me. I have not said there was not distress and suffering in the country; but I have said that the representations upon that subject were grossly exaggerated. I have said that so far as appropriations were concerned, they did not reduce the burdens of the people, that the burdens are laid by taxation and not by appropriations; and if my friend will allow me one moment, I will say that if the reductions should be made according to the bills sent to us by the House of Representatives there would be a large surplus revenue which would be invested in the payment of the debt; but the reduction in the appropriations does not relieve the burdens of the people at this time. What the people have got to pay, whether they are able to pay or not, is determined by tax bills, not by appropriation bills.

Mr. KERNAN. Everybody here certainly knows that the reducing of appropriation does not per se reduce taxation; but everybody knows that if are going to reduce taxation we must reduce appropriations, or we ought to do so. How are the people to be relieved? It is by letting us, if we can, have a surplus revenue that goes to pay the debt, and then we know that we shall be able to reduce taxation. We cannot do it in an appropriation bill, I know. But why is the argument put forth as though it rebuked those who incidentally say as I said yesterday that we must cease to appropriate so largely if we ever intend to cut down taxation? The object of trying to keep three or four millions of this bill in the Treasury is that it may go to some other necessary purpose, and that we may have a surplus, and having a surplus we can then reduce taxation, and have a proper system.

So far as the argument about this bill goes, we must treat each appropriation by itself, and if we can, without serious detriment to the public service, reduce the appropriation by $3,000,000, bringing it down from $7,000,000 to $4,000,000, it is a service to the people and will relieve them of so much taxation in the future. The Senator from Indiana seems to rebuke those who talk of this as a time for economy. He knows that the returns for the last six months show that the number of failures is larger and the amount involved in the failures larger than for the previous six months. The distress is reaching the most thrifty portion of the country. I saw it stated that it had affected New England. All this shows that there is a very large body of men thrown out of employment, and surely the people are not in a condition to make light of the suggestion that it is a time when we should all seek to appropriate as small a sum as is consistent with the absolute necessities of the Government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator what are the causes in his opinion of these failures? Is it taxation by the national Government, by customs, and by the whisky tax?

Mr. KERNAN. I believe it is a combination of causes, and I believe that one of the reliefs is by lightening all classes of business from direct and indirect taxation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What are the causes?

Mr. KERNAN. I shall not now in a five minutes speech attempt to recount them all, if I could; but I still say, and, if I am mistaken, I shall be happy, that really the people are suffering from depression so that they ought to be relieved from every dollar of taxation we can properly relieve them from. If Mr. Tilden is wrong, and the Senator from Indiana is right, if this is not a time of depression and hardship that requires economy, the country will know it and I will not argue it. Every man in his neighborhood can find it out. All I want to say is that I trust gentlemen will not be moved by the argument that the state of the people and the state of the Treasury is such that we need not pay much attention to cutting down this bill three or four millions dollars.

Mr. FERRY, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) Mr. President——

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I know my friend from Michigan wants to occupy some time, and as I want to occupy but little, I ask his permission to occupy that now.

On the pending question of whether we are poor or not too poor, I want to make one remark. I am not so familiar with the condition of the country as a great many others are. My own impression is that the country is not so rich as that we can afford to make an improper or profligate expenditure in any direction, and on the other hand I am inclined to think the country is not so rich as that we can afford to withhold an expenditure which is calculated to make the country richer. I never saw the time, I never read of a people so prosperous that they could afford to throw away money in appropriations. There is not an expenditure in this bill before the Senate which this country could ever afford to make unless it is one which will make the country stronger and more prosperous. If these appropriations are wisely made, then they tend to make the country greater, wealthier, and more prosperous. So many of them as are not of that character, you ought to take out of the bill. So many of them as are of that character, if you hesitate to make them upon any theory that you are poor, I must say in all sincerity the Senate will be very unwise. Sir, the object of all these appropriations is to water all the channels of our national prosperity and make the increase more abundant.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Water the stock.

Mr. HOWE. Not to water the stock, but to enlarge the stock, and to water the crop and to increase the harvest; and the man who refuses to make a sensible appropriation in this way and in this direction upon the ground that the country is poor, you will one day be dead sure to see, unless an early death overtakes him, refusing to plant in spring because he is too poor to part with his seed.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, in the discussion of this bill I find the maxim again verified, that the first shall be last and the last first. Michigan seems to be first and last the target at which all the opposing weapons are aimed. In the opening of the discussion upon this bill Michigan was made the fore-front.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And in the bill, too.

Mr. FERRY. And in the bill, too, my friend from Vermont says. Yes, in good-fellowship with Vermont and other States, as she has the right to be in apportionment for rivers and harbors. And so at the closing of this discussion we have Michigan again arrayed before this body. The Senator from Vermont, who says Michigan is in this bill, said that the presiding officer left the chair and came down upon the floor to thunder upon this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, I said Jove came down.

Mr. FERRY. Jove, he stated, came down. I do not arrogate nor emulate. I leave the Senator at liberty to do so. The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] stated that the Senator from Michigan called upon the friends of this bill as though the Senators of that State were alone the friends of this bill, and so the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] could not resist the temptation to rise and say that Michigan had received 11,000,000 acres of land for internal improvements. It is, Mr. President, a very mixed suggestion to cite an appropriation of lands for internal improvements years past on an appropriation bill of to-day for rivers and harbors.

Mr. President, by the generosity of this body I have been charged with the responsible duties of the chair which you now occupy, and I think I have shown my appreciation of that designation by the constancy with which I have attempted to fill it. When a harbor and river bill is before the Senate for consideration, Michigan having a coast of over seventeen hundred miles, which is 15 per cent. of the whole coast of the nation, with an annual commerce in number of vessels cleared and tonnage of 49 per cent. as to vessels and 34 per cent. in tonnage as compared to the whole coastwise trade of the country, I ask whether it would become my duty and whether I should ignore my obligation to the State I in part represent by remaining in the chair and by not taking the floor in fidelity to the interests of my State? Could I be so indifferent to what so largely concerns the State of Michigan? Senators will bear me out that I do not unnecessarily occupy the floor, and I should not have done so on this occasion had not my State been directly and largely interested in the bill. It then became my duty to do it, and I should have been unworthy my trust if I had not. What has been my course upon this bill? When I found the Committee on Appropriations in their labors incident to the reference of this bill to that committee encountering perplexity and difficulty in finding some principle upon which they could be just and impartial to the whole country, I acquiesced in the policy which they settled upon, but with notice that I would appeal to the Senate. I ask the Senate whether I did or did not in the best of spirit make that appeal to their judgment upon the report of that committee? I stated then, as I state now, that the committee of the Senate fixed upon the same amount substantially that the House of Representatives fixed. They added less than $40,000. I think the chairman stated that the committee had increased the bill $36,000. I want that borne in mind when I recall the proposition I made on Saturday to concur in the House bill. I was advancing the policy of economy when I did it. When I discovered on that day that the bill was being loaded down, I suggested that by falling back upon the House bill we should save a large amount and have a more economical bill.

Now, Mr. President, in regard to the State of New York; and I refer to it in good temper. The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] alluded to Michigan while I was in the chair, and drew comparisons and made reflections prejudicial to her standing in this bill.

Mr. CONKLING. I must beg the Senator's pardon. I did not allude to Michigan. It was a French king I believe who said "I am the state." The Senator does not mean to say that; and unless he is the State I did not allude to Michigan. I alluded to his calling upon the friends of the bill to take the House bill as it was. That certainly was not an allusion to the State of Michigan.

Mr. FERRY. No, Mr. President, that is a fine distinction, but bears the like implication that "I assumed to be the State." The honorable Senator referred then to the appeal I made to the Senate that the friends of the bill should stand by the House bill if the Senate bill could not be passed. If I was mistaken in the implication of the Senator, I ask his pardon and I take it back.

Now I will, as he did, draw a comparison, because it fits the case in hand; and I do it, as I said before, fortified by the fact that I have voted for every increase of appropriation for the State of New York. If I had opposed any appropriation for that State I could not fairly indulge in this illustration. The Senate committee in their report recommended for the State of New York $191,000 more than the House bill contained for that State. It was due to New York. I make no complaint of it. That was 37 per cent. of increase over the House bill for the State of New York. The Senate, by non-concurring in committee amendments, increased this so that the bill now gives New York $230,000 instead of $191,000 increase over the House bill, being an increase by the committee and by the Senate as the bill now stands over the House bill of 45 per cent. I do not imply that that is more than New York should have; it is not; and I am glad that I aided in giving her that amount; but when Michigan is invidiously arrayed I desire that justice should be done to that State. What are the facts? The Senate committee reported less for Michigan than the House bill gave her by over $44,000—a percentage of decrease on the House bill of over 8 per cent., instead of an increase of 37 per cent. as in the case of New York. The Senate in the progress of the bill added to this for Michigan, so that the bill as it stands to-day gives $3,000 more to Michigan than the House bill gave to her, instead of an increase of $230,000 as was given New York, being for Michigan an increase of $\frac{1}{70}$ of 1 per cent. and for New York an increase of 45 per cent. I was careful on Saturday to say that I was willing, if the disposition was to kill the bill, to fall back upon the House bill as more economical than the Senate bill. I was careful not to urge that the Senate bill be taken because it involved even a small increase to Michigan in the aggregate, for I might have been taunted with the fact that well I might because it was an increase over the House bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do you say that the committee reported an increase over the House bill?

Mr. FERRY. I did not. If the Senator had paid attention to what I said he would have understood that I did not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I paid the strictest attention.

Mr. FERRY. I said the Senate bill reported for Michigan less than the House bill gave her by over $44,000. I add that in the progress of the bill up to its present condition the Senate had added thereto until Michigan has more than the House bill by $3,000, as the bill now stands amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do I understand you to say that the Senate committee reported more for Michigan than the House bill contained?

Mr. FERRY. I repeat, no; the Senator is less astute than he usually is, or he does not give attention to my words, or else I have a very blundering way of expressing myself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Something is the matter, evidently.

Mr. FERRY. Evidently there is. I will again repeat what I did say and ask the special attention of the Senator. The Senate committee reported upon the House bill referred to them a decrease of $44,000 for Michigan, which was of course less than the House bill gave by $44,000. Does the Senator understand me so far now?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, I have got as far as that.

Mr. FERRY. In the progress of this bill in its consideration here in the Senate by non-concurring in the amendments proposed by the committee the Senate so far increased the appropriations to Michigan as to make the aggregate for that State more than the bill as it came from the House by $3,000. Does the Senator understand me throughout?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I understand it.

Mr. FERRY. Therefore I say I hesitated on Saturday to urge any preference for this bill as it stands amended by the Senate because it increased the appropriation for Michigan. Now, since I have stated the fact, I will say that I am willing to vote and I shall vote for this bill, notwithstanding amendments have been made which I wish had not been made; but I defer to the judgment of the Senate.

What was my proposition? On Saturday, when I discovered in the progress of the bill that certain Senators who first concurred with the amendments of the committee afterward non-concurred in their amendments and still further retraced their steps in order to reconsider the concurrence with the committee and by that means increasing the appropriations to the various States—when I discovered what was being done and which was not only palpable to the Senate but was freely stated within our hearing, that loading down the bill would be an effectual way of defeating it, I proposed then in order to save some bill that the House bill be agreed to. I did this when it was indicated by the proposition of the Senator from Vermont to recommit the bill upon a basis of four million——

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was not my proposition.

Mr. FERRY. No; but left the Secretary of War to distribute the money.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You said to recommit. I made no such proposition. My proposition was to amend by providing four millions.

Mr. FERRY. I stand corrected, not in amount, but in form. The proposition of the Senator from Vermont was a substitute for the bill by placing four millions in the hands of the War Department to be distributed by the judgment of that Department. The proposition of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] was to recommit the bill with instructions to the committee to insert four millions as the basis, and that the committee frame the distribution. I foresaw, by the former labors and perplexity of the committee, that it would be almost an impossibility to make such a distribution and give as much satisfaction as they had given by their report. I moved an amendment to those instructions, that the committee be instructed to insert the House bill. At the instance of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] I withdrew that amendment on his suggestion that we should non-concur in all these motions and non-concur with the Senate amendments and the amendments of the committee, and thus be brought back to the House bill, in accordance with the proposition I first made.

Now, Mr. President, let me consider for a moment whether or not the House bill is in the interest of economy. I have no official scruples; I have no etiquette; no sensibility to be vexed by agreeing to the House bill, and thus affirming the judgment of the House. I reiterate what I said on Saturday, that I believe each member of Congress knows more and better of the interests of his locality and of his own congressional district than a Senator can representing in part a State; at least I will assume that as to myself, and as I am a peer with others here it cannot be unfair to ascribe it to others, and until they can show to the contrary the position I will assume to be a sound one. Familiar as I am with my native State, I accord to the different members from Michigan of the other House greater knowledge of their districts, and I have acted on that basis when the amount of appropriation for the State was assigned by the committee of the House, for I co-operated with them in State distribution within the limits thus apportioned to the State.

In doing that I showed by my action that I conceded that the members from Michigan of the House understood the interests of their districts better than I. On Saturday last I appealed to the friends of the pending bill, whoever they might be, without intimating who the friends of the bill were. I made that broad appeal, which would include every sympathizer and friend of the bill. It included myself and it included others; and if it excluded any, it was by their own election and action, not by mine. My appeal was solely for the purpose of saving some bill. I foresaw the objection to placing $4,000,000 in the hands of any committee and charging them with the perplexing and almost impracticable duty of adjusting it to the satisfaction of this body or the other, and unwilling to impose the burden or the trial, much less to cast in any way reflection upon the committee; far from it. I could not concur in such a proposition.

Now, let me see whether the House of Representatives in framing this bill acted in the interest of economy. No exception, I take it, will be taken because it originated in the proper House as has been the custom heretofore. There has been nothing irregular about that. The bill came from the House as it always does. The Senator from West Virginia commented upon what had been said by the Senator from New York, within the proprieties of the rule of course, in giving the history of the progress of the bill in the House. That history which the Senator from New York gave is the history of the progress of this bill not only but many others on numerous other occasions in the House, as we all know; and if I were to know or could know what had occurred in the Committee of the Senate on Appropriations I should assume that the business had been submitted to a subcommittee in order to economize time and facilitate progress, then reported to the general committee. I do not know that to be so, but I should suppose it to be so. It is customary in much of the business transacted by either body; and as that was the case in the House, as stated by the Senator from New York, it may be a fair presumption that it was so in the Senate. I do not state it; but as was said of the House, it may be said to be the common procedure in legislative bodies. When the bill was reported to the House, as stated by the Senator from West Virginia, it lay upon the tables in print several days, for a week at least, and then the rule was suspended by two-thirds vote and the bill was upon the previous question passed. I see nothing especially singular nor irregular in that. It is a common practice

Now, Mr. President, I come to the course the House has taken in respect of this bill, and cannot see that there is anything especially political in it. The Senator from Indiana has well stated that this is not a political bill. If we wanted any more evidence of that it lies in the fact of the division to-day upon the merits of the bill on either side of this Chamber. The Senator from West Virginia differed with others of his political confrères, showing that there is no political complexion given to the bill. It is for the interests of commerce throughout this country.

It is not strange that in the framing of this bill for all sections and all States there should be a difference of opinion, and some places and States getting more than others. There is nothing strange in that. On a bill of this character I find no difficulty in concurring with the House of Representatives, the larger body of the people, who are as well calculated to suit the interests of the localities as members of this body who represent States. I have so believed in regard to the interests of my own State and have so acted. Without any abdication of rights or trust I can cheerfully do this with no violation of feeling nor breach of etiquette between the two Houses. I do not feel that it is surrendering to the House of Representatives. It simply is concurring in the judgment of the co-ordinate branch of Congress. I say it is merely fortifying our own judgment with the judgment of the House. I am reminded by the fact that the Committee on Appropriations reported to this body for its action substantially the same amount contained in the House bill. To that extent the committee of this body verified the judgment of the House, although in its distribution the two differed. It was a very natural incident to differ upon that; but when they came to the same amount, to that extent they concurred in judgment.

We as a Senate have increased the bill by the amount of $800,000. We have differed with the judgment of the House. I am willing now to adopt the Senate bill as it stands to-day. I shall vote against the recommittal proposed by the Senator from Ohio. I shall vote to disagree to the substitute offered by the Senator from Vermont. I shall then vote for the bill as it now stands. If it is not to carry I shall then non-concur in the Senate and committee amendments and take the House bill.

Why do I do this? At the opening of the bill I stated that I would vote for non-concurrence in the committee's amendments on the statement of any Senator giving good reasons for the appropriation, and have so voted. Wherever there was a failure to do so, I did not vote against the action of the committee. But when the Senators gave good reasons, as I professed and tried to give in the case of appropriations for Michigan, I voted for their amendments and non-concurred in the amendments of the committee precisely as I did in the case of my own State.

Probably in some cases we have placed upon this bill amounts that we should not: but that is an inevitable sequence of any bill. You please every State. You cannot adjust this bill to every section upon principles of entire justice. It must be based upon a principle of practical sense; upon a policy of giving to the different sections the best we can under the circumstances for the interests of commerce; for this distribution involves easier and cheaper transportation and the growth and development of the country. I dismiss it from the plane of politics and I place it upon an industrial basis. It commends itself to the people, and it may be to the other branch of Congress, and to this

Mr. President, failing, if I should with others with my vote in passing this bill as it now stands, I shall then vote to non-concur in all the amendments of the Senate and committee, and fall back upon the House bill. The House has given us a bill less in amount than last year. The bill of last year was $6,293,000; the bill of this year is $5,872,000, a reduction of $400,000 and over. The House having acted to that extent in the interest of economy, I am not far from such commendable landmark when I stand upon the House bill. If I cannot get the Senate bill, notwithstanding it increases it $800,000, I will as the only resort support the House bill. This will accord with a spirit of economy, and will commend itself to good judgment and to the people.

I am surprised at the implication that when we originate bills and they go to the House, and the House concurs, or when the House originates bills and they come here and the Senate concurs, it should be considered a surrender of either House to the other. No, Mr. President, it is an affirmation in our official capacity and upon our best judgment, that the other House is right. And so when we pass a bill and the other House concurs they also affirm our judgment to be best and that the Senate is right. So I have no feeling in this respect. I care not for such a matter where a bill originates. All that I care is that it shall be measurably just; all that I ask is that it shall in the main be in the interest of economy; and the most I do care is that a bill of this character shall commend itself to the judgment of the people and shall conserve their best interests. I appeal to Senators if the people have not generally accorded with what has been done on river and harbor bills.

In 1871 the river and harbor appropriation bill aggregated $4,800,000; in 1872, $5,400,000; in 1873, $6,300,000; in 1874, $5,500,000; in 1875, $6,290,000, and this bill from the House proposes $5,800,000. It is therefore less than the bill of last year; and we cannot by comparison of the two years past be chargeable with extravagance.

Now, Mr. President, I conclude. Nor have I occupied much of the time of the Senate; but I have claimed this much as a right; and whenever the State of Michigan is concerned it shall be my duty, together with my colleague, to defend the interests of the State we have the honor to represent; and I should be recreant to that State and to the country of which she forms so valuable and honorable a part, if I failed to maintain her rights.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the Senator from California would let me make a little speech.

Mr. SARGENT. I yield.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not want more than three-quarters of an hour; but if the Senate desire an executive session, I have no objection to postponing what I have to say.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator has no preference——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I had just as soon speak to-morrow.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, before submitting that motion the Chair will lay before the Senate some House bills for reference.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think we can dispose of these bills in the morning hour to-morrow at their proper time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at five o'clock and thirteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, July 17, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

NEW YORK POST-OFFICE.

Mr. POPPLETON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings, presented a report of their subcommittee on the expenditure of public moneys in the construction of the post-office building in the city of New York, the furnishing of the same, &c., and moved that the report, together with the testimony, be printed and lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. When the House adjourned on Saturday, I was in possession of the floor for the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee in regard to Texas border troubles.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That cannot interfere with the morning hour on Monday. The morning hour begins at twelve minutes past twelve o'clock; and this being Monday, the first business in order is the call of the States and Territories, beginning with the State of Maine, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back on motions to reconsider. Under this call memorials and resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures may be presented for reference and printing.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

Mr. HOPKINS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3897) providing for the construction of the Washington monument; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. FOSTER. I call for the reading of the bill at length.

The bill was read at length, and was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and was ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate was ready to proceed upon the impeachment of William W. Belknap and to receive the managers on the part of the House, and that the Senate Chamber was prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

N. P. CHEDESTER.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3898) for the relief of N. P. Chedester, of North Carolina; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. FOSTER called for the reading of the bill.

The joint resolution is as follows:

Joint resolution instructing our Senators and requesting our Representatives in Congress to ask protection for the frontier, and compensation for past expenditures by the State in that behalf.

Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Texas, That the Federal Government owes to Texas protection of her exposed frontiers, by virtue of her right as a member of the Union, to an equal participation in the benefits and blessings which its Constitution guarantees to all the States, among which is defense against invasion; and the republic of Texas, upon her accession to the Union, having ceded to the United States all public edifices, fortifications, barracks, ports and harbors, navy and navy-yards, docks, magazines, arms, armaments, and all other property and means pertaining to the public defense, the faith of the United States thereby became solemnly pledged to extend to the frontiers of the said republic of Texas the most ample protection, without which, as a condition-precedent, Texas would have had no sufficient inducement to surrender her independent political position.

SEC. 2. That our Senators in the Congress of the United States are hereby instructed, and our Representatives are hereby requested, to present to Congress now assembled these resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Texas, and to urge upon that body the enactment of such laws as will secure to our frontiers ample military protection against Indians and Mexican freebooters; the military forces of the United States on our borders being too weak, under the most effective command, to afford such protection, and the State of Texas being compelled in defense of the property and lives of her citizens to maintain in the field a considerable military force at her own expense.

SEC. 3. That our said Senators be instructed and our Representatives requested to present and urge before Congress the passage of a bill re-imbursing the State of Texas for the large appropriations of money which from time to time have necessarily been made by her Legislature because of the failure of the Federal Government to provide sufficient protection to our frontiers.

SEC. 4. That the governor of the State be requested to transmit to our Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of these resolutions, together with an itemized statement of all expenditures made by the State in the protection of her frontiers.

SEC. 5. The fact that Congress will adjourn at an early day and the necessity for prompt action requires that this joint resolution take effect, and it is hereby declared that it do take effect, from and after its passage.

Approved July 6, 1876.

THE STATE OF TEXAS,

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would; but the first question to be put under the rules is upon the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I have been informed by several gentlemen that they desire to discuss this bill. ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HURLBUT. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. PIPER. Then I call for the regular order of business.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. At the time of the adjournment on Monday last, the yeas and nays had been ordered upon the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. PIPER] to suspend the rules and pass the resolution which the Clerk will read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a point of order. The motion to suspend the rules having failed on Monday last by reason of adjournment, it cannot now come up as unfinished business. Each motion to suspend the rules is independent and of itself. If the House failed by adjournment to suspend the rules on the day the motion is made, it cannot again come up as unfinished business.

Mr. PIPER. The unfinished business was the calling of the yeas and nays, which had been ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In this instance the yeas and nays had been ordered, and the House was about to proceed to vote when the motion to adjourn was made and carried. It seems to the Chair but fair to recognize the motion to suspend the rules and pass the resolution as now coming up as unfinished business. The gentleman from California [Mr. PIPER] is entitled to the vote which was ordered upon his motion. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Senate has passed a resolution authorizing the appointment of a committee of three Senators to visit the Pacific coast and report to Congress, at its next session, upon the character, extent, and effect of Chinese immigration into this country:

Resolved, That the Speaker is hereby authorized to appoint three members of this House to proceed to the Pacific coast, after the adjournment of Congress, to investigate, conjointly with said Senate committee or otherwise, the extent and effect of Chinese immigration into this country, with power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to employ a stenographer, and to take evidence; said committee to report to Congress at its next session.

Mr. HOLMAN. In order to save time, I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered upon this motion, as I presume there will be no objection to the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. If there be no objection, I would like to have inserted in this proposition an appropriation of $6,000 to meet the necessary expenses of the committee already appointed by the Senate and the committee which may be appointed by the House. An effort was made to insert such an appropriation in the sundry civil bill while it was before the committee of conference; but it could not be done because there was nothing in controversy between the two Houses relating to that subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. The difficulty is that this is not a joint resolution. An appropriation must be made by the action of both Houses.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I will hereafter present a separate proposition for the necessary appropriation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume there is no objection to this resolution; and on that account it is hardly desirable to occupy time in calling the yeas and nays.

Mr. LUTTRELL. What is the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Do I understand this to be a joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is a simple resolution; and discussion of it is not in order.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 186, nays 14, not voting 86; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr., John H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Banning, Blackburn, Blair, Bland, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, William R. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, William H. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, White, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, James Williams, James Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, Woodworth, and Yeates—86.

So the motion to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution was agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. CUTLER. My colleague, Mr. HAMILTON of New Jersey, is detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. TUCKER. My colleagues, Mr. GOODE and Mr. HUNTON, are detained from the House by sickness; and my colleague, Mr. CABELL, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I am requested to state that Mr. G. WILEY WELLS is detained at home by illness.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

MAJOR FOSTER A. HIXON.

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. Speaker, in the RECORD of the 1st instant I find among the bills recorded as having passed Senate bill No. 333 for the relief of Major Foster A. Hixon, late a paymaster in the Army. Upon inquiry of the Clerk I learn that this is an erroneous statement, that in fact the bill was not passed. Inasmuch as I am obliged to be absent from the House during the remainder of the week engaged in the trial in the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, in order that it may now be considered in the House and put on its passage.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the House proceeded to consider it.

The bill was read. It provides that the claim of Major Foster A. Hixon, late a paymaster in the Army of the United States, to be credited in the settlement of his accounts with the sum of $10,000, which he claims was stolen from him at Charleston, South Carolina, on the 1st of March, 1867, be referred to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department, with directions to examine the same; and if they shall be satisfied from the evidence presented that he suffered such loss, without any negligence on his part, and that it is equitable and just, they shall allow him the amount as a credit in the settlement of his accounts.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LAPHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION CONTEST—PLATT VS. GOODE.

Mr. BROWN, of Kansas. I am directed by the Committee of Elections to submit a report in the contested-election case of Platt vs. Goode, from the second congressional district of Virginia. I give notice that I shall call it up at the earliest practicable moment.

The report, which was accompanied by the following resolutions, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That John Goode, jr., was not elected, and is not entitled, to a seat in the House of Representatives in the Forty-fourth Congress from the second congressional district of Virginia.

Resolved, That James H. Platt, jr., was elected, and is entitled, to a seat in the Forty-fourth Congress as Representative from the second district of Virginia.

Mr. BLACKBURN, by unanimous consent, submitted a statement of the views of a minority of the Committee of Elections upon the same case; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The resolution accompanying the report of the minority is as follows:

Resolved, That John Goode, jr., was elected, and is entitled, to the seat which he now holds in the House of Representatives in the Forth-fourth Congress from the second congressional district of Virginia.

E. K. SNEAD, DECEASED.

Mr. TUCKER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3921) for the relief of E. K. Snead, deceased, and his sureties, for loss of certain books of special stamps and coupons; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

G. T. BEAUREGARD.

Mr. TUCKER. I move, by unanimous consent, to take from the Speaker's table a bill (S. No. 952) to remove the political disabilities of G. T. Beauregard, of New Orleans, Louisiana.

There was no objection, and the bill was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides (two-thirds of each House concurring therein) that the political disabilities imposed upon G. T. Beauregard, of New Orleans, Louisiana, by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States by reason of participation in the rebellion are hereby removed.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

CUSTER'S COMMAND.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I move to suspend the rules and pass a bill granting a pension to the heirs of the officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates who belonged to the command of Brevet Major-General George A. Custer, and were killed in the recent battle with hostile Indians in the Little Big Horn Mountain.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill granting relief to the heirs of the officers and men who fell in the recent Indian fight on the Little Big Horn River, under the command of Brevet Major-General George A. Custer.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, instructed to ascertain the name of each officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, and private who belonged to the command of Brevet Major-General George A. Custer, who was killed in the recent battle upon the Little Big Horn River, and also to ascertain the name of each of their heirs who would be entitled to pensions, and to place the names of such heirs upon the pension-rolls, according to the rank of said officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, and private, at such rate of pension as $50 per month bears to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, subject to the limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill be again read; it does not seem to change existing law, and if it does not, it certainly is not necessary to re-enact the law over again.

The bill was again read.

Mr. JENKS. I move the bill be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not in order. The question is, Will the House suspend the rules and pass the bill?

The House divided; and there were—ayes 51, noes 78.

Mr. MACDOUGALL demanded the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Thirteen have voted in the affirmative, which is not a sufficient number.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House has refused (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) to suspend the rules, and the bill therefore is not before the House.

SPECIE RESUMPTION.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to suspend the rules and adopt the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be, and they are, instructed to report to the House, immediately after the reading of the Journal tomorrow, the following bill; and that said bill shall be subject to amendment in the House before the previous question is moved, to wit:

A bill to repeal the resumption clause of an act approved January 14, 1875.

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payment," approved January 14, 1875, as provides for the redemption of United States legal-tender notes be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. HOSKINS demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 102, nays 92, not voting 92; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, John H. Baker, Beebe, Bland, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, John H. Caldwell, William P. So (two-thirds not having voted in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. JENKS. My colleague from Pennsylvania, Mr. STENGER, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. OLIVER. I am paired with my colleague from Iowa, Mr. MCCRARY. If he were here he would vote "no," and I should vote "ay."

Mr. DARRALL. On this question I am paired with my colleague from Louisiana, Mr. ELLIS. If present he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 722) for the relief of Charles F. Chandler; and

A bill (S. No. 781) for the relief of the estate of Amos Ireland, deceased.

NORTH CAROLINA OFFICIAL RECORDS.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I ask unanimous consent to have put upon its passage at this time the joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

A joint resolution instructing the Secretary of War to forward to the State of North Carolina authenticated copies of certain State records captured in 1865.

Whereas there are in the War Department sundry letter-books of the executive office of the State of North Carolina which were removed from Raleigh in 1865, upon the surrender of that city to the Army of the United States.

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of War is hereby instructed to cause complete and accurate copies of all such letter-books pertaining to the State of North Carolina to be made without delay, and forward said copies, duly authenticated by the seal of his Department, to the executive office of said State.

Mr. HURLBUT. I wish to ask the gentleman from North Carolina what is the authority for the statement in the preamble. I desire that he shall state where he gets the information and what the character of these books is. Until he makes that statement I reserve the right to object.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. These letters are nothing but copies of the executive correspondence of North Carolina for several gubernatorial terms, which were brought here, as was proper to be done. And it is desired that copies shall now be forwarded to the executive office of the State.

Mr. KASSON. Was this correspondence during the period of the confederate government?

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. Yes, sir; and before that period, I believe.

Mr. HALE. I would ask the gentleman if he has made application to the Department for copies? Why, before submitting a resolution of this kind, does the gentleman not go to the Department and see if there is any objection to granting his request?

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I suppose there can be no objection to passing this resolution directing the Secretary to have copies made and forwarded.

Mr. KASSON. I presume there would be no objection unless as regards the question of the clerical force that would be required to do this work. The resolution directs this to be done "without delay" I think the gentleman should present a letter from the Department as a basis for the resolution.

Mr. HALE. The Department would not object if it be a proper thing.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. There are only two or three letters and the copying would not take up much time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. Then I move that the rules be suspended and that the joint resolution be passed.

The question being taken on suspending the rules, there were—yeas 99, noes 47.

So the rules were suspended, (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof,) and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 152) was passed.

INVESTIGATION OF WHISKY FRAUDS IN SAINT LOUIS.

Mr. COCHRANE. I move that the rules be suspended and the following resolution adopted:

Resolved, That leave be, and the same is hereby, granted to the Select Committee to Investigate the Whisky Frauds at Saint Louis to have printed the testimony heretofore taken by said committee; said testimony, when printed, to be referred back to said committee.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the resolution was adopted.

COMMITTEE-CLERK.

Mr. POWELL. I am instructed by the Committee of Accounts to offer the resolution which I send to the desk; and I move that the rules be suspended and that the resolution be adopted.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department be, and is hereby, allowed the services of a clerk for the term of sixty days from the 30th day of May, 1876, at the rate of compensation heretofore paid him, if the session of Congress shall continue for that length of time.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the resolution was adopted.

WAR EXPENSES IN OREGON AND CALIFORNIA.

Mr. LANE. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 147) to authorize the Secretary of War to pay the expenses incurred by the State of Oregon and citizens of California in suppressing hostilities in the States of Oregon and California in the years 1872 and 1873, and that the same be passed.

Mr. COX. I call for the reading of the report accompanying the bill.

Mr. LANE. The bill has been reported by the Committees on Military Affairs of the last and the present Congresses.

The bill, as proposed to be amended, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be the duty of the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to examine and determine the amounts justly due to the State of Oregon and citizens of California upon claims for expenses incurred in suppressing the Modoc Indian hostilities in the States of Oregon and California in the years 1872 and 1873; and the sums found due to the State of Oregon shall be paid to the State of Oregon upon the presentation of evidence to the accounting officers of the Treasury that the State of Oregon, by act of its Legislature, has assumed the payment of the claims to the original holders thereof or to their assigns; and the sums found due to citizens of California shall be paid to the persons entitled thereto by a disbursing officer, under the direction of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 2. That for the payment of the claims of the State of Oregon the sum of $70,268.88, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and for the payment of the claims of citizens of California the sum of $4,441.63, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and hereby is, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Oregon whether this latter item of four thousand four hundred odd dollars to be paid to citizens of California was found to be due by the commission appointed by the last Congress?

Mr. LANE. Yes, sir; that amount was found due, and the Committee on Military Affairs has reduced it by the proposed amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Are all the sums contained in this bill the sums found due by that commission?

Mr. LANE. Yes, but the Committee on Military Affairs have reduced the amount below that reported by the commission.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much is the reduction?

Mr. LANE. Two thousand dollars as to Oregon and about $200 as to California.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot imagine that any member of this House can object to this bill, as reported with amendments by the Committee on Military Affairs, except it should be myself. That committee is composed of honorable, able, and, best of all, pure and good men. They are wholly incapable of doing an intentional wrong, and therefore I should not and I will not complain of their action. I am constrained to say, however, in justice to myself that, in my opinion, the bill as introduced by me was entitled to the favorable consideration of this body. Most certainly I introduced it in good faith. With the history of the Modoc war the gentlemen of this House are familiar. It was a remarkable and will doubtless prove a memorable contest. These Indians, vicious and desperately bad men, had by treaty of the 14th day of October, 1864, ceded their land or right of occupancy, for I recognize no other title in the Indians, to the United States and agreed to go upon the reservation provided for them. Notwithstanding this solemn cession of their territory they continued to claim ownership therein and to exact contributions, rents, &c., from the settlers thereon. That there may have been a laxity in the discipline at the Klamath agency I am neither prepared to assert nor deny; but if such was the case, it would rather increase than diminish the responsibility of the General Government. Sure it is the Indians were not confined to the reservation, but, on the contrary, went beyond the limits thereof, committing depredations upon the whites, stealing cattle, horses, and sheep, and otherwise seriously annoying them.

The Indian department in Oregon finally, in response to frequent appeals from settlers, and in accordance with duty, sought by peaceable means to induce these Indians to keep their treaty and return to the reservation. All measures of a pacific character failed. In November, 1872, the superintendent of Indian affairs in Oregon having conferred with and acting under instructions from the Indian Department at Washington, proceeded to Link River, near the reservation, for the purpose of requiring the recusant Modocs to comply with the stipulations of the treaty. The instructions were to use peaceable means if possible, forcible if necessary. As I have indicated, peaceable means failed, and on the 29th day of November, 1872, Major Jackson, of the United States Army, who was endeavoring to execute the order of the superintendent for the removal of the Indians, was resisted and his troops were fired upon by them. The war then began. On that night eleven citizens were massacred, and on the day following seven more fell victims to savagery of the infamous red scoundrels under the command of Captain Jack and the immediate lead of Hooker Jim. Husbands were murdered in presence of their wives, and harmless, innocent children were tortured to death within the gaze of their unhappy mother.

But it is unnecessary to dwell upon these horrors. Owing to the character of the country in which the Indians sought refuge and whence they directed their operations, the war assumed very serious proportions. Dismay spread throughout the exposed settlement. The United States troops were insufficient to guarantee immediate protection. An urgent demand was therefore made upon Governor Grover for troops to protect the lives and property of our citizens and to secure the rites of burial to the dead. In response to these demands the governor, who was vigilant as well as cautious, prompt as well as careful, called out troops, purchased supplies, and provided the necessary transportation. These troops co-operated with the regular Army and acted under the orders of the regular Army officers, and it is conceded their services were valuable indeed, and even absolutely necessary to secure protection to the lives and property of citizens in that exposed region.

Under the first call two companies were raised composed of one hundred and twenty-eight men, officers and privates. Their average service was fifty-two days, from December, 1872, to February, 1873. They participated in the first fight, that of January 17, 1873. The result of that engagement was unfortunate. The lava beds furnished to the Indians a fortification more secure and, for the character of their warfare, more formidable than art could provide. The volunteers, however, displayed that valor which always distinguishes the frontier soldier. Had it not been for their presence and assistance on that day the fate of the regular soldiers, and gallant, brave souls they were, from commander to private, might have been painful indeed to contemplate.

After the assassination of the peace commissioners, April 11, 1873, and the breaking out of new hostilities, a second call, justified by the extraordinary emergency of the occasion, was made, and three companies, comprising one hundred and fifty men, officers and privates, were then furnished by the State. Their average service was forty-four days, from May until the close of the war. The last capture, numbering a dozen warriors, including one of the murderers of General Canby, was made by the Oregon volunteers under the command of General Ross.

After the suppression of hostilities the board of State auditors, organized according to the laws of Oregon, consisting of governor, secretary of state, and the adjutant-general, assembled at Salem and proceeded to audit the accounts, so far as to ascertain and determine the indebtedness of the State to individuals arising from services as soldiers for supplies and transportation. The board allowed $2 per day for private soldiers and $2 per day for private horses engaged in the service, the State purchasing supplies and procuring transportation upon credit, and under most pressing circumstances may have been compelled—I do not know that it was so—in certain instances to pay higher rates than were paid for similar services and supplies by the officers of the regular Army who purchased for cash. This board found due from the State to citizens for services and supplies heretofore mentioned the sum of $131,000, and on the 22d day of October, 1874, the Legislature of that State passed a law providing for the payment of the entire amount so found due, and that, too, in gold coin of the United States.

Recognizing the legal obligation of the Government to make reimbursement, Congress by act approved June, 1874, directed the Secretary of War to ascertain the amount of the expenses incurred by the State of Oregon and citizens of California in suppressing the Indian hostilities referred to. General James A. Hardie, Inspector-General United States Army, was detailed for that purpose. From an examination of his report, as well as from my personal observation, he performed that task with much care, but unfortunately, and I think unjustly, from a strict military point of view and not in that spirit of equity and justice that should influence Congress in the premises. In General Hardie's report he recommends the payment of $72,637.83 to the State of Oregon and to re-imburse the citizens of California the sum of $4,621.33. The Government has acknowledged, and very justly, too, its liability, but by General Hardie's report it is sought to reduce the amount to be paid. The Committee on Military Affairs seem to concur in this view.

Is it just to confine the State in this matter to the rules governing the regular Army? I think not. It may be true that it cost the State of Oregon for supplies and transportation more than it did the United States, but I apprehend it was only the difference between cash and credit. It was certainly the temporary inability of the Government to furnish adequate protection for its citizens that Oregon was required to ask for any credit whatever. True we could not obtain volunteers at less than the price audited, but it was the fault of the Government and not of my people that the State of Oregon was compelled to ask for soldiers at all. The compensation of volunteers under these circumstances should not be measured by the pay allowed the regular soldier. In the one instance the enlistment is for a long period, business arrangements are made with that view, and no pecuniary sacrifice is required. In the other, the case of the volunteers, the enlistment is for the war only, homes are deserted, families abandoned, business suspended, and the brave fellows go to the front to fight, to suffer, to shoot, and be shot at. They enjoy not the ease and comfort and security of a soldier in peace, but nobly welcome the dangers and cheerfully endure the privations of war. I trust the value of our brave volunteers in such emergencies will not be depreciated or their services underestimated. When the danger is greatest, when their valor, their patriotism is tested, they have always and most nobly and gallantly responded and have fully met the test and proved themselves adequate for the occasion. In this instance they only asked of the State compensation commensurate with their services and the sacrifices made. The State has honored the claim. Will the General Government fail to recognize its obligation to the State? We do not ask, although entitled to, full re-imbursement. The State pays in coin, while we only ask the currency of the Government.

As for the gallant citizens of California who rendered most valuable service, the Inspector-General recommends the payment of the amount embraced in the bill as introduced by myself. If the rule laid down by General Hardie is to prevail in all cases, what need have we for a standing army? If we can obtain volunteers whenever occasion demands who are to be paid only for the time actually engaged in war at the same price we obtain regular soldiers, then the soldier of peace is worse than useless; for I greatly doubt if he is even ornamental.

Understand me, however, I do not mean to antagonize the report of the committee, for I cannot afford to imperil the success of the bill even as amended. I repeat, that I doubt not the members of that committee are disposed to act fairly. I am only sorry that they did not view this matter as I do. I appreciate their situation. They could not forget that our Government is burdened with an immense debt; that our Treasury is depleted; that financial distress prevails throughout the country; that the melancholy "wail" of "hard times" comes up from the poor people throughout the land and from every direction. God grant that in the immediate future such change in the management of governmental affairs may be wrought that general relief may be obtained and that this distressful cry may cease, never to be heard more.

I have performed my duty. I accept the report of the committee. It is the best I can do. I sincerely trust at another time, another Congress, when the country is more prosperous, will be disposed to fill full the measure of justice for my State.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I was present at the time General Hardie, the commissioner appointed to take the testimony, took this testimony, and I know that the accounts are correct in every particular.

The question was taken on Mr. LANE'S motion, and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill, as amended, was passed.

ERROR IN ENROLLMENT.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask leave to offer the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the act approved July 12, 1876, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes," be amended as follows:

In line 36, section 7, of said act, as printed by authority of the Department of State, after the word "sums" strike out the word "not."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the House give its consent to the consideration of this resolution at this time?

Mr. CONGER. I must reserve the right to object until the matter is explained.

Mr. HOLMAN. The mistake was in the enrollment of the conference report; it was not in the engrossment of the House bill, nor in the proceedings prior to the passage of the bill through the Senate with amendments.

The mistake is as follows:

The language of the act was in line 36, section 7—

Two-thirds of 1 per cent. on all sums not over $640,000 and not exceeding $1,280,000

The first "not" should be stricken out from that passage.

No objection being made, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 153) received its several readings, and was engrossed and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I desire to offer a resolution for adoption now.

Mr. EDEN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

Mr. POPPLETON was granted leave of absence for three days.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, was granted an extension of his leave of absence for fifteen days.

Mr. HATHORN was granted leave of absence for one week on account of his health.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi, was granted leave of absence on account of sickness.

Mr. REA was granted leave of absence for six days.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent for leave to print in the RECORD, as a part of the debates, some remarks upon the German treaty and the bill of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] in relation to that subject.

There was no objection, and the leave was granted. [See Appendix.]

SALE OF INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. MORGAN. Pending the motion to adjourn, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. No. 779) to provide for the sale of the reservation of the confederated Otoe and Missouria Indians in the States of Kansas and Nebraska for the purpose of agreeing to the conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House thereto.

No objection was made.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed Mr. MORGAN, Mr. WILSHIRE, and Mr. PHILLIPS of Kansas as managers of the conference on the part of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The result of the vote on adjournment was then announced upon a division—ayes 91, noes 66.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, only 28 members voting therefor.

Mr. O'BRIEN and Mr. SPRINGER called for the yeas and nays.

The question was put on ordering the yeas and nays; and on a division there were—ayes 30, noes 87; so (one-fifth voting in favor thereof) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VANCE] pending at this time?

Mr. EDEN. I object to debate.

Mr. SPRINGER. Was that resolution entertained by the Chair?

Mr. MORRISON. That is no parliamentary inquiry; it is a false pretense.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is not.

Mr. EDEN. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that there is no difficulty about this matter. When the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VANCE] rose to offer his resolution the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] rose and moved to adjourn, and the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio was not forwarded to the desk or reported to the House and it is not therefore before the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. But he was recognized by the Chair. [Cries of "Regular order."]

The question was taken on Mr. EDEN's motion; and there were—yeas 99, nays 99, not voting 88; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashe, Atkins, John H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Bright, John Young Brown, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Samuel D. Burchard, William P. So the House refused to adjourn.

During the roll-call,

Mr. COCHRANE said my colleague, Mr. STENGER, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I desire to say that my colleague, Mr. BLACKBURN, has gone to his room sick.

Mr. MONROE. The gentleman who sits at my right, Mr. Ross, of Pennsylvania, is detained at his room by illness.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. FORT. I rise to a point of order. Does not the Speaker have the casting vote in case of a tie?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Speaker does not consider himself bound to adjourn the House; that is no part of his duty.

REPEAL OF RESUMPTION ACT.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I now move that the rules be suspended for the adoption of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the resolution offered by Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be, and they are hereby, instructed to report to the House immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow a bill to repeal the resumption-day clause of the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payment," approved January 14, 1875.

Mr. KASSON. Is it in order to make these indirect attacks on Governor Tilden from that side of the House? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa is entirely out of order in his remark. The only question is, Will the House suspend the rules and pass the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VANCE?]

Mr. FORT. And upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HUBBELL. Pending the motion to suspend the rules, I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has there been any intervening business since the House voted down a motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair regards the offering of a resolution, its reading by the Clerk, and the motion to suspend the rules and pass the resolution, as intervening business.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being 42 in the affirmative, more than one-fifth of the last vote.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 100, nays 90, not voting 96; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John H. Bagley, jr., William H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Bell, Blair, Bright, John Young Brown, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Samuel D. Before the result of the vote was announced, ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (S. No. 332) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1867, and for other purposes," approved June 22, 1874.

The result of the vote on the motion of Mr. HUBBELL was announced as above recorded; and accordingly (at three o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. DUNNELL: Protest of the people of Going Snake district, Indian Territory, against the establishment of a United States territorial government over the Indian country, to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. ELLIS: The petition of Mrs. Emily McKnight, that Congress confirm to her late husband's representatives the title to the lands known as the Navy Commissioners' Islands, Louisiana, to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Also, papers relating to the claim of G. P. Work, for compensation for carrying the United States mail between New Orleans and Munroe, Louisiana, in 1866, 1867, 1868, and 1869, to the Committee of Claims.

Also, memorial of Mrs. Mary Camus, administratrix of the estate of Jacques Theodule Camus, deceased, for compensation for the use and occupation of certain wharves at New Orleans, Louisiana, by the United States Navy, to the same committee.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 18, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the first clause of the first rule read, to know whether we can approve the Journal in the present stage of proceeding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

1. The presiding officer having taken the chair, and a quorum being present, the Journal of the preceding day shall be read, to the end that any mistake may be corrected that shall be made in the entries.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal has already been read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It has not been approved?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been approved if there is objection. It will be considered approved if there be no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask if we have a quorum present?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The attention of the Chair being called to it, there is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary called the roll of the Senate, and thirty-seven Senators answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum being now present, the Journal will stand approved, if there be no objection.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. No. 3894) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Custer, widow of the late George A. Custer; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3896) granting a pension to Maria Custer and Emanuel H. Custer.

The following bill and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. No. 147) to authorize the Secretary of War to pay expenses incurred by the State of Oregon and citizens of California in suppressing Indian hostilities in the States of Oregon and California in the years 1872 and 1873; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 152) instructing the Secretary of War to forward to the State of North Carolina authenticated copies of certain State records captured in 1865.

ADVERSE REPORTS RECOMMITTED.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate that the bill (S. No. 738) for the relief of Withenbury and Doyle, reported adversely from the Committee on Claims, be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report. The day for a motion to reconsider is past, but the bill can be placed on the Calendar by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there unanimous consent to placing this bill on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee? The Chair hears no objection.

JAMES TEBAULT AND JAMES REID.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Some days since the Committee on Claims reported adversely upon the petition of James Tebault and James Reid and others, praying additional compensation as laborers in the Treasury Department. Other papers concerning that claim have been placed in my hands, and I ask that the papers on which the report was made may be recommitted with the additional testimony that has been submitted.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask that the bill (S. No. 953) to remove the political disabilities of John G. Walker, of Texas, be taken up and put on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business has not yet been called. Petitions and memorials are in order.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present the memorial of Mr. Joseph C. G. Kennedy, formerly the Superintendent of the Census, who was a delegate to, I think, the first statistical congress, and who represents that the report of the delegation to the last statistical congress, whereof Mr. Edward Young, of the Statistical Bureau of the Treasury Department, was chief, contains what purports to be a translation of the speech of Mr. Adolphe Quetelet, the celebrated statistician, in which reference was made to Mr. Kennedy as the originator of the idea of a statistical congress, and that this translation omits that passage referring to him. Mr. Kennedy states that as this document was printed by order of the Government, at the expense of the Government, and has the imprimatur of the Government upon it, it is a manifest injustice to him. A man's literary and scientific reputation is a part of his property which ought to be protected in every fair and honorable way. I desire to state that one of the delegates to that congress was a constituent of mine, Dr. Edwin M. Snow, and I would guarantee that this error, whether it was intentional or not, does not fall in any respect within his responsibility. If the error was unintentional it ought to be corrected. If it was intentional something more should be done. I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. OGLESBY. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1984) to provide for the sale of certain lands in Kansas, to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, as the land is Indian land and not public land, and is affected by Indian treaties.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2689) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Sioux City, Iowa, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 807) for the relief of John E. Catlett, of Hannibal, Missouri, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 705) for the relief of Albert Towle, postmaster at Beatrice, Nebraska, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 516) for the relief of Floyd C. Babcock, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3435) providing for the adjustment of claims against the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

Mr. CAPERTON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3849) for the relief of James W. Harvey and James Livesey, of the firm of Harvey & Livesey, of Wisconsin, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOOTH, from the Committee on Public Lands, who were directed by a resolution of the Senate of the 27th of January last to inquire if the third section of an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, &c., has been complied with by the railroad company mentioned therein, and whether further legislation is necessary to carry that law into effect, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 995) in relation to the sale of lands granted to certain railroad companies.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed; and on motion of Mr. BOOTH the bill and the report were recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 988) authorizing the President to invite the international statistical congress to hold its tenth session in the United States, and to appoint delegates to the ninth session thereof, reported it without amendment.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 963) in relation to the cancellation of mortgages, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3625) providing for the sale of the Osage ceded lands in Kansas to actual settlers, have instructed me to report the same favorably with amendments. I believe it is not in order to ask for the consideration of a bill on the same day on which it is reported. The recent decision of the Supreme Court renders some action on this bill or a kindred bill essentially necessary. It affects an area of country some fifteen hundred square miles in extent, a little larger than the State of Rhode Island and but a trifle smaller than the State of Delaware, and directly or indirectly affects the homes of about thirty thousand people. I desire to give notice that to-morrow I shall ask unanimous consent during the morning hour for the consideration of the bill.

MISSISSIPPI INVESTIGATION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print four thousand copies of the report of the Special Committee to Investigate the late Election in Mississippi, to report it without amendment and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I inquire if the resolution includes the views of the minority?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly. I never knew a report to be printed on our side that did not include the views of the minority, if they wanted us to include them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. BOUTWELL July 13:

Resolved, That 4,000 copies of the report of the Special Committee to Investigate the late Election in Mississippi be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the language of the resolution does not provide for publishing the views of the minority.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator can amend it in that way if he desires; but it is unnecessary to do so.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move to add "and also the views of the minority thereon."

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well, I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. It should read, "the report of the committee, including the views of the minority."

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir; that is better.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We ought to find out whether there are any views of the minority ready.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not want the report delayed, and unless the views of the minority are presented at once it would be very inconvenient to the printer.

Mr. MORTON. Does the resolution include the testimony?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAULSBURY. My remembrance is that my colleague the other day moved to amend the resolution so as to include the views of the minority, but as it is reported the resolution does not contain the amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is possible; but the views of the minority would be printed whether the resolution included them expressly or not.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no doubt it is the desire of the committee to print the views of the minority, but I call attention to the language of the resolution itself.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let the amendment be put in, and that will settle it.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the views of the minority are to be published, it is certainly important to know if the views of the minority have been filed. That is one consideration.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know as to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] the colleague of the Senator, asked leave to file the views of the minority. I do not think this report ought to be delayed if the views of the minority have not been filed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. My impression is that my colleague amended the resolution when it was introduced for reference so as to include the views of the minority.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think he simply asked leave to file the views of the minority.

Mr. WITHERS. He asked that an amendment be made to this resolution itself.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think the majority report ought to be delayed if the views of the minority are not filed.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let the resolution be passed and we can provide for printing the views of the minority when presented.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I appeal to Senators that it would be a very unfair thing to publish the report of the majority with the testimony, without the views of the minority accompanying that report. It would be but slight recompense to the minority to publish in a separate manner their views. The views of the minority ought to accompany the report of the majority. That has always, I believe, been customary, and I am sure that was the object of my colleague.

Mr. ANTHONY. It has been customary for the minority to present their views. They certainly do not expect the Committee on Printing to make a minority report for them. We can do so, I suppose, if they want us to do it.

Mr. EATON. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution reported from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. EATON. As the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] is absent I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will consent to let the resolution lie on the table for the present.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would rather withdraw the report, and then perhaps I can get it before the Senate again with less difficulty.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think if Senators will listen a moment, they will see that there is no trouble about this report. The testimony taken by the committee is voluminous. It is now in the hands of the Printer. It is desired by the Printer that the Senate should decide whether there shall be an extra number of copies printed. This is a proposition for an extra number in order to avoid expense should the Senate desire to have more than the customary number. The committee has not consulted in regard to the report, I may say, and there is neither majority nor minority report prepared. It is my understanding that if the Senate decide that an additional number shall be printed, when the committee confer, if they agree the report of the committee will be printed with the testimony; if they disagree and there are two reports, the majority and the minority reports will be printed. The business now is with the testimony, to ascertain whether the Senate will order an extra number of copies or not. The report will be printed, whether there is one report or whether there are two.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think it is due to my colleague and due to the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MCDONALD,] neither of whom is in the Chamber, that this matter shall not be pressed to a final issue in their absence. I therefore hope the Senator from Massachusetts will consent to let the resolution lie over.

Mr. BOUTWELL. When it is understood that the whole report shall be printed, and that, if there are two reports, both shall be printed, I cannot see any objection to passing this resolution. It is very important to the Printer. The work of printing the testimony is now delayed because they have not type enough to go on, as I understand, and leave that stand which has been used.

Mr. MORTON. They will have to distribute and set up the type again, if the work cannot be done at once.

Mr. BOUTWELL. They will have to set the type again. The reports will both be printed. Gentlemen need not be concerned about any difficulty in printing the views of the minority. They will have the same circulation as the views of the majority. I hope there will be no objection to the resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will answer the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware, my colleague on the Printing Committee. His colleague desires this report to be printed, and of course he expects it to be printed with the views of the majority.

Mr. SARGENT. Does the resolution provide for doing that?

Mr. ANTHONY. It has been amended so as to provide for it.

Mr. SARGENT. Then is there any objection to the resolution?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I cannot see how there can be any objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] called attention to the matter when the resolution was introduced, and his amendment was referred to the committee that the views of the minority be printed with the majority report, but there was no action taken by the Senate upon his suggestion.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think, as a matter of convenience, as the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is aware, to avoid distributing the type, the order to print should be made now.

Mr. THURMAN. Let the resolution be reported.

Mr. SARGENT. As amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution, as amended, will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That 4,000 copies of the report of the Special Committee to Investigate the late Election in Mississippi, with the views of the minority, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

EDUCATION REPORT.

Mr. DAVIS. While the subject of printing is up I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Printing Committee as to the report on education, whether or not any copies have been ordered for the use of the Senate, or whether there is a resolution now pending before the committee on that subject? I have had from several sources requests for the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1875, and I have inquired at the document-room, and find that there are none ordered to be printed so far as they know. I desire to know from the chairman whether there is a resolution now pending before his committee.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senate passed a resolution on the report of the Committee on Printing for printing 10,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education.

Mr. DAVIS. For the use of the Commissioner, but none for the use of the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am not sure. I think that it was printed for the use of the Commissioner and was included in the sundry civil bill. At all events we have passed a resolution for printing it for the use of the Commissioner.

Mr. DAVIS. I should be glad if the Senator would see to that, so that the Senate may get a portion of those 10,000 copies. I understand that the Commissioner appropriates them to his own use and that there are none for the use of the members, for I applied and could get none for my State.

Mr. ANTHONY. It would be competent for the two Houses of Congress to order the distribution.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. SARGENT. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

Whereas on the 6th day of July, 1876, the Senate authorized the appointment of a special committee of three Senators to investigate the immigration of Chinese to this country; and whereas on the 17th day of July, 1876, the House of Representatives authorized the appointment of a special committee of three members of the House to discharge similar duties:

Be it resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That said special committees shall act as a joint special committee of the two Houses for the purposes aforesaid and with the powers conferred by the resolutions appointing them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would suggest to the Senator from California that he ought to provide for their expenses, otherwise there will not be any opportunity.

Mr. SARGENT. I understand they will send over here from the House side a bill which will cover that point.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why not, as this is a joint resolution, just add "the expenses to be paid one-half out of the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half out of the contingent fund of the House."

Mr. SARGENT. Perhaps it would be better to add that. I will add those words.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words proposed to be added will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The expenses of said committee to be paid one-half out of the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

TREASURY STATEMENTS AND ACCOUNTS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I now ask the Senate to take up the bill from the House of Representatives appropriating some $1,500 to the widow of the late James K. Polk for property taken. It will not occupy any time.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will yield, I rise to what is in the nature of a personal explanation.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Of course, with the understanding that I do not lose my place.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Although I have to confess to the Senate that I should not rise to a personal explanation, but the matter to which I call attention relates to the party to which I belong and to the reputation of the country.

The convention of the democratic party which met at Saint Louis on the 27th of June, among other allegations set forth in their platform on which they base the statement that there should be a reform in the Government, say that "a late Secretary of the Treasury forced balances in the public accounts." That statement in the platform, in connection with the well-known fact that the honorable Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] called the attention of the Senate to what he supposed were discrepancies in the public accounts, leads me to conclude that this paragraph relates to myself; but as relating to myself I am wholly indifferent to it. The character of the party with which I am connected is in a certain sense affected, but I do not know that even in that aspect of the case I should have called attention to it. But the reputation and the credit of the country are concerned in knowing whether at any time by any Secretary of the Treasury balances in the public accounts have been forced.

The honorable Senator from West Virginia brought this matter to the attention of the Senate very early in the session. The subject was referred to the Committee on Finance. That committee, as I understand—for I never was with the committee when that subject was under consideration—submitted an investigation of these allegations to a subcommittee consisting of the honorable chairman and the honorable Senator from the State of New York, [Mr. KERNAN.] I am informed that they investigated the subject for many weeks, perhaps extending over a period of months. What I do know is that on the 6th day of June, twenty-four days before this resolution was passed in the Saint Louis convention, that committee made a report. I was not present in the Senate when the report was made, but there is nothing in the report to indicate that it was not a unanimous report. In that report it is said:

Your committee, in conclusion, would say that they are fully satisfied that there has not been the slightest change in the books of the Treasury.

Your committee are not prepared to recommend any change in the mode of keeping or making public these accounts. The system is the growth of the experience of the Department since its organization, and it would be a very delicate and dangerous task to propose any change in this respect. Certainly it ought not to be done without a much more full and critical examination than your committee could make without the aid of experts and the most careful study.

I make this statement here and now in order that if there be any member of that committee, if there be any person in this Senate, who doubts the truth of that statement, here and now he may make his doubt known to the Senate and to the country.

Mr. DAVIS. It is true, as the Senator from Massachusetts, late Secretary of the Treasury, says, that early in the present session I called the attention of the Senate to what I believed and still believe to be discrepancies and alterations in the annual statements to Congress. I have not stated, nor do I state now, that the books of the Treasury Department have been changed, for I was in an official way deprived of any examination whatever of the books of the Department; neither have I sought in any capacity whatever to examine the books. I have to repeat what I said formerly, that if the books have not been changed they do not agree with the statements sent to Congress, and I am ready to make that statement good here or elsewhere at any time. I shall in a few days, as soon as opportunity offers, review the report of the Finance Committee appointed by the Senate to investigate the subject. I do not speak with any degree of censure of the committee, for it was stated at the time by many Senators and a part of the committee itself that the Finance Committee would not have time to make a thorough examination of the subject. I take it that the committee will say now, if it is necessary to say anything about it, that their time was so occupied that they had not an opportunity of going to the Treasury Department and making a proper and thorough examination of the books there, but had to depend necessarily upon the reply of the Treasury Department and its officials.

The statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, which is proper, as to the notice in the democratic platform formed at Saint Louis, is correct. I knew as little of that until I saw it in print as he or any other Senator or any other gentleman did. No word of mine, no action of mine, no thought of mine expressed to anybody caused it to be put there, and I was somewhat surprised when I saw it, though I thought it was very properly there, and I believe now that it is properly there, and I am gratified that the country has at last taken notice of the facts, and hope that it will result in good and bring about a thorough examination of this subject.

Mr. President, I think I can show, and I shall show without any personal allusion to any Senator in a very short time, when I undertake to review the answer of the Treasury Department, that the late Secretary of the Treasury who has just resigned admits in more than one place that discrepancies and alterations have been made in the the annual statements to Congress by a former Secretary. He says that the debt statement has been remodeled and restated. He makes the statement in his report over and over again that the discrepancies do exist, and makes an effort in some instances to explain them away. As to the books, I cannot speak nor do I intend to speak; but I do speak as to the annual official statements made to Congress. They have been changed. The figures have been altered both as to revenue and as to expenditures and as to the public-debt statement. The changes and alterations of amount went back as far as 1835; and when the restatement and remodeling, as the Secretary of the Treasury says, came to the end, it made a difference of two hundred and forty-odd million dollars. In other words, between the annual report of 1869, if you go back and add up the statement as there given, and then take that made in 1871, you will find a difference of over $260,000,000 in the debt statement, and in some single years, one I recollect now, more than $90,000,000 in advance of what was reported the year before. If there was a right cause or law for going back twenty or thirty years and restating the figures and advancing them, that ought to be shown; and it belongs to those who caused the restatements to be made to show it, not to me. I state the fact that there has been such restatements and changes.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, it will be remembered that, when the resolution offered by the Senator from West Virginia was proposed to be referred to the Committee on Finance, I for one opposed it because the committee was overworked. I think I did that with the approval of the chairman, who thought we had too much to do to undertake this investigation. But the Senator from Massachusetts is correct in supposing that the matter was referred to a subcommittee consisting of the chairman and myself; and it is due to us to say that neither of us—I did not go I am sure—ever went to the Treasury to examine these books which would have taken time beyond anything we could think of bestowing; but the resolution was communicated to the Treasury Department and there came back a very large mass of statements and figures purporting to be explanations of the discrepancies complained of. I looked at those very hurriedly before they were printed. I discovered that it was idle for me to attempt to understand the matter, having had no connection with the original investigation or the complaint, and therefore I did not attempt it. Therefore I cannot say that there was any such thing as was alleged, nor could I say from any examination of mine that it was not so; but the figures were all reported and I called the attention of the Senator from West Virginia then to the fact that they would be printed and of course those who had knowledge on the subject making these charges would look into them. That is all I can say. I had not the time nor the information which would enable me to investigate the points involved in such a mass of figures, and I concurred in the report made by the chairman.

Now, a single word about the resolution. Like the Senator from West Virginia, I did not hear that resolution read, and until read in the convention it did not attract my attention.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You could probably prove that by every member of the convention.

Mr. KERNAN. No; I suppose the gentleman who drew it had some knowledge; I infer he had more than I had, for he must have been looking at the debates that had been going on here. I did not know anything about the intention to offer the resolution.

All I can say is that the answer made by the Treasury was published, to the end that those who had examined the matter before and supposed there were changes could verify their allegations and find out whether the inquiry was properly answered or not. This was all that the committee could do, hurried all the time by other business. I cannot say that it does answer the charges or that it does not. I suppose those who looked into it would be able to examine it carefully.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to say a word on this subject. The charge of an alteration of the books of the Treasury did excite my great interest. The alleged discrepancy in the Treasury accounts was a matter totally immaterial compared with the allegations that the books of the Treasury had been altered. As to the discrepancy in the statements of accounts, I could see how that might arise. Therefore, on the first inquiry we made, I went to the then Secretary of the Treasury myself and to the Assistant Secretary and demanded in the name of the Committee on Finance that all the books of the Treasury should be examined by the best experts they had in the Department to see whether there was any ground whatever for an allegation that any book in the Treasury Department had been changed or altered. I also called in a second instance for any explanation of a discrepancy in the statement of accounts, which was quite a different thing, as Senators will see who reflect a moment. Here is the specific answer in regard to alteration of books made by the Secretary of the Treasury in response to my distinct demand:

> In this connection it should be stated that in no instance has there been any erasure or alteration in the books and records of this Department, and the changes made in the published reports have been only to express with greater accuracy the precise condition of the public accounts, as shown by such books and records.

As a matter of course I did not, nor could I without devoting too much time, go through all the books and examine them myself; but I made the responsible head of the Department certify, on the examination of his experts, that no such alteration was made. Senators who want to examine this matter will find in the last communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Bristow, on page 36 of this report, an ample detail of the reason why changes in the mode of stating the debt accounts and the other accounts were made; why in 1871 a re-examination of the statements for many years before was made and a full and satisfactory explanation, so far as I can gather from the documents submitted to us, of every discrepancy pointed out by the Senator from West Virginia. I do not want to go into a statement about a complicated question of this kind, involving book accounts, but the material point is that there was no alteration whatever of any book or paper in the Treasury Department, and, second, that every discrepancy or alleged discrepancy that was pointed out by any one was fully accounted for and the reasons for the discrepancy were shown, and, third, the most ample and satisfactory reasons were given why in 1871 a change in the mode of stating the accounts, not in keeping them, not in writing them out, but in stating their results, was made; and that was approved, and is now undoubtedly the best plan of stating not only the debt statement but all the accounts of the Treasury Department, so that discrepancies which heretofore have existed between the Register's accounts and the Treasurer's accounts could be easily and readily explained.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, after what has been said I purpose to assert myself upon one point in respect to this business, and that is that up to the time the investigation was undertaken in 1869 the books of the Treasury Department, although accurately kept upon the plan which was devised, had not stated the loan account accurately from the very first day they were opened under the administration of Alexander Hamilton. I also assert that during the four years that I administered the Treasury Department, for the first time in the history of the Government the books of the Department represented the exact state of public affairs; not that there had been any fraud; not that there had been any inaccuracy in the keeping of accounts; but the system in respect to the public loans was such that no accurate results could be reached. Upon that statement I purpose to stand here and as matter of history.

These assaults originated by the honorable Senator from West Virginia, and instigated I doubt not by his associates, as far as they have been expressed in the Saint Louis platform, will ultimately fall harmless because the more investigation there shall be the more clearly will the truth appear. And as for the honorable Senator from West Virginia he deals with facts and figures and simple propositions in arithmetic as a child deals with geometric blocks, whose value he does not appreciate and whose powers he cannot comprehend; and a child may from those blocks rear a fabric that will challenge criticism and explanation and description and defense, and when destroyed will defy the powers of artisan or architect or mechanician to reproduce it. But a phase is presented both by the child and man that may be the object even of envy. They dwell for the time, and as time goes on more completely dwell, in obscure security in reference to the work they have done.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I hardly know whether I ought to notice the latter part of the remarks of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. I hardly think they are worthy of himself, and I had almost said they were not worthy of my notice. Alexander Hamilton made a form of book-keeping, as we are told by the chairman of the Finance Committee, and we are told by him that he would be a bold man who would interfere with it; and yet there has been a man that has interfered with it. I will not say he is a child. The Senator from Massachusetts knows who interfered with it. He knows that by his order, and by his written order, a balance-sheet went from his office to that of the Register directing him to make his next annual statement compare with the one he sent. He knows that the statement sent from his office (for I take it nothing went from the office on so important a matter but that he would know of it) to the Register, who is the official book-keeper of the Government. He was directed to make certain entries, and to report them to Congress. Whether or not this caused a change of the books I know not; but I do know that the statements made to Congress, which the public accepted as correct, were changed, and are to-day so, and I re-assert it and I know what I am saying. I can make good every figure I have given and mean to do so.

I regret very much that the Senator from Massachusetts has seen proper to make personal allusion to me, not only now but heretofore. I thought I had the right to bring the matter to public notice when I believed there were discrepancies and wrongs in the Treasury Department, and I believe yet as a Senator that that is my right. I think it comes with a very bad grace from a Senator with as much experience as the Senator from Massachusetts, and who knows how to weigh words so well, to use the language he has toward myself. Sir, I can hardly trust myself to talk of him, and therefore I will dismiss that part of the subject.

But as to the Treasury statements, I say Secretary Bristow, in his report over his signature, says that the gentleman who was Secretary in 1869 did remodel and restate the public-debt statement; and I add that in doing so he vastly increased the apparent amount, so far as the debt statements are concerned, of the Government debt, in some single years ninety odd millions of dollars. In the year 1862 or 1863—I forget which—Secretary Chase, indorsed by the Register, followed by Fessenden, followed by McCulloch, all stated the debt to be $514,000,000 in round numbers. But in 1871, for some cause unknown to myself, those figures are changed; and in the report sent to you here to-day, and every report since 1871, it is stated at $524,000,000 in round numbers, increasing the debt statement of that single year near $10,000,000.

I say that the revenue, after having been paid into the Treasury according to the reports, has gotten out of the Treasury in some way without an appropriation by Congress, if you take the figures as reported by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts to the Senate in his annual reports while Secretary of the Treasury. I say further that the expenditures for pensions in a single year were reported for eight or ten years to be $9,000,000, and they have been changed and raised to $16,000,000, and the reports that come here this session show them to stand now at $16,000,000 when they were reported by several Secretaries at $9,000,000. I give round numbers.

However, Mr. President, I expect in a few days, if the trial of the impeachment shall have ended and I can get the floor, to review the report to the Finance Committee made by the Treasury Department, and I believe then I shall to any impartial mind not only show that the explanations of these discrepancies are not substantial and will not hold, but new discrepancies, amounting to large amounts of money, are shown; and it is a strange fact that no discrepancy or change or alteration except the ones pointed out by myself have been noticed in this report, and not all of them. I shall show new ones for large amounts of money, and it is for those who made the changes to explain to the Senate why they were made, and not myself.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH ASIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I hope the Senate will now indulge me for five or ten minutes in getting up the bill for the relief of Mrs. Polk.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator from Vermont will withdraw his call for the regular order for a moment, I should like to ask unanimous consent to withdraw a motion which I entered some weeks ago, to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed a bill creating a corporation for the laying of a Pacific telegraph cable. I entered that motion, not for the purpose of obstructing the construction of such a telegraph, but because I thought it might contribute to the construction of it, for there were persons who had been endeavoring, without success, for some time to obtain such legislation as would authorize them to lay such a cable, and I was apprehensive that the creation of the corporation—not believing myself that the men engaged in it were able to construct it—might really delay the result aimed at. I thought it would facilitate the construction of the telegraph if I should move to reconsider, and add to this bill the second section of a bill which has been reported by the same committee, authorizing any persons to construct a telegraph who saw fit; but I have ascertained, on comparing this bill creating a corporation with that section, that the provisions would be incongruous, and the Senator who reported both bills [Mr. HOWE] assures me that he will put the bill which contains this section upon its passage, if the Senate will permit him. It will accomplish all I desired in moving the reconsideration, if that can be done, and therefore I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the motion to reconsider; and if the Senate will permit the Senator from Wisconsin to put that bill upon its passage it will excite no debate and can be done in a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to withdrawing the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 892) to encourage and promote telegraphic communication between America and Asia was passed?

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the motion to reconsider the vote by which that bill was passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to withdrawing the motion? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ALLISON and Mr. EDMUNDS. Regular order.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Massachusetts asked leave to withdraw that motion to reconsider, and seems to lay me under some obligation to move to consider Senate bill 541, which relates to the same subject, and if there be no objection to considering the bill now I should be glad.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think we had better go on for the present with the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the unfinished business, the river and harbor bill.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr., his Secretary, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the act (S. No. 382) to appropriate $1,000 to remove the remains of Hon. E. Rumsey Wing, late minister to Ecuador, from Quito to the cemetery at Owensborough, Kentucky.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. THURMAN to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to reduce the aggregate amount of the appropriations contained in the bill to a sum not exceeding $4,000,000.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I had not intended by any word of mine to give this debate a partisan turn. I was inclined, as I generally am in the discussion of measures before the Senate, to debate the pending bill upon its merits and to leave the discussion of party politics to some other more appropriate and opportune occasion. But two or three republican Senators on yesterday manifested a fixed and persistent purpose to assail, arraign, and defame the democratic party and that party as represented by the House of Representatives, and to question the sincerity and honesty of their professions and the wisdom of their policy. I therefore deem it not out of place on this occasion, in view of indubitable and unanswerable facts, to accept the challenge as broadly as it is presented, and to see whether or not the objections which they have raised have any sure foundation and are really worthy the consideration of the Senate or the country.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] in his remarks yesterday took occasion to say some very harsh things of the democratic party, to denounce it, to question its sincerity, and to hold it up to the ridicule and execration of the country. What he said, however, was unsustained by any argument or fact which he ventured to state, and I take it that mere empty assertion, wordy declamation, unsustained by fact, will go but a short way with persons who look to reason, to fact, and to justice to control their action; and in this particular case they will do it the more readily because his broad assertions were directly in the face of an actual fact. He declared that the professions of the democratic party as represented in the other House to correct misrule, to reform the administration of the Government, and to retrench the expenses of the Government were mere dissembling, that they were hypocritical, that they were false and fraudulent, and intended simply to catch the votes of the people. As I said a moment ago, he cited no fact and he made no argument to sustain that charge, and it was made in the face of the very fact that the House at the present session has reduced the regular appropriation bills more than thirty-eight millions from the aggregate amount appropriated for the public service for the last year, and about sixty-four millions less than the official estimates for this current year.

But he said all this is most hypocritical. Sir, that is unjust; that, it seems to me, is unfair; it is discourteous. Why should he thus question the motives of a great party or of the House of Representatives? What reason can he assign for it? What event has transpired that warrants it? Such I undertake to say is not the fact; but if it were, what is material to the people, to the country, is that there should be retrenchment and reform; and if they get this from the House of Representatives, I take it that there will not be a very great deal of question about the motive. The great end to be attained is to have retrenchment and reduction of the expenses of the Government, the extravagant, enormous magnitude of which has been brought about, as I believe and shall attempt to show in a very brief way and by presenting now only one or two points, by the misrule of the republican party which he represents on this floor.

He said that while this party make such loud professions of reform and retrenchment they have not passed a bill and sent it to the Senate proposing to reduce the taxes of the people one farthing, and this he said with an air of triumph as though there were no answer to his imputation. There are two plain explanations of the suggestion he thus makes with so much apparent confidence. The first one is this, that the industries of the country, the trade of the country, and the condition of the country in every material respect, through the misrule which has prevailed in this country for the last ten years, have become so prostrated, the sources of revenue are so impaired, that even if the revenue laws shall remain this year as they were last year, the revenue that will be realized will not be sufficient to meet the appropriations to an amount equal to what they were last year, by many millions of dollars. That is conceded on all hands. We learn this fact from the Treasury Department, and it is manifest to every mind at all familiar with the condition of the country. And if the reductions of appropriations proposed by the House were not made, taxation would necessarily have to be largely increased.

There is another explanation that it is worth while to mention. If the Senate shall concur in the action of the House in reducing the regular appropriations by the amount of $38,000,000, it is believed that the House may safely send a revenue bill to the Senate reducing the taxes of the people equal to $20,000,000. Congress is not yet adjourned; we are not prepared to say when it will adjourn, and the work of the House in the direction of retrenchment and reform is not yet complete. It is wise and necessary that the House should wait until the Senate shall take action on the various appropriation bills, in order to see whether the work which they have so wisely and necessarily begun in reducing the appropriations for this year by the amount of $38,000,000 less than they were a year ago shall be concurred in by the Senate. If it shall not, then the revenue laws must stand as they are, notwithstanding the prostrate condition of business of all kinds in the country. But if it should turn out that the Senate shall concur, then the House may send a revenue bill here reducing taxes by the amount of $20,000,000 this year and we may expect that result.

So, then, I say, Mr. President, in what fell from the Senator from Indiana yesterday there is really, with all due respect to him, nothing. He declaimed loudly; he said hard words; he laughed and made faces at the House and the democratic party; but, I repeat, he stated not one fact and he made not one argument to sustain the imputation which he made; and he made it in the face of the fact, patent to him and the country, that the House of Representatives have already reduced the appropriations to an amount $38,000,000 less than they were last year.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] likewise indulged in some extravagant imputations against the House and the democratic party.

He declared that it was the manifest purpose of the House and the democratic party to embarrass the Government, and in the end subvert and destroy it, and that that was apparent in the fact that there was a disposition to cut off the usual appropriations needed to carry on the necessary branches of the public service. It is a remarkable and striking fact that he also cited not one solitary fact, nor did he adduce any reasonable argument to sustain so grave a charge. It really seemed that he expected the country to believe his empty declaration without facts, without argumentation, and also to believe it in the face of what is manifest as to the actual retrenchment that has been effected by the House of Representatives. He said that the House and the party boasted that they had impaired the public service in failing to make the proper and appropriate appropriations for the support of the Army. Why, Mr. President, did he go on in his speech to show the Senate whereby the efficiency of the Army was impaired in any respect? Did he produce the testimony of a single military officer or soldier or civilian to the effect that if the appropriation bill for the support of the Army shall pass and become a law as it came from the House, thereby the military service of the country would be impaired, that the General of the Army would resign, that all the great officers of the Army would resign, that the Army would be disbanded, and that it could not do the service that is necessary in that branch of the public service? Did he point to the investigations of any committee of this body or of the other House or anywhere? Could he point to any memorial calling attention to any such result as that? He did not, and for the very good reason that he could not. There is no pretense that any general in the Army will resign or think of doing so because of the appropriations made by the House of Representatives. It is not pretended by the citation of any fact or circumstance that the Army will be less efficient this year than it was last year. The Articles of War, the rules and regulations governing the Army, the laws affecting the Army are just as complete and effective this year under the action of the House of Representatives as they were last year, and the Army will do the country service in the future as it has in the past, and do it as effectually and as well, notwithstanding the appropriations have been cut down by the House to a reasonable measure.

The same remarks are applicable to the Navy. He said that the efficiency of the Navy had been greatly impaired. Did he point to any fact showing that the vessels which are now in the public service and on foreign stations will be brought home and taken out of commission and laid up? Did he point to a single fact stated by any one who would know that any naval officer contemplated resignation? Could he show that the Secretary of the Navy proposed to abandon his post; that any admiral, or rear-admiral, or that any captain in the Navy, or anybody in the naval service contemplated the abandonment of his service because there was not an amount sufficient appropriated to supply the Navy for the next year? On the contrary, all the laws and regulations touching the Navy calculated to promote and secure its efficiency remain just as they did last year, and the Navy will go on and discharge all its duties notwithstanding the appropriations have been cut down to a less sum than last year, just as they did last year, and they will be just as efficient.

Then take the civil service. Will the cutting down of the salaries of members of Congress, of the number of employés in the various Departments, the cutting down of pay to employés anywhere affect the public service? Can any fact be pointed to to sustain that charge? I apprehend not. We do not hear that any civil officer of the Government is going to resign on account of the fact that his salary has been reduced. The employés in the various Departments of the Government do not contemplate abandoning their positions because the House has seen fit to cut down their pay; and, even if they were to do so, there are hundreds and thousands just as efficient as they are and anxious to take their places, and who would discharge the duties devolved upon them as efficiently and as well.

So that this is the merest clamor and claptrap intended to get around that fixed, definite, and determined policy of the democratic party to bring about reform and to retrench the expenses of the Government. That is not the way, in my judgment, to meet this question. It cannot be done by indirection. The majority in this body had better step forward and recognize the necessity, and say that they join with the democratic party in this good work, for, if they do not, they will find, in my opinion, that the people will condemn them at the ballot-box in November next.

The Senator from Illinois then makes a thrust at the pending bill. He says it is plain that the purpose of this bill was to promote the success of a great many democratic aspirants in the various congressional districts of the Union. In support of that imputation also he cited no single fact. He did not point to a single district where the interests of a single member of the House who seeks to be re-elected to the next Congress would be materially benefited by a single appropriation contained in the bill; and I venture to say, if he had gone on and analyzed the various appropriations, he would have found that there was no substantial ground for his imputation. I take it that the people of the country will not be governed in their action at the ballot-box by an empty suggestion of that character, when there is no fact to sustain it.

Why, sir, take the appropriations for my own State—and I shall have something more to say about them by and by; the principal appropriations are made for places on the seaboard. They are appropriations made for the benefit of localities where the republican party prevail. They are made in that section of the State where the republican party are most powerful. They are made in localities where it is expected that they realize their largest majorities in the approaching election, and they are made where also the democrats could expect to realize very little indeed more than they ever do. The other appropriation, a very small one, the sum of $15,000, is made for an improvement in a democratic district where they have from three thousand to four thousand majority, and where it is wholly unnecessary that any improper appropriation should be made or other consideration resorted to in order to secure votes for the democratic party. They are there already, and they need no appropriation of this kind to influence their action.

So then I say, sir, the assaults made yesterday against the democratic party were mere empty declamation, without force or effect, and ought not to influence the vote of a single human being when he comes to pass upon the great issues before the country.

But, Mr. President, I want to go a little further and make a point or two which I will not ask the Senate or the country to consider and believe by reason of my mere assertion; I shall state the facts and give the figures from the record and the arguments at my command to support the charges I make against the republican party of the country. I will not stop now to go into a history of this party, to advert to the fact that it is a party that had its origin in moral causes and in the doctrine of a higher law than the Constitution; that it has accomplished all its ends by force, and that the great purpose for which it came into existence has been accomplished, and that it is no longer a party of principle, that it is a mere political organization held together by the public patronage of the Government. I believe if there were no public patronage, no offices or places to be bestowed or withheld, the republican party of the nation could not live twenty-four hours. As a great party of principle its work has been accomplished, and I challenge any Senator upon this floor who belongs to that party to cite any great distinctive principle which its votaries advocate that is not common to every party and everybody in this country. I repeat, there is no distinctive principle of government that distinguishes it from any other party in the country. It is now distinguished by reason of its extravagance in public expenditures and the gross and appalling frauds which it tolerates and in many instances countenances by indirection, if not directly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask my honorable friend what principle the democratic party now stands upon?

Mr. MERRIMON. The great leading principle they are now standing upon and fighting for—embodying as they do a class of men that belonged to all parties in the past—is to reform maladministration and retrench the expenses of the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. What single act of reform has the democratic party accomplished since 1840? In the history of our country I can show fifty for the republican party. Let us come down to the facts now. This is the commencement of a political campaign. Name me a single reform in doctrine, law, or practice that the democratic party has inaugurated and carried out.

Mr. MERRIMON. Why, sir, everybody in this country and throughout the whole civilized world knows that up to 1860 no country on the face of the globe prospered as did this country and that this Government had been administered by the democratic party substantially for forty years before that time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say since 1840, since the organization of the new whig and democratic parties, name me a single reform or great measure which is enduring and now on the statute-book started, organized, and carried out by the democratic party.

Mr. MERRIMON. Why, sir, after 1840——

Mr. MORTON. I should like to add to that question. I should like my friend from North Carolina to name one single good act of any kind that the democratic party has performed in twenty-five years. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Applause in the galleries is out of order. The Sergeant-at-Arms will see that it is not repeated.

Mr. MERRIMON. My friends had as well understand at once that I shall not be frightened by questions put in that shape to me or by the clapping of hands in the galleries or elsewhere. Why, sir, in the purer days of the Republic, from 1840 down, the Government was comparatively pure and no country—I repeat what I said a moment ago—ever prospered as did this country down to 1860, and I ask the gentlemen who put these questions with such an air of triumph if they or either of them dare deny that fact? They cannot point to the time when the democratic party stole the revenues of the country; they cannot point to the time when corruption permeated the whole body-politic, and when the party itself had to condemn itself, as has been the case with the republican party, as I shall have occasion to show before I take my seat. I am asked to point to a single measure of reform. But, sir, the government was so pure, it operated so evenly except on a single question, that positively the people of this country did not know that they paid to support the Government they lived under. Down to 1850 there was scarcely ever a complaint that anything ever was stolen from the Government, that the Government was plundered of its revenue, that injustice was done to any section, and the only complaint I ever heard brought against the democratic party was that the republican party insisted that they were pro-slavery in their practices, tendencies, and sympathies.

But, sir, it was not my purpose, as I said, to go into a history of the republican party and to point out its various usurpations, the means by which they accomplished their ends, and I do not stop to criticise their purposes or to inquire whether they were right or wrong. It is not my purpose now to point out the means by which they accomplished those ends. Let that go for what it is worth; it has passed into history, and the work of that party has been done rightfully or wrongfully, and the country and the world accept it. But as to its practices in relation to the administration of the Government, particularly since the war, I have something to say. I wish to call attention to the maladministration of the Government and the corruption practiced and tolerated by that party, particularly in reference to the revenues of the country, before I take my seat.

The frauds practiced by thousands of the votaries of this party and tolerated by it upon the Government from 1866 down to 1871 were so enormous, so appalling, that the better men of the party could not fail to see the appalling evils to which the country was subject, and they endeavored to inaugurate means of reform, and to that end they raised a commission for the purpose of ascertaining what could be done to reform the Government in the matter of the civil service. I wish to call attention to a commission that was specially raised for that purpose and to one or two things which that commission said, which I take it the republican party are bound by, for every member of this commission was a republican; they were indorsed by a republican President, and I take it by a republican Congress. In commenting upon the evils to which the country was at that time subject, that commission said what I shall read; but before I read from the report I wish to call attention to who composed the commission. In 1870 an act passed Congress authorizing the raising of a commission to inquire into such reforms as could be made in the civil service of the country. That commission was composed of George William Curtis, Alexandar G. Cattell, Joseph Medill, Dawson A. Walker, E. B. Elliott, Joseph H. Blackfan, and David C. Cox. These commissioners were all republicans and I do not doubt that they belonged to the better class of republicans, that they were intelligent and honest men, and that they were adapted to the service for which they were selected. I admit that there are good men in the republican party, that there have always been good men in the republican party; but then I say they have been impotent to control that party and they are particularly impotent to do it now and to bring about those reforms which are essential to the welfare of the country. That commission said in their report:

> It is not easy to compute in figures the exact economical difference between a good and a bad system of the civil service. It is, necessarily, a matter of inference and of comparison between the probable operation of a careless and a careful method. But it is calculated, by those who have made a careful study of all the facts, that one-fourth of the revenues of the United States are annually lost in the collection, and for a large part of that loss a system of the service which is fatally unsound may reasonably be held responsible.

That sentence was written by this republican commission which had been indorsed by a Congress overwhelmingly republican, which had been indorsed also by a republican President; and besides the country knows that they were warranted in making that statement, and if it ever has been denied by any republican authority I have never heard it. So I take it to be true that no man can or will dare to deny the truth of what is so stated.

Now, sir, in discussing the subject of the revenues let us take up the single item of taxes on distilled spirits. Let us see how they were collected, or rather not collected. According to a statement which I have before me giving the amount of internal revenue raised from distilled spirits from the year 1863 to the year 1875 the aggregate number of gallons upon which the Government received revenue was 616,890,390. I will ask the Clerk to read the table I send to him.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Statement showing the number of gallons of distilled spirits on which Internal tax was collected and returned to the Office of the Commissioner of the Internal Revenue for each fiscal year since the organization of the present internal-revenue system.

(a) Included in next column. (b) Mostly included in next column.

The number of gallons that ought to have been accounted for in that time is 13,000,000,000, according to the estimate made by the late Mr. Fessenden (then Secretary of the Treasury) in 1864. In that year he said in his report, in making his estimates on the subject of the internal revenues, that the number of gallons distilled was equal to about one hundred millions per annum, and if that amount of spirits was distilled in 1864 it is reasonable to estimate that after peace returned, and when the industries of the country had been in some measure renewed, the number of gallons produced annually would increase; but for the sake of certainty and fairness I take it that the annual production of spirits in this country since 1864 and anterior to that time as far back as 1863, was equal to 100,000,000 gallons per annum. If that is correct, I repeat the number of gallons that ought to have been made from 1863 to 1874 was 13,000,000,000 of gallons. In the years 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1868 the tax on spirits was $2 a gallon. This ought to have yielded $800,000,000 in those years. Now hear the fact, and a material one, that only $104,000,000 were realized; so the loss to the Government pending that time was $696,000,000! I ask the Senator from Indiana and I ask the Senator from Ohio, who propounded their questions with such an air of triumph a while ago, where did that money go to; into whose pockets did that go? It went into the pockets of those who collected the revenue and those who controlled the revenue; it went into ten thousand avenues to corrupt and demoralize and impoverish the country and prostrate the industries of the country, and to bring about the present state of general public distress and suffering. That is where it went. It went to control the elections and secure the immense majorities that the republicans got in the years 1867, 1868, 1869, and 1870. And, sir, the fruits of these $696,000,000 not accounted for brought about the evils that now beset this Government on every hand, and that call so loudly for that reform and retrenchment which the democratic party expect to provide and secure for the American people at the next election.

But let us carry this estimate a little further. In thirteen years next before 1875 the distilled spirits ought to have amounted to 1,300,000,000 gallons. The number of gallons upon which taxes were paid, as I have said, was 616,809,390. I take it that the Government has attempted to realize revenue upon distilled spirits equal to $2 on a gallon from the time the internal-revenue system of taxation began down to the present time. If the country had realized what was due it, the amount of revenue which should have been realized from that source would have been equal to $2,600,000,000. The amount realized was $1,233,618,730.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator from North Carolina allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MERRIMON. In one moment. The loss realized upon this basis was $1,366,381,220! Now I will hear the Senator.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask the Senator from North Carolina how much of this loss he thinks might be fairly attributed to the illicit distilleries in the woods of North Carolina?

Mr. MERRIMON. Why, Mr. President, I scarcely expected such a question from such a Senator. With all due respect to him, it is immaterial. If every gallon distilled there had been lost, what of it? How would that alter the case? Here was the republican party with the whole Government at its back, the Army and the Navy, with absolute power to execute the law; and if they failed to execute the law, if they allowed dishonest or corrupt men in North Carolina or in Vermont, or anywhere else to rob the Government of its revenues, plunder the people of the nation, and to impoverish honest men who were endeavoring to live up to the law, who is responsible for it but the republican party; and why will not the American people hold them to a strict account when they come to express their voice at the ballot-box? Why did this party, duly charged by its own seeking to do so, fail to execute the law upon dishonest men everywhere? And who will be bold enough to say they are not responsible for failure and neglect to do so?

Mr. SHERMAN. I would ask the Senator a question. He makes his very large estimate at the rate of $2 a gallon; but as we charged the two-dollar tax only for a short time, and the whole of that during the democratic administration of Andrew Johnson, I ask him if it is exactly fair to charge us with the two dollars' tax during all the republican administration when we had not a two-dollar tax? The two-dollar tax continued, I believe, from 1865 to 1868.

Mr. MERRIMON. I will answer the gentleman with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was about to say that during a portion of Mr. Johnson's administration at the rate of $2 a gallon the whisky tax receipts ran down to $12,000,000 per annum, while they ought to have been, according to the figures now given by the Senator from North Carolina, $200,000,000.

Mr. MERRIMON. In the years 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1868 the tax on spirits was $2 a gallon. This ought to have yielded to the Government $800,000,000, but only $104,000,000 was realized, and there was a loss to the Government during that time of $696,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was during Johnson's administration.

Mr. MERRIMON. And suppose it was. This effort of the honorable Senator from Ohio and other republican Senators to make the Senate and the country believe that Andrew Johnson's administration was democratic is positively, laughably absurd. Will anybody pretend that the democratic party elected Andrew Johnson to be President of the United States or Vice-President? Was he not nominated by the republican party on the ticket with the late President Lincoln? Was he not elected by the republican party wherever the republican party cast votes? And did they not quarrel with their own President; and after they had quarreled with him did they not abridge his powers by the tenure-of-office bill, whereby they sought to compel him to use their instruments, whereby these frauds were committed? Why, sir, if he had desired to turn these men out there was an act of Congress staring him in the face forbidding him to do it, and passed for that very purpose; and when he undertook to exercise a power that belonged to him under the Constitution this same republican party impeached him for it. And now, sir, in the face of all that, the Senator from Ohio and other Senators have the boldness and hardihood to stand up and say Andrew Johnson's administration was democratic! Shame on you, Senators!

Mr. LOGAN. Let me ask the Senator if he himself was elected by republican votes.

Mr. MERRIMON. I certainly was in part. But what of that?

Mr. LOGAN. I only refer to it as an illustration.

Mr. MERRIMON. But republican votes could not corrupt me, nor were they intended to do so. If I could consent to sell my conscience for republican votes or democratic votes, I should disgrace this place and disgrace myself as an American citizen. But, Mr. President, I put it to Senators, I put it to the country to show how that bears on the merits of this discussion, how it changes the truth to the extent of the weight of a feather.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from North Carolina should certainly not hold the republicans responsible for his acts now, and I do not think therefore we ought to be held responsible for the acts of Andrew Johnson, who within three or four months after he became President of the United States abandoned the party that elected him and gave his full power, all the power that was given him by the Constitution and the laws, to the democratic party during the whole of the rest of his administration. It is not just or right, when making a party speech, to hold the republican party responsible for the acts of Andrew Johnson or the administration of Andrew Johnson any more than we are responsible for the acts of the Senator from North Carolina. I suppose that it is the logic of the argument.

Mr. MERRIMON. There is just this difference between my case and action and that of Mr. Johnson: The republicans in the Legislature of North Carolina did not nominate me; I did not ask them to vote for me; they voted for me of their own free will and pleasure. Their votes were not cast upon any such ground as that; they could not elect their own candidate and preferred me to another gentleman of my party. No man was more surprised than myself when I received their votes. I no more expected to be elected at the moment I was elected than the Senator from Indiana expected to be elected by the Legislature of North Carolina when I was elected. But Mr. Johnson was nominated by the republican party as a republican; he was nominated as their candidate, as a man embracing and practicing their principles; he was recognized as the republican President of the Union, and until they quarreled with him about his policy of reconstruction, which I think was most unfortunate for the country and which I did not indorse, he was in full fellowship with them and recognized by them; but they quarreled with him, and in the exercise of powers that did not belong to them, as I believe, they sought to embarrass his lawful authority. They passed laws that forbade him to exercise his constitutional powers and to prevent him from turning corrupt and bad men out of office, whereby these very taxes that were lost were lost. Yea, sir, and when he was pressed to the wall and undertook to exercise his right as a Chief Magistrate under the Constitution of his country, they impeached him, and he was tried in this very Chamber for an alleged violation of a law which as good lawyers as there are in this country believed was wholly void, and they came within one or two votes of convicting him for it.

Sir, such a subterfuge as that is not going to weigh with the people of this country. They are too intelligent to allow republican Senators here or republican orators anywhere to tell them, and in such a way as to make them believe it, that the democratic party of this country are responsible for the administration of Andrew Johnson. They are no more responsible for it than I am responsible for it. Sir, those $696,000,000 have gone somewhere, and I see the fruits and the result of that loss to the Government cropping out in nearly five thousand failures in business for over $100,000,000 this year, in the number of workshops and manufacturing establishments that are standing idle to-day, in the cry that comes up from every corner of the land that the people are oppressed, that the workingman is without labor, that poverty and starvation and demoralization stare us in the face wherever we go and on which side soever we look. There, sir, is where it crops out, and this is one of the reasons among a thousand others that have given rise to the present prostrate condition of the industries and the hopes of this country.

Here, sir, I want to read another appropriate paragraph from the report I read from a while ago that is wholesome reading for the Senators and the republican party, pointing to the very results that have come about and what the people may expect if they allow the demoralization that is now prevalent everywhere to continue. Hear what the commission say:

> We would not exaggerate the importance of the peril; but the constant exposure of official dishonesty, the vast system of political corruption, the disclosure of which has produced a peaceful revolution in the city of New York, should suggest to every good citizen the possibility of a similar revolution which might not be peaceful.
> Republicans, recognize the fact of an organized system of corruption in this country!
> If, by that great and organized corruption, it had been possible—and such a contingency is not improbable—to decide a presidential election, and in a manner universally believed to be fraudulent, the consequences would probably have been civil war. If such corruption is not staid, the result is only postponed; and nothing so surely fosters it as the system which makes the civil service a party prize and convulses the country every four years with a desperate strife for office.

Why, sir, we see the effects like unto those described in the paragraph which I have just read every day. We see cabinet officers come in and go out almost weekly, and high officers of the Government that discharge their duty faithfully and receive the commendation of the good people of the whole country turned out without a word of warning or cause sufficient or satisfactory to the people. We see and realize the truth of these words as though they had been the words of a prophet. I want to call attention to another fact, and a very material fact, to illustrate the truth of that paragraph, and that is the increase of the civil-service officers, employés, and retainers in the Government. I hold in my hand a summary of the number of employés borne upon the civil list of the United States from 1859 to 1875, inclusive, compiled from the Biennial Register. Any one who wishes to verify this statement can do so by looking to the records; and the facts that I am going to call attention to are very material. In 1859, in the State, Treasury, Interior, War, Navy, Justice, Post-Office, and Legislative Departments, there were in all 44,537 employés. Now, mark how they regularly go up. In 1861, they were 46,049; in 1863, they were 47,375; in 1865, they were 53,167; in 1867, they were 56,113; in 1869, they were 54,207; in 1871, they were 57,605; in 1873, they were 86,600; in 1875, they were 94,119. Thus we see that the number of employés from 1860 down to now has regularly every year increased, until last year they amounted to the enormous number of 94,119. And under the practice of the republican party, perhaps the practice of all parties, but it is wrong no matter what party practices it, here is an army of 94,119 retainers to go out to secure the election of the candidate for the Presidency of the party in power. Yes, sir, not only that number, but all their dependents may be included, and all their influences are thrown in that direction; and with this corrupting system practiced by a party and pointed out in the paragraph from the report of that commission that I read a moment ago, who can dare to say that the day is not distant when the country may realize the evil that they warned the Congress and the country against? And is it not high time for the good people of all parties to take warning and action before it is too late?

If a single source of internal revenue was thus prostituted—and I do not see how anybody is going to get around the statement that I have made about it; I cite you to republican authority and refer you to the record—I say if this country has realized such evil from the single source of revenue, distilled spirit, what must be the untold extent and magnitude of the corruption, the plunder, the outrages upon the revenues of the country, when we come to consider the customs duties; the internal-revenue tax upon tobacco, upon trades, upon professions, upon incomes? If the estimates I have made at all approximate the truth, can you not well see why the country groans under grievous burdens? We learn from the Bible that "when the wicked rule the people mourn." When we see such practices carried on and tolerated by the party from year to year in defiance of the best men in the party, what else can we expect except the demoralization, the poverty, and the distress that prevail throughout this country from one end of it to the other? How can we expect any other result than the prevailing evils we experience in every walk and business and condition of life? These, in my judgment, are facts and figures and arguments that the Senate and the country would do well to consider when they come to elect their Chief Magistrate next November.

I might enlarge, as the Senate can see at once, very much upon this subject of malpractice and corruption in the collection of the revenues, but I do not want to trespass unnecessarily upon the time of the Senate. I simply want to get my points before it, and let Senators if they wish show that they are groundless if they can.

I want now to call the attention of the Senate to another point that is likewise striking in its character, and which ought to be considered at this time. The entire net ordinary receipts of the Government from the 4th of March, 1789, the day the Federal Constitution went into operation, to the 30th of June, 1875, were $6,337,034,618.25. The aggregate amount of revenue collected down to 1861, more than seventy years, was $1,841,953,353.62. Mark what I say, since the year 1861, fourteen years as against seventy, the amount of revenue collected was $4,495,081,264.63. These are receipts. I come now to expenditures. From the 4th of March, 1789, to June 30, 1875, the whole amount of money expended by the Government was $6,801,956,954.69. If any one wishes to verify this statement, let him read the report of the Register of the Treasury, November 4, 1875, pages 65 to 67. From March 4, 1789, to June 30, 1861, the entire net expenditure of the Government was $1,581,706,195.34. That covers the expenses of the Government for over seventy years. Now, see what was expended under republican rule. From June 30, 1861, to June 30, 1875, the net ordinary expenses amounting to $5,220,250,759.35.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to call the Senator's attention to one point before he leaves it, with his permission.

Mr. MERRIMON. Very well, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. By an examination of the expenditures from 1861 up to 1865 the Senator will find that they were all paid by the Northern States, and he might find a reason for that if he would look at it a little further.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not care to controvert that fact; but suppose I concede the point as proved.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely call your attention to it.

Mr. MERRIMON. I submit to my honorable friend that that is a poor way to debate the merits of a question. Is it not begging the question? If the evil I point out exists it is our duty as the American Senate to correct it, no matter by whose act it came about. You cannot draw me into a side controversy of that sort.

Mr. LOGAN. There is no side controversy about it.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am here to meet the issue, to meet it on principle, and to stand upon it, and to ask the American people from every quarter to stand upon it and vindicate it.

But passing on to the figures I had, which may be a little troublesome before we adjourn and before this campaign is over, I will state that fourteen years of republican rule cost the people nearly three and one-half times as much as seventy years of rule preceding 1861. During the war I concede to the honorable Senator that the expenses were necessarily increased. I make no point about that here. Without stopping to debate who is responsible for that, I recognize the fact. Let those who made the occasion for it take the responsibility. I am not here to debate that question. That is in the past. Let us look into the future and meet its responsibilities. That is what I am prepared to do, whatever may be the disposition of other Senators. I shall not quarrel with any one about the past; no good can come to any one or to the country by doing so.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that I did not wish to debate the question with him; but inasmuch as he is making the republican party responsible for the very large expenditures for the last few years, I merely desired to direct his attention to the cause of the expenditures, and to ask whether it is very fair for the Senator to accuse the republican party of these large expenditures when the Northern States paid the money and when he may very easily see where the responsibility lies; that was all. I merely wished to call his attention to that point.

Mr. MERRIMON. Suppose in the face of the Senate and the world I concede that for argument's sake; suppose I concede that the responsibility for it rested upon my own head; suppose that I concede it rested upon the head of the southern people; suppose that I concede it rests upon the head of the democratic party—however such is not the fact—how does that alter the merits of the matter that we are debating? If there is a public evil, if corruption is rife in the land, if we see it stalking abroad everywhere, permeating every place in the Government, no matter what may be the direct or remote cause, it is the duty of the Senate and of all good men to correct it by every means in their power.

More than that, I will remind the honorable Senator that the debt he talks about is to be paid yet; that it is the debt of this country, and all this country, the whole people, have to help pay that debt. It is the business of every patriot to be about seeing how our resources shall be husbanded, how our people shall prosper, how our industries shall be increased and improved, in order that we may be both ready and able to meet the obligations that rest upon us and which will continue to rest upon us until they shall be discharged. Let the Senate and let the world know the fact that we are careful and anxious about the matter. For one, I am not a repudiationist. I recognize the high and solemn obligation of our public debt. While I have the honor to hold a seat in the Senate I shall always be ready to do that which is necessary to discharge that obligation according to its letter and its spirit.

But this is a digression; let me go back a little. Four years of President Johnson's administration cost $1,012,420,202.14. Six years of the present administration cost $1,021,813,950. I admit, for I shall deny nothing that is just, if I know it, that in administering the Government the necessary expenses—and the expenses I have been talking about—were necessarily greater during the late war; but after the war those expenses ought to have gone down rapidly until they reached a normal state. But such was not the fact. Ten years of peace under republican rule cost this country $2,034,238,152.14, nearly one-third more than all the expenses of the Government from 1789 to 1861, including the war of 1812, the Indian and the Mexican wars. If we add to the ordinary expenses of the Government during the present administration the amount of principal and interest of the public debt it will amount to $4,008,438,461.82. This is more than two and a half times the entire expenses of the Government from March 3, 1789, to June 30, 1861. I have before me a table showing the expenses of the present administration from June, 1870. I will not detain the Senate to read it but will ask permission to print it with my remarks.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator had better send it up to the desk and have it read by the Clerk.

Mr. MERRIMON. Very well; I will do so. I have also another table—the two tables may go together very properly—a table of the civil list. I have also a table of the net ordinary expenses of the United States Government in periods of four years from the organization of the Government down to June 30, 1875. A friend of mine had this table prepared at the Statistical Bureau, and it may be regarded as entirely reliable. Let the Clerk read these tables which I send to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) The Secretary will report the tables.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MERRIMON. Now, Mr. President, I have in my hand——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the Senator goes on, will he explain these tables sufficiently to tell us what he means by "net ordinary expenses?"

Mr. MERRIMON. I mean such expenditures as do not include the interest on the public debt.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Including everything else but interest on the public debt?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir, the regular expenses of the Government; that is what I mean.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator says he means everything, if I understand him, except the interest on the public debt; all other expenditures.

Mr. MERRIMON. Except the interest on the public debt and any special appropriations that may have been made, as for example the appropriation made to pay certain unusual expenses about the Navy when it was contemplated that we should probably have a war with Spain about Cuba; and I believe that pensions are excepted also.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us understand it. My only object is information, not debate. Do I understand the Senator to say that what he calls his table of net ordinary expenditures does include all the appropriations made by law and all the expenses of the Government except those for interest on the public debt?

Mr. MERRIMON. No, sir; the Senator did not so understand me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not?

Mr. MERRIMON. No; because there are other things that might not be included, as for illustration—I cannot specify all, nor do I know all—the appropriation of moneys to pay the expenses that were incurred specially at the time it was apprehended we might have a conflict with Spain.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let me understand the Senator as to this table. Does he mean to say that it is only a table of the net ordinary expenses as he now defines them?

Mr. MERRIMON. That is as I understand it, put down in the regular documents that come to Congress, as not ordinary expenses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am merely inquiring for information; that is all.

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir; I think my friend desires to get information. I am sure he cannot have any other motive—he is very frank always.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Are these official tables, reported to Congress?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes; they are official tables. The statistics are taken from the books containing the reports to Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But who took them? That is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. MERRIMON. They were obtained from the reports made by the Secretary of the Treasury and other proper officers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I understand this statement to be certified by the Secretary of the Treasury that the Senator had read.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not understand that the Senator understood me to say that. Those figures are taken from the official books.

Mr. EDMUNDS. By private hands?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. O!

Mr. MERRIMON. If the Senator doubts their correctness, it is the easiest thing in the world to verify them. I am astonished to see an experienced lawyer question the correctness of anything that can be verified so easily and is of record.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not questioning anything; I am only asking the Senator to tell us what his tables are.

Mr. MERRIMON. I know the Senator does not in terms; but he has a very artful, astute way of seeming to question things without saying so, and that I apprehend he is doing at this moment. It can pass for what it is worth. If there is anything in the tables that is not true it is very easy for the Senator, or anybody else, to verify them and prove that it is false.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is a very easy way of stating the truth so as to make it a falsehood.

Mr. MERRIMON. It would place me certainly in a very awkward position if the Senator could do so. The tables are not false; they are figures from official records. I did not write them myself; but I do not hesitate to say they are correct. They are taken from the public records of the country; go and see the record.

I have another table here. The Senator from Vermont seems to be a little careful that everything that is said should go into the RECORD. This table I did intend might be published in my remarks without detaining the Senate by its reading; but, as it is desired that it shall be read whether anybody hears the reading or not, I will send this table to the Clerk and ask him to read it so that it may go in. This statement shows the number of gallons of spirits distilled from 1863 to 1875.

Mr. LOGAN rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely wish to make a statement. Yesterday I gave notice that at one o'clock to-day I would call up House bill No. 58, to equalize the bounties of soldiers who served in the late war for the Union. Of course circumstances have put me in a position where it is impossible for me to do it. I merely wish to make this statement in order to give the reason why I did not do as I suggested I would do. The reason is well known to Senators. I could not interfere with the Senator from North Carolina while he was upon the floor, and he took the floor before one o'clock.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I have in a very hurried way submitted some desultory remarks and made some points which I believe are material in view of what was said by some Senators yesterday upon political topics. I have not had time nor opportunity to collect a great many other facts tending to strengthen what I have said to-day. If need be, I may do so upon another occasion. It was no purpose of mine to engage in a political discussion on this occasion; but I thought it was due the Senate, due the House of Representatives, and due the democratic party and the country that somebody should say something in reply to what fell from Senators on the other side yesterday, and when we said that something it should be based upon fact. If Senators can overturn these facts, I submit let them do so. If they cannot do it, the statement I have made must go for what it is worth. I believe the facts I have stated are true, my data are likewise true, and my deductions are fair and just. Let any one show the contrary who can.

I now wish to detain the Senate for a few moments upon the bill before us. I can say truly that I am opposed to any river and harbor bill that I have ever seen. I believe that the river and harbor appropriations made for many years past have been made under a vicious system of legislation. They have brought about a practice of what may not be inaptly termed "cross-lifting" to pass a bill or, as the practice is styled I believe by the Supreme Court, "log-rolling." I do not believe in that way of passing measures through Congress. I believe it is essentially wrong and that it is vicious. I have always voted since I have been in Congress for the river and harbor bill with great reluctance. I have not suffered my action at any time to be controlled by considerations such as those I have just adverted to. I have uniformly voted for amendments to such bills upon what I regarded as their merits at the time. In the case of the present bill I have voted to sustain the House bill except in a few instances, where I thought the amendments proposed by the committee were meritorious and ought to have been made.

I recognize the evils forcibly depicted by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] and other Senators in this debate. The speeches which they have made would be very proper upon another occasion. I believe that this system of making appropriations for improving the rivers and harbors of the country ought to be made in an entirely different way. I believe that a measure ought to be devised for that purpose, and if such a measure were before Congress I am quite sure no one would be more ready to support by his voice and his vote such a measure than myself. But such a measure is not here, nor is this the time to consider it. It seems to me that we ought to look into the merits of this bill and the necessities and considerations which ought to prompt the Senate to pass it. I shall think seriously in the future of aiding some Senator in bringing forward a bill for the purpose of devising some other way by which to determine what appropriations should be made for public works. It might be well to consider whether a commission cannot be provided, consisting of heads of Departments or certain officers of the Government, who, aided by the Chief Engineer of the Government, might determine what public works ought to be considered by Congress from time to time. I do not commit myself to such a course of action as that at this time, but some one like it, I am sure, ought to be adopted for the purpose of preventing the very difficulties and the practice which we see prevailing in the case of the bill now before the Senate, and which has prevailed for many years past. It ought to be corrected; but it ought to be corrected at a proper time and in a proper way. These eloquent speeches that are made now are not made for the purpose of bringing about this reform. They are manifestly for the purpose of defeating this particular bill, or if not for defeating the bill, to cut down the appropriations in such a way as to leave only such appropriations in the bill as will subserve the interests of persons who are deeply interested in them. I cannot join in any such warfare upon the bill as that. I think that it ought to be tried upon its real merits, and that we ought to vote for it in that light and in that light alone.

It is said that this bill is not consistent with the action of the House of Representatives in making appropriations for other general purposes. I do not assent to that proposition. It is not true in fact; for the bill as it came from the House made the appropriations less in amount than the appropriations of last year by over $800,000. Therefore it is in the line of retrenchment and reform. There is another consideration that must be taken into this account. There is no bill which is passed by Congress that is better calculated to improve the country in material respects and aid in its development than river and harbor bills. I do not believe that the country can do a better service than to open up in a proper lawful way its rivers and harbors, and promote the convenience and interests of commerce by so doing; but I do not care to enlarge upon that point.

There is another incidental effect that this appropriation will have at this time, and that is one that might weigh something. I do not advocate the policy that Congress shall appropriate money at any time, in any emergency, to feed and clothe the laborers of the country who are out of employment. I do not think that Congress has any such power, and if it had I should doubt the wisdom of exercising it at any time, but we know that there are thousands and tens of thousands of laborers who are out of employment to-day. They are in the cities; they are in the country; they are clamoring for bread; they are clamoring for raiment. They complain that the industries of the country are so depressed that they cannot get labor. They are ready to labor if labor were offered. If these appropriations should be made and distributed over the country, as they will be from one end of it to the other, hundreds, perhaps thousands of such persons out of employment shall receive employment. I think that that is a consideration that we are not at liberty to throw entirely out of the case.

I shall therefore, Mr. President, while I do not concur in the bill in its present shape, give it my support in some shape, at the same time disapproving of the practice of passing river and harbor bills. I shall be ready to join any Senator between now and the next session of Congress in devising some plan by which this vicious system of legislation can be dispensed with in the future. It is often the case that we have to do the best we can with an existing evil. So it is in this case.

I wish now to say a word or two upon the subject of two or three appropriations. I have been astonished that Senators ordinarily very generous in their feelings and liberal in their votes should become exceedingly stingy on this particular occasion, and particularly when somebody else is to be benefited by the appropriations contained in the bill other than themselves. I believe special reference has been made on one or two or more occasions to the appropriations made for my own State. One or two Senators have laughed at them, others have sneered at them, others have made faces at them, and thereby they expected to produce the impression upon the Senate and the country that they were simply monstrous.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will point out those Senators we will have them dealt with immediately.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not care to be personal. I never am personal in my remarks when I can avoid being so.

Mr. CONKLING. Any man who made a face at North Carolina should be put to death. [Laughter.]

Mr. MERRIMON. I would not have him put to death, but I would endeavor in a proper way to teach him better manners the next time.

I call attention to the four streams that are provided for in North Carolina. Take the Cape Fear River. At the place where this improvement is to be made and for many miles above it, the Cape Fear River is larger than the Mississippi at Memphis. More than that, an immense commerce floats upon it. Ships by the hundreds enter there annually. The trade of that town goes to South America, to the West Indies, to Europe, and I might say almost all over the globe. There is an immense coastwise trade that goes north and south from the port of Wilmington. If there is any work of national importance in a very considerable measure it is the port of Wilmington. The appropriation made by the House and the Senate—for it was increased in the Senate—is not equal to the amount demanded by the engineer. We might reasonably have asked that.

Mr. ALLISON. I will interrupt the Senator if he will yield.

Mr. MERRIMON. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senate Committee on Appropriations increased the appropriation at Cape Fear River $100,000.

Mr. MERRIMON. I know the Senate committee did that.

Mr. ALLISON. That sum goes to swell the aggregate amount of these appropriations.

Mr. MERRIMON. So it does.

Mr. ALLISON. And not a voice was raised against Cape Fear in this Senate by anybody. This is a proper appropriation.

Mr. MERRIMON. That is very true. I am very glad to hear the Senator say it is a very proper appropriation. It is a public work that has been on hand for some years and ought to be completed as soon as possible. Can anybody complain that that appropriation was made for North Carolina? It is true that North Carolina is locally benefited. Wilmington particularly is locally benefited; but Maine, and Massachusetts, and Rhode Island, and Connecticut, and New York, and New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, and Maryland, and every State upon our Atlantic coast is benefited by that appropriation. They have almost a direct interest in the improvement that is going on at the mouth of the Cape Fear River. My friend [Mr. EATON] suggests to me that so have the West an interest in that improvement. They send their breadstuffs, their wheat, corn, and grain to the East by way of Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York, and those productions go to North Carolina and to South Carolina by way of this port. I am glad to see that the merit of this appropriation is conceded by all.

Let us come to the next appropriation in North Carolina, which is for Pamlico River. That is not a creek; that is not a stream to float merely a flat-float. It also is a stream nearly as large, I will venture to say quite as large, as the Mississippi River at Saint Louis. An immense coastwise trade floats upon that stream. There are obstructions in the river whereby the vessels cannot get up to the trading point, to wit, the town of Washington. Everybody can see that those obstructions ought to be taken out. A small appropriation is made for that purpose. Can any reason be assigned why that appropriation shall not be made, or that it is not a just and a wise appropriation to be made? I have heard no reason except the simple unfounded suggestion that those are creeks, and only fish-boats float upon them, in North Carolina and elsewhere. Now we come to Perquimans River. Perquimans River is a larger river than the Pamlico River, and a very considerable commerce floats upon it. It is true it is a short river. It ought scarcely to be called a river at all, for it is really an estuary of Albemarle Sound. The river is very deep. There are some obstructions near the place where the vessels stop, and it is necessary to remove them. The trifling appropriation of $3,000 is made for that purpose. It is legitimate; it is proper; it is necessary.

Then we come to the appropriation that so much noise and parade is made about, that so many faces are made at, about which so much laughter is indulged in, and that is the improvement of the French Broad River. If any Senator knew the character of that stream, its location, the interests that would be developed, and the conveniences that would be subserved by this proposed improvement, I do not believe that a Senator present would hesitate for a moment to say that the appropriation is really a proper one.

We have heard Senators talking a great deal about conscience. Yesterday some Senators did not know how any man who had a conscience could vote for such appropriations as the French Broad River and similar appropriations. I believe I have some conscience, and I can vote for that appropriation without doing violence to conscience. I believe that it is a work of public improvement that will be beneficial to a section of the country that is very deserving. This is not a mere branch; it is not a mere creek. It is true it is in the mountains, but it is not a stream that is confined to North Carolina. It rises in North Carolina, passes into the State of Tennessee, and forms a main branch of the Tennessee River. Below the North Carolina line some distance it is navigable for boats, and I believe it is navigated every day. Through the Smoky Mountains there is an immense shoal. This part of the river cannot be made navigable, but from Asheville, in the direction of the source up a distance of forty-five miles, the river, as the engineer has stated, is from seventy-five to three hundred yards wide and has a depth of water, at low water, of from four to six feet, except upon the reefs and shoals. It passes through a beautiful rich valley with magnificent mountains on either side. The valley is rich in soil and in other respects. There are valuable deposits of iron-ore and other minerals along on either side of this stream. Iron is or has been manufactured at two or three places. With a small expenditure of money it can be made navigable for forty-five miles above the town of Asheville, which will answer a useful purpose. Although there is no railroad to Asheville at this time, and has not been in the past, it has been seriously contemplated several times to improve the river by private enterprise. It is expected that two railroads, one from the State of South Carolina, and one passing from east of the Blue Ridge, North Carolina, will reach Asheville within the next twelve or fifteen months. When that shall be done, this improvement will be a very proper one; it will be an exceedingly meritorious one; one that the Senate and Congress might well be proud of. I am sure if the American people could see and know it and appreciate its worth, after the proposed improvement shall be made no man would hesitate to say that Congress had made a wise expenditure of money in that behalf. Therefore, I say it is not monstrous or vicious to make this appropriation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What river is the Senator referring to?

Mr. MERRIMON. It is the French Broad.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that the one that the engineer reported last year would require a steam-pump to get water into it?

Mr. MERRIMON. No, sir. I expect that river is in the State of Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, no; it is in the State of North Carolina. I have the report right here. I have the report all ready for you.

Mr. RANSOM. I will inform the Senator from Vermont that no appropriation has been asked here for that river, but it will be improved some of these days.

Mr. MERRIMON. Is the fact that the French Broad is a mountain stream any objection to it? Is the fact that this navigation cannot connect with the navigation in the State of Tennessee, by reason of the shoals I have mentioned in the Alleghany Mountains, a reason why the improvement should not be made? I know that thousands and millions of dollars have been appropriated for the improvement of the Mississippi River as high as the Falls of Saint Anthony. Navigation cannot pass above those falls, but above those falls the Mississippi is navigable for two or three or four hundred miles, and thousands of dollars have been appropriated for the improvement of the Mississippi River above that point, while it is not contemplated a boat can ever pass over and around those falls.

I take it Congress has complete power to make this appropriation. For my own part I have no doubt about the fact that Congress has the power under the Constitution to make appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors in the proper way. I do not deem it necessary to go into an argument to prove the truth of this position, and indeed it is unnecessary that I should do so, because the practice to make such appropriations has prevailed in this country from almost the beginning of the Government. Statesmen of every variety of political views and of different views on the Constitution have supported measures of that character. To say that it is anti-democratic is to contradict the history of our legislation from the time the democratic party had an existence down to this time.

There is another point I want to say a word to my friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] about. The other day he not only laughed at this French Broad appropriation, as he called it, but he said the engineer had not made any estimate for it. He said there was no need of it, because the railroad had not reached Asheville yet. I am assured that the railroad will reach there at no very distant day. But why so much clamor about this appropriation and smaller appropriations? I see two or three appropriations made here by the House for small streams and the committee of the Senate do not say a word about them. I do not exactly understand it. Here is one of them:

For the improvement of the Chippewa River, Wisconsin, $15,000.

On looking at the engineer's report I do not see any recommendation for an appropriation for that river. Besides that, it is one of these small streams that we hear so much complaint about. Yet the committee did not see fit to take any notice of that at all, they let it pass. Here is another item in the bill:

For the improvement of the Red River of the North, Minnesota, $10,000.

It was amusing reading to me when I turned over to the engineer's report to see that river described; yet there is nothing said about that in the debate. That is one of the little streams of the character that is complained of.

I do believe the appropriations made by the bill as it came from the House have been made in such a way as to be distributed fairly all over the country. As my colleague said the other day, it is a very unwise policy that only looks to the heart without reference to the various arteries and veins that go to support the whole system of the body. In order that we may have an immense commerce on the seaboard, a commerce that will go to every clime, by which we shall interchange our products with the products of all nations, we must improve the rivers, the rivers in the mountains as well as the rivers in the valleys and the lowlands, in order that any one who has anything to sell may have an opportunity to get to the markets of the world.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WINDOM. I want to call his attention to the fact, as he has referred to the Red River of the North, that there were seven vessels, good-sized steamers, running on that river all last year. Two more are being built this year, and a very large amount of work has been done by them. There is a large commerce between this country and the British provinces. If the gentleman compares that with his mountain stream I will ask him if they ever heard of a steamboat up in Buncombe County or heard a steam-whistle?

Mr. MERRIMON. If the Government had done as much for Buncome County as it has done for the Red River, steamboats would have been there a long time ago.

Mr. WINDOM. I doubt very much if they know what a steamboat means in Buncombe County.

Mr. MERRIMON. I could not expect the Senator to make so ungenerous a remark as that. I was going a moment ago to doubt whether the voice of civilization had ever been heard on the Red River. I take it that it has. I should be very discourteous to say that no human being there ever saw or heard a steamboat or a steamboat whistle on the Red River of the North. I did not mean to make any point against the Senator's appropriation. I take it that it is just and meritorious. I was pointing out, and I think with some force, that it depended upon where the river was very much whether the appropriation was right or wrong.

Mr. WINDOM. It depends very much upon what its business is and its capacity for improvement.

Mr. MERRIMON. See what the policy of the Government has been toward this river in Minnesota.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator is aware that the Red River of the North is a boundary line between the State of Minnesota and Dakota Territory, and that it extends from Minnesota into the British province of Manitoba; that it is crossed by the Northern Pacific Railroad, and is navigable of itself, but requiring certain improvements to facilitate the navigation.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not intend to make a point against the appropriation for that river. I have no doubt it is a stream that ought to be improved. I think the Government has done a wise work in improving the navigation of the rivers of the Northwest, aiding in cutting canals, and all that kind of improvement. We see the fruits of it, the generous and noble results. Profiting by that experience let us go on and make that improvement somewhere else. We want some of these improvements in North Carolina. If southern statesmen in the past, as my excellent friend from West Virginia [Mr. CAMERON] stated yesterday, have talked too much about political obstructions, in the future I do not think they will do it; at all events I shall not. I have no conscientious scruples about this appropriation. I believe it is a wise and proper one, and if Congress shall make it they will not regret it in the future. The time will come when that country will blossom as the rose; when it will become the seat of wealth and refinement, and its resources will be developed so that it will be the summer-resort for our fellow-citizens from every quarter of the Union. I have no doubt about it.

I confess I am not satisfied with the amount provided by this bill as amended in the Senate. I wish a less amount than it contains now. I shall venture, however, to vote for it as it is, if need be, with the hope that it may be made what it ought to be in the conference committee.

I beg pardon for having detained the Senate so long. I thought, under the circumstances, I was warranted in saying what I have said.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but for a few minutes. I think it is proper to make some answer to what has been said by the Senator from North Carolina. My friend is undoubtedly sincere in what he has said to-day. He believes it all, and hence I shall not call in question his motive for any declaration. It is sometimes said that figures cannot lie; but we know that they can be placed so that they lie prodigiously. The figures which have been put into the hands of my friend from North Carolina—I know not by whom—do lie prodigiously; they come nowhere near the truth. I will ask my friend to let me see that statement about the defalcations in Johnson's administration in regard to whisky. It is very interesting.

The Senator was asked this question in the course of his remarks: What good thing has been done of any character by the democratic party in the last twenty-five years? I will ask what good thing has been done or suggested by that party in twenty-five years? I should like for any Senator on this floor to name it. I will give him the floor to name it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will tell the Senator. I say to him that the democratic House of Representatives at the present session have investigated and exposed the corruptions which have been practiced under the Administration which he supports; and that the various committees of that body have brought to light not only a degree of extravagance and of loose administration, but a degree of corruption that has astonished this whole country. That is a noble service which has been rendered by the democratic party at the present session.

Mr. MORTON. We know that the democratic party has assumed the role of the detective. How much it has discovered will appear more fully when we get the evidence. But that is dodging the question. The Senator has mentioned certain investigations during this session which I think up to this time have merited chiefly and received the contempt of the country. I repeat the question, What good thing has been done or suggested by the democratic party in the last twenty-five years? I see my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON,] who has an excellent memory. If there was one good thing in the history of his party for twenty-five years he would not hesitate to name it.

Mr. EATON. And he will name it before we get through with this discussion.

Mr. MORTON. When I look back I remember the fugitive-slave law in 1850; I remember the repeal of the Missouri compromise in 1854, that breach of faith which was the beginning of the war; I remember the border-ruffian outrages in 1855 and 1856; I remember the Lecompton constitution and the Dred Scott decision in 1857; I remember the democratic party in 1860 saying there was no power to coerce a State to remain in the Union; I remember its opposition to every war measure; I remember its meeting at Chicago in 1864, during the last great struggle, when every honest man knew that the rebellion was doomed unless it was saved from the North, and their declaring to the world, Mr. Tilden himself being on the committee, that the war was a failure and ought to be abandoned. I know that in any other country in the world than this, struggling with armed rebellion, that declaration would have been punished as high treason, as it deserved to be, made at that time and under the circumstances.

I remember its opposition to the abolition of slavery. I remember its opposition to the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments. I remember the counsel it gave to the South to reject all reconstruction. I remember the outrages of the Ku-Klux and white-leaguers who received protection and encouragement in the tents of the democratic party. I put the question to my friend—and I will give him the floor to answer—what good thing has his party done or even suggested in twenty-five years? Continually evil; the blackest and the most damnable record in the history of parties in this or any other country.

My friend from North Carolina talked a great deal about the expenses of the republican party. He talked about the increased expenses of the Government. He said the last four years had cost the country more to maintain this Government and carry it on than during the previous history of the Government. I do not know whether he is right about that or not; but I will assume for the sake of argument that he is; and I ask who is responsible for it? I answer, my friend and those with whom he has acted during that period. If we have incurred billions of expense, if we are now oppressed by a national debt, if we are burdened by heavy taxes, I tell him, he and those who acted with him have laid those burdens upon us. They are directly responsible; and it requires all the face—I will not say cheek—it requires all the good countenance even of my friend to stand up and say to the republicans, "You republicans did not conquer our rebellion quite as cheaply as you ought to have done; you have not handled taxation and the public debt and the other consequences growing out of our treason as well as you ought to have done. Therefore we are indignant about it. You ought to have done this business better; you ought to have whipped us at half the expense, and you did not. We propose to take the Government out of your hands and ourselves to settle with and deal with the consequences of our own crimes and blunders." That is the argument of my friend.

Mr. MERRIMON. Will the Senator let me say a word?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not concede what the Senator said. I deny it. I deny it substantially, perhaps not altogether in detail. But suppose it was true, is it not my duty and the duty of every good man to reform these acknowledged abuses? Is that any warrant for the wholesale plunder which I have only to a very limited extent developed here this morning?

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the Senator does not meet the point at all. He says, suppose it is so; suppose that he and his friends are responsible for all these things, is it not his duty to reform abuses? Certainly it is; and it is his duty and those who act with him to come back and pay these debts if they could; but they cannot do it. It is in bad taste for him and others to come here and throw these things in the face of the republican party as if they were crimes upon our part, when they are but the consequences, the legitimate results of his own conduct and those who acted with him. I am not putting it in a personal sense. When the Senator arraigns the republican party for the consequences of the rebellion, I tell him it is not within his power and it is not good taste for him to hold us responsible for it.

Mr. MERRIMON. That is simply a question of taste, then.

Mr. MORTON. No, sir; it is no question at all. There is no question about it. If these things are the natural and the legitimate consequences of the rebellion, it does not become those who were concerned in that rebellion, who helped to make it, or took any part in it, to throw it up to us as if it were a crime on our part; and that is what is continually being done. We are held responsible for the crimes, the misfortunes, and the blunders of others.

Mr. MERRIMON. Are we to sit here with our mouths closed, and are we not the equals of other Senators on this floor? If not, we ought to be turned out and sent away. I take it we are sent here under the Constitution of our country to do whatever we can by our advice and by our votes and co-operation calculated to promote the best interests of the country. I am here for that purpose. If I am not here as an equal, if I am not at liberty to discuss measures and to aid in maturing them, the sooner the republican party turn me and the men like me out the better.

Mr. MORTON. My friend has not been sitting here all the morning with his mouth closed, we all know, [laughter;] it is his perfect right to hold the party in power responsible for any of its misdeeds, and to seek to reform abuses that now exist and make things better in the future; but that is not what I am talking about, and I do not intend to have my friend, with all his shrewdness, escape from the point. I bring him right back and I tell him that all the demoralization of the times that he complains of, these vast expenses, these increased employés, and the enlargement of the civil list, all these are things that he and those who acted with him are responsible for; and they have no right to lay them at our doors as a crime or an offense.

The Senator said in the course of his argument that the republican party had accomplished all its measures by force. It was imputed to us as a crime that we had accomplished our measures by force. Sir, that is in great part true. We had to put the rebellion down by force. It required much blood and it required much treasure to put it down; and we are paying the debt every day; and even that is imputed to us as a fault, that the republican party has had to accomplish its measures by force. If we attempt to protect the colored people of the South and the white republicans from the numerous slaughters that have fallen upon them in the past and from those with which they are threatened in the future, we are told that we are trying to do it by force. Ay, if we cannot do it in any other way, it is our duty to do it by force. The protection of the lives of the people is the highest duty that is ever imposed upon government; and when such slaughters take place as occurred in South Carolina the other day where ten men were murdered in cold blood under circumstances of atrocity that would shame anything that has occurred in Indian warfare for years past, if we try to protect men from the repetition of those things even by force, would it not be justified?

The Senator referred to the great corruption of the republican party. He spoke about the exceeding purity of the Government under democratic administration, and how vile and how wicked it was under republican administration. I have been mingling with the democrats for a great many years and I know them pretty well everywhere.

Mr. MERRIMON. You used to belong to them.

Mr. MORTON. Yes, I did in their better days, and I suppose I shall never cease having that thing thrown up to me. I left them in 1854, twenty-one years ago and better. I am now of age in the republican party, and whenever a democrat wants to hurt my feelings he charges me with having been a democrat. [Laughter.]

Mr. MERRIMON. I can assure my friend that I did not intend to wound his feelings. I thought it very probable that was the proud part of his life.

Mr. MORTON. No, Mr. President, that is not the proud part of my life. The proud part of my life is that which was occupied in assisting in putting down the rebellion, preserving this Union, and conquering my friend and others who were in arms with him.

Mr. MERRIMON. My proudest part is the attempt to break up this corruption.

Mr. MORTON. I am coming to "this corruption" now. The Senator has brought in a statement that the Government lost during the administration of Andrew Johnson over a billion of dollars by frauds on the revenue in regard to whisky. This illustration, like the others, is exceedingly unfortunate. It happens that it was during a democratic administration.

Mr. MERRIMON. O!

Mr. MORTON. It was when the administration of the laws was under the control and the influence of the democratic party; but my friend says that the republican party is responsible for Johnson's administration, because it elected him, just in the same way that the republican party of North Carolina is responsible for my friend's speech this morning, because they elected him. I imagine that if the republicans of North Carolina had heard my friend's speech this morning they would come to the conclusion they had done a very bad job, [laughter;] that they had made a very bad mistake. My friend says he could not help getting their votes; he did not know about it; it was a surprise to him; he had no intimation of it, and he has never forgiven them for voting for him yet, and he was trying to punish them this morning. [Laughter.]

Mr. MERRIMON. I was very grateful for their votes.

Mr. MORTON. Ah! Grateful to those corrupt fellows for voting for him, and comes here to take Government money by the votes of a party that he describes as being the most corrupt that ever existed.

Mr. MERRIMON. I did not describe individuals in that way.

Mr. MORTON. My friend describes the republican party generally as being the most wicked and corrupt organization. It has done some good and generous things; my friend must admit that. It passed a bill enabling my friend to take a seat here and to give us the benefit from time to time of his distinguished eloquence.

Mr. President, it so happens that under the administration of Mr. Johnson, when the democratic party had full control of him and controlled his appointments, the frauds upon the revenue in the collection of the tax on whisky increased enormously, and although the tax at that time was $2 on the gallon the last year of his administration the collection was a little over $12,000,000, a mere bagatelle. The Senator from Ohio stated the fact here this morning. So much for democratic administration as compared with republican administration.

The most corrupt administrations this country has ever had were those that were purely democratic, and the documents in the Treasury Department show it. The most corrupt periods of our administration were under democratic rule.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask the Senator to cite his facts.

Mr. MORTON. I am going to. That is what I am going to do, and there is where I shall have the advantage of my distinguished friend. My friend believes all he said this morning; but when his speech is in print, it will look like that veritable history of Baron Munchausen; but, so far as my statement is concerned, I will verify it here. I have the statement from the Treasury Department; I am going to read it. Some four or five months ago, on the 9th of February, I believe, the Senate passed a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury to make a statement from the books of the Treasury of all the defalcations and failures to make settlement, from whatever cause, that had occurred in our country since the 1st of January, 1834. That embraced the last administration of General Jackson. That document was sent here and with it an analysis printed officially. It comes over the signature of the Secretary of the Treasury; it is true; it is given by detail; and it is worth ten thousand of the loose statements that my friend has made here this morning, I do not care how sincere he is in making those statements.

Mr. MERRIMON. Allow me one word?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MERRIMON. I allowed the Senator to interrupt me whenever he wanted to. That report does not present the facts at all, and I had supposed that my friend knew it. It does not present a true state of any case that is mentioned in it, and I believe in support of this declaration I might appeal to the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] I remember to have had a conversation with him about that, if I may allude to the conversation at all; if it is disagreeable to him I will not.

Mr. ANTHONY. Go on, sir; I do not understand what the allusion is.

Mr. MORTON. I can set that matter right. The statement is not correct in this, Mr. President, that there are defalcations put down that do not exist, that were afterward settled; but so far as the proportion is concerned between the different adminstrations, so far as my purpose is concerned in the comparison I propose to make, it is the same as if every defalcation here stated took place. The objection is that the statement is not too small, but too large.

Mr. MERRIMON. My objection is——

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to have the Senator from North Carolina state what the reference to me is. I did not hear it.

Mr. MORTON. I prefer going on. My friend has no right to anticipate my statement by coming in with a caveat in advance.

Mr. MERRIMON. The Senator from Indiana ought not to read that paper, for it does not present the facts. I have read no paper that does not present the facts as shown by the official records. That paper does not present the facts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. MORTON. I do not yield to my friend to make such a statement as that. I stated wherein it does not present the facts, that some of these defalcations in all administrations were afterward settled or turned out to be nominal; but that pertained just as much to one as to another, and, so far as the object I have in view is concerned, it is a fair statement, because it shows the proportion in all administrations, and now I propose to give it just as it is furnished from the books of the Treasury Department, and it puts to flight ten thousand lies that are being told every day in every State and from every stump about the republican party.

Take the last administration of General Jackson, The defalcations and failures to make settlement on the thousand dollars of collection as shown by the books of the Treasury were $10.55; in Van Buren's administration, $21.15; in Harrison and Tyler's administration, $10.37; in Polk's administration, $8.34; in Taylor and Fillmore's, $7.54; in Pierce's administration, $5.86; in Buchanan's administration, the last democratic administration, $6.98; in Lincoln's administration, $1.41, and that was during the war; in Johnson's administration, forty-eight cents; in Grant's first administration, forty cents; and in the last three years of Grant's administration, twenty-six cents on the $1,000. Here we have the statement from the Treasury Department that puts to flight all these Munchausen stories that are told about the monstrous corruption and degradation of the republican party; and I undertake to say now that all things considered, while there are defalcations, and there always will be until human nature is regenerated, and while there will be failures and short-comings and frauds, I believe to-day it is the purest and best administration this country has ever had.

Mr. MERRIMON. Gracious alive!

Mr. MORTON. The Senator says "gracious alive." It requires stronger declarations than that to get over these figures. My democratic friends have but two arguments in this campaign. The argument has been, in the South, violence, intimidation; and the argument in the North is the cry of reform and corruption. The first argument is the shot-gun, the revolver, the bowie-knife, and it is sharp and murderous; and the second argument is false and hypocritical. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rules must be observed.

Mr. MORTON. I think it has been said that in the last year of Buchanan's administration, in 1860, the expenses of the Government were only $60,000,000. Well, Mr. President, the population then was 31,000,000; it is now not less than 44,000,000; and when you take the expenditures of the Government then and compare them with the expenditures now, and the population then 31,000,000, now 44,000,000, and take out the payment of the interest on the public debt, the payment of pensions, and all the expenses brought upon us by the rebellion, I make the declaration without fear of contradiction that the expenses of the Government now are less per capita than they were in 1860. If they have been increased the responsibility is just where I placed it and where history will place it.

Mr. President, I should like to read this whole statement, but it is long and I will ask the privilege of incorporating it in my remarks. I mean the statement from the Treasury Department with all its details.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. EATON. I object. I object because it was not permitted to the honorable Senator from North Carolina to have a table printed in his remarks.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then have it read.

Mr. MORTON. I did not object to what my friend offered.

Mr. EATON. Let it be read.

Mr. MORTON. Let it be read from the beginning; it is good reading; it is in detail, and the detail and particularity will show the truth of what I said as a general statement. If my friends will have the patience to hear it read, I am sure we shall not object.

Mr. EATON. Let us hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the paper.

The Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., June 19, 1876.

Statement showing the receipts and disbursements of the Government from January 1, 1834, to June 30, 1875; exhibiting also the amount of defalcations and the ratio of losses per $1,000 to the aggregate received and disbursed, arranged in periods, as nearly as practicable, of four years each, and also in the periods prior and subsequent to June 30, 1861; prepared under the direction of the Secretary, to accompany his answer to a resolution of the United States Senate, dated February 9, 1876, calling for a detailed statement of balances due from public officers no longer in the public service which have arisen since 1830:

NOTES TO THE FOREGOING TABLES.

1. In cases where the accounts of defaulting officers embraced more than one period the losses, unless known to have occurred in other periods, have been charged to the periods in which the accounts were opened in this Department. In cases of defaulting banks, however, for want of other information, the losses have been charged to the periods in which they are reported on the books, though doubtless in several instances they actually occurred in previous periods. No losses of the latter kind, however, have been included unless known to have occurred within the period covered by this statement.

2. No deductions have been made for amounts which may be collected hereafter, though a large percentage of the recent losses will doubtless be yet recovered.

3. In preparing this statement the receipts and disbursements since June 30, 1843, have been classified by fiscal years as in the published official reports; the losses have in all cases been classified by calendar years, it not being practicable to separate the losses occurring in the fractional years of each period, but the periods compared being of the same length the result is substantially correct.

Mr. MORTON. I ask my friends to state what good thing the democratic party had done or proposed to do in a quarter of a century, and my friend from Delaware referred to investigations set on foot by the House of Representatives which he said had developed great frauds and corruption. I might ask the Senator what frauds on the Government of the United States have been developed thus far that he can name; what the Government has lost by any frauds that have been proven before these investigating committees. We are now sitting as judges upon a Cabinet officer, and in regard to his case it is not proper for the Senator or for me to express any opinion; but it is not even charged that so far as he was concerned the Government lost anything by him; and now, in view of this very broad statement, the only saving clause he can possibly make for the democratic party in twenty-five years, I ask him to name the investigation that shows that the Government has lost anything by fraud that has been developed or practiced. I will give him the floor.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Delaware will answer after the Senator from Indiana finishes his speech.

Mr. MORTON. I offer my friend the floor. I want him to state what single dollar it has been shown that the Government has lost by any of these frauds and corruptions which it is said have been developed. I will give him the floor now to do it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Delaware will take his own time.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I have already taken more time than I intended to do; but I am going to conclude by this question that I propound to that Senator and to the whole country: Who can be safely trusted with reform? Reform is the normal business of every party at all times, and of every Congress. It is like the poor: the necessity for reform is always present with us; and that party is truly the reform party that carries it on quietly and steadily from year to year, and not that party which breaks out now and then with spasmodic declarations in favor of reform, but which in all intermediate periods practices corruption whenever it has the chance. I ask what men or set of men can be best intrusted with this Government? I say they are the men who preserved this Union, who put down the rebellion, who have preserved this Government, who have preserved the credit of the country and are laboring to make it perfect, who are determined to pay its debts and to maintain its good name; the men who have amended the Constitution, who have abolished slavery, who have conferred equal rights upon men of every race, color, and condition. They are the honest men to be intrusted with reform. I think we can trust them better than we can those men who come to us fresh from the rebellion, who come to us fresh from slavery; better than we can trust those hacks and humbugs who have come down from twenty years of democratic misrule before the war; better than we can trust the fugitives who have been kicked out of the republican party for incapacity and fraud; better than we can trust the alumni of Tammany Hall.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I believe the pending question is the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to refer the river and harbor bill to the Committee on Appropriations, with instructions to limit the amount of appropriation to $4,000,000. I had intended before the vote was taken on that motion to submit some remarks upon the bill and in favor of the motion of the Senator fron Ohio. I had not intended to enter into any political discussion on this question. The Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] however, has seen proper in the conclusion of the remarks which he has just submitted to call upon me personally to explain what losses to the Government have been revealed by the investigations going on in the House of Representatives by reason of the action of the republican party, and perhaps before I close my remarks I may have something to say in answer to that interrogatory. I propose, however, at the outset to confine myself to the consideration of the bill under discussion, intending that the remarks which I make shall be in favor of the motion of the Senator from Ohio to recommit that bill with instructions to report an amount not exceeding $4,000,000 for rivers and harbors.

Now, sir, what are the provisions of this bill? Let us look at it as it lies on our tables. It proposes to appropriate money to the improvement of rivers and harbors of national importance, appropriations necessary and proper for the protection and benefit of the general commerce of the whole country, and, in so far as the bill proposes to make appropriations to objects of that character, it is in harmony with the usages of the Government, I believe, from the foundation of the Republic, and I have no objection to make, therefore, to that portion of the bill. It is, I believe, the general sentiment of the country that those harbors essentially necessary for the protection of the general commerce of the country should receive the fostering care and protection of the General Government. But the bill goes further; the bill, both as it came from the House of Representatives and as it was reported from the Senate Committee on Appropriations and has been amended here, goes to the extent of appropriating money from the public Treasury, not to works of improvement necessary and advantageous to the general commerce of the country, but it proposes a distribution, unequal it is true, of the public moneys of this country among the States of this Union for the purpose of cleaning out their rivers and creeks, many of them wholly internal, within the State, and over which the General Government has no control; rivers and creeks, too, that have no navigation and no commerce which Congress can regulate under the power contained in the Federal Constitution to regulate commerce. It appropriates money to clean out streams that are not navigable and to make navigable mere branches or streams of water that are now admitted not to be navigable for any kind of vessels and which have no commerce. I shall not specify any particular work; but I say that so far as the bill applies to that class of improvements it is in my opinion wrong in its provisions, and in my judgment we have no right to appropriate money for any such purpose.

The argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] yesterday, which was very clear and lucid, showed conclusively, to my mind, that the appropriation of moneys out of the Treasury for the purpose of originating navigation where none existed is unauthorized by the provision of the Constitution giving to Congress the power to regulate commerce, or by any other provision of that instrument. If we go into that kind of improvement by the General Government, where will be your limit? If, for instance, Congress may take a stream, whether in North Carolina, or West Virginia, or Missouri, or Delaware, or anywhere else, upon which there is no commerce, which is not navigable, which contains obstructions that have up to the present time defied the ingenuity of man to overcome, and attempt to make them navigable and set commerce upon them, where is the limit to its power? If, I say, the Federal Government may, out of the public Treasury, go into any of these States and clean out rivers, dig out channels, in other words, make mere branches and streams which are not navigable highways for commerce, where is the limit to the power of the General Government in that behalf? If you can make an artificial highway in the bed of a rivulet merely because there is water passing down it, may you not cut a canal across any elevated portion of your country? May you not connect the waters of the Pacific and the Atlantic by a canal, and make a highway for commerce where none exists?

Again, if you may construct one kind of artificial highway, I ask the question whether you may not make any kind of an artificial highway. If you may dig a canal or if you may clean out an unnavigable stream and make it navigable by cutting a channel in it, by removing obstructions, and open it to the commerce of a State, then I take it you may build railroads within the limits of a State, railroads for mere local improvement and only of local value.

Now take up this bill and answer me this question, are there not many of its provisions which propose to benefit certain localities alone, and not to advance the general commerce of the country? Sir, it is a stretch of the authority conferred by the Constitution when you attempt by the exercise of the power of the Government, when you attempt by appropriations out of the public Treasury to advance the local interests of particular neighborhoods, and you are going a great way, in my opinion much further than the Constitution of this country warrants in any such attempts. If you may promote local advantages by appropriations from the public Treasury to works of this character, I know of no limit whatever. I know the argument that has been repeated on this floor, and perhaps will be repeated again, that it is developing an undeveloped country, that it is adding to the products of the country and bringing into market and into the general commerce of the country productions which otherwise would not be brought in. In other words, that it facilitates the advantages of neighborhoods and localities and adds to their productive industry, and by that means adds to the general wealth of the country and to the commerce of the country. But test the logic of that argument. If that is a substantial reason why you may appropriate money out of the public Treasury, then I ask may you not upon the same process of reasoning appropriate money out of the Treasury to drain the swamps and savannas of the Southern States, to cut canals and ditches for the purpose of draining and reclaiming the lands that are now not arable, and by that means promote the general interests of the country by developing the resources of the country, developing the productive capacity of certain localities whereby they may contribute to the general products of the country and thereby incidentally benefit the commerce of the country?

We ought to pause before we take such a wide departure, we ought to look to what consequences such a doctrine may lead; for I confess standing here in my place that if the doctrines of this bill, which are no worse than former bills of the kind, are to prevail, if the public money of the country is to be taken from the Treasury and appropriated to works wholly local in their interest and to the improvement of streams that are not navigable, I know no limit to the power of Congress; and if a majority of the Senate should represent neighborhoods that might need canals or ditches cut for the purpose of their reclamation and development, they would have the same authority to vote money to such objects, because the same argument that sustains the one would sustain the other; that is, the argument that it develops the country and furnishes a means for the increased production of the country and thereby the incidental enlargement of the commerce of the country. I have no objection to any of these local interests; I should be glad to see them promoted; but I want to see them promoted in a proper way; I want to see them promoted by the States and by the localities in which they lie. I do not believe that every neighborhood that has a little stream running through it should come to Congress and ask for an appropriation of money that the obstruction may be cleaned out and navigation made where nature never designed that there should be navigation.

I shall not go through the details of this bill for the purpose of pointing out and making invidious distinctions between the different items of appropriation here. My purpose is answered when I say that the bill as it came from the House and as it is now before the Senate contains appropriations of that character for which I cannot, with a due regard to the Constitution of the country and a just regard for the interest of the people, vote. I am perfectly willing that all appropriations to proper objects should be made, and I am therefore in favor of referring this bill back to the committee that they may eliminate from it those matters which are objectionable, and put it in such shape as will enhance and promote the general interests of the commerce of the country, and wipe from it everything which proposes simply the advantage of the local interests of neighborhoods.

But, Mr. President, suppose we have the power; suppose there was authority under the Constitution of the country for Congress to put its hands in the Treasury and take therefrom money and appropriate it to every object named in this bill, then I ask would it be right, would it be proper, would it be expedient in the present condition and circumstances of the country to do so? Let us look for a moment at our condition. Your revenues have fallen off. That is not denied in any quarter of this House. You have a large public debt the interest of which must be paid. The honor of the Government is pledged to it; and I apprehend that there is not a Senator on this floor who would be willing to see the period arrive in the history of this country when the revenues of this Government should not be sufficient to meet, and promptly to meet, the plighted faith of the Government. It makes no difference what may be our views as to the propriety of the creation of that debt; it may make no difference what may be our views of that policy which placed our debt in foreign countries and extracts from the people of this country $100,000,000 in gold to pay to foreign capitalists; it makes no difference what may be our views in reference to the extravagance which created the public debt as it exists; it makes no difference what may be our view in reference, I had almost said, to the stealings that are incorporated in the public debt; it is the public debt of the country and is binding on the country. Every man on this floor I trust feels sufficient interest in the honor and dignity of this country to provide promptly for the extinguishment of the interest of that debt as it falls due and the ultimate extinguishment of the principal of the debt as soon as the business interests of the country will justify it. Therefore I say our first duty is to maintain inviolate the plighted honor and faith of the Government and uphold its credit, whether we approve of the manner in which that credit was transferred to foreign capitalists or not, and we should not by unwise appropriations frit away the public money and lessen the ability of the Government to meet its obligations.

Well, sir, you have other debts that must be paid. You have a pension debt of near $30,000,000. You have pledged the country to pay that debt, and many persons are now living upon the bounty of the Government for whose support you are pledged to provide, the wives and children of men who fell in the war. We are pledged to pay to them the dues which the Government promised to the soldier if he lived and promised to his wife and children if he died. I do not want to endanger that fund in any particular. While I have no doubt that many frauds have been committed upon the pension fund, while I have no doubt that there are a large number of persons now pensioned by the Government who ought never to receive pensions because they are not entitled to them under any law of the land, (and I am justified in that remark because I have understood that a former Commissioner of Pensions declared that a large percentage of the pension claims upon the Government were fraudulent,) yet while we have the pension list to provide for, I want to see no part of the revenues of this country improperly diverted to other subjects so as to endanger that responsibility which rests upon the Government. Your revenues are pledged to other objects and are falling off, and you are not in a condition to-day to engage in this wholesale business of improvement throughout the whole length and breadth of this land of the character which I have described.

It is not only the condition of the Government in reference to its revenues that forbids this wild appropriation of money, but the actual condition of the country forbids it. I am aware that the Government has but to exert its power and it can call in from the people by taxation enough means to maintain its honor and credit even if you appropriate this money. I know that by the exertion of the taxing power the Government may be in receipt of additional revenues and may take from the people of this country that which they actually need for their support and may put it in the Treasury; but I am not in favor of such an exertion of the taxing power of this Government. The fact is that our views in reference to the taxing powers of this Government, I am fearful, are becoming entirely too undefined. The Government has the right to tax the people of this country for the legitimate purposes of government; but we are fast lapsing into that condition when we rely upon the taxing powers of the Government for every purpose and believe that power unlimited. Now, sir, as a citizen of the Government I am bound to yield my just share and proportion of the expenses of the protection which that Government gives me; but the Government is bound and we as Senators are bound to see that the power of taxation is not improperly exercised, but that it is kept within the proper limits. We should be careful to do nothing that would necessitate the exercise of the taxing power improperly. We should make no appropriations of money which will devolve on Congress the duty and necessity of exercising the taxing power in any greater respect than is absolutely necessary for the proper administration of government and the maintaining of the honor and dignity of the Government and the happiness of the people.

If we keep on with these wild, extravagant expenditures, there must be at least the present maximum of taxation kept up and perhaps largely increased. The people of this country want to be relieved from oppressive burdens. They have felt for years that the burdens of government were pressing heavily upon them, but they have nobly responded to the demands of the Government; but that response is felt to be oppressive all over this country; the people are becoming poor, and you find throughout every portion of this country, now that bankruptcies are occurring, that real estate is depreciated, that men are out of employment because capitalists have been unable to carry on their business. Scarcely any people on the face of the earth have had such a strain upon them as the American people in the last ten or fifteen years. I do not know the exact amount that has been collected from the people of this country, but I will venture the remark that there has been upon the average not less than $400,000,000 for the last fifteen years, which would aggregate $6,000,000,000 that has been collected from the American people. During the present Administration it will average more than $300,000,000 which has been collected from the people and placed in your Treasury; and I say again, and I repeat it with emphasis, that no people on the face of the earth can stand such a drain upon their resources.

There are comparatively very few men who have more than what is absolutely necessary for the support of themselves and their families, and yet they have been compelled to contribute to the expenses of the Government. They have felt that they were bound to uphold in part the honor and dignity of the country, and they have not complained; but the wolf is at their door now; men are becoming poor everywhere. Take up the papers in any county almost, in any State of this Union, and you will find the advertisements of the sheriff or auctioneer of forced sales and men who are being sold out. I know that is the case in my own State, and I believe to-day we are in better condition than almost any State in this Union, simply because in the management of our State affairs we have been exceedingly economical and prudent; and yet the people are becoming poor because of this continual drain on their resources. We ought, therefore, I say again, to be careful how we appropriate the money in the Treasury which has been placed there by taxation of the people, and which must be replaced, if we take it out of the Treasury and improperly apply it, by additional taxation.

Looking away now from individual interests, looking at the country as a whole, I say that we are not in a condition to expend money for these purposes at the present time, at any rate to expend it so lavishly as is proposed by this bill. It is true that judging by one statement of facts the country would seem to be prosperous. I believe that our exports exceeded our importations and that the balance of trade was slightly in our favor during the last fiscal year, perhaps from sixty to seventy million dollars in our favor. But that does not show our real condition. Suppose the balance of trade is in our favor slightly; suppose it is even $70,000,000; we are still debtors because we have the interest to pay in foreign countries on the national debt and upon municipal bonds and corporation and State bonds held abroad. We have an amount of not less, I apprehend, than $125,000,000 to pay annually in interest abroad so that your $70,000,000 would be unequal to your interest account abroad and leave you minus some $50,000,000. My friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] says our interest account abroad is $200,000,000. If that is the case does it not demonstrate that as a whole we are becoming poorer? To illustrate. Suppose for instance upon my farm I raise a thousand dollars' worth of wheat or other products to sell, and it requires $900 to meet the ordinary wants of my family. I have $100 surplus left. If I am clear of debt the small surplus would be a slight addition to my capital; but if upon my farm I owe a mortgage of $5,000, the interest of which is $300, my $100 of surplus would only pay one-third part of my interest, and thus my indebtedness is becoming increased, I am daily becoming poorer and poorer; and that is just the condition of this country. While the balance of trade may be slightly in our favor it is wholly insufficient to meet the interest which we have to pay abroad, and we are becoming as a country poorer and poorer every day. It is not in a condition to have any additional burden laid upon it which can be properly dispensed with.

With the thermometer at 86° while I speak I do not propose to trespass long on the time of the Senate, but for these reasons assigned and others not mentioned I am in favor of a recommittal of this bill so that the Committee on Appropriations, with a proper regard to the condition of the country, with a proper regard to the revenues of the country, and with a proper regard to the interests of commerce, may re-adjust it and eliminate all these matters which are improper to be placed in this bill. I am in favor, as a general rule, of economy, and I am especially in favor of economy at this time, when I know, and you know, sir, that all over this country from one end of it to the other there is a demand for retrenchment and for reform.

Yesterday the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] and the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] saw proper in their criticisms on this bill to refer to it as a political job, as got up for political purposes, dispensing with that professed economy which the House of Representatives had attempted to practice. Well, sir, I do not approve of the House bill. I think the House bill a mistake in providing for some of the improvements to which I have referred. The House made a mistake in the amount of the appropriations, which I do not believe under existing circumstances ought to have exceeded two and a half millions or three millions of dollars. But, sir, that bill is not liable to the criticism of the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Indiana, because as it came from the House to the Senate it was a reduction of expenditures; it provided for a less appropriation than the bill of last year of something near a million dollars; and to that extent it was in the line of economy. I am only sorry that it did not go to a greater extent. I know how difficult it is for the committees of either House of Congress to confine appropriations within proper and legitimate limits; I know the importunities that are made to the committees by members representing the various States of this Union for appropriations for their States. The work is not an easy one for the Committee on Appropriations or the Committee on Commerce having charge of the bill to resist the importunities of Senators and Representatives to do something for the interests of their States. The bill, however, as it came from the House appropriated less money by near a million dollars than the bill as it now stands, and was a better bill than it is at present, but we ought, in my opinion not to hesitate to refer this bill back to the committee that it may be properly revised.

Mr. President, this is about all that I intended to say on this subject; but I have a word or two in reply to the interrogatory submitted to me by the Senator from Indiana. That Senator inquires what good the democratic party has done. Why, sir, I need not answer the question. The history of this country discloses what the democratic party has done. The fathers of that party took hold of your Government in its very infancy; and their first act was to wipe from the statute-books of this country the alien and sedition laws that had disgraced your legislation. They took hold of your country when it was only thirteen small colonies and added the vast domain of the West to your territory. It reached forth its hand and took in "the lone star" of my friend from Texas. It extended its jurisdiction and brought into your country the Californias, with all their rich mines of gold and silver. It extended your area from a small strip of country on the Atlantic seaboard and has given a sea-coast of one thousand miles upon the shores of the Pacific. Then, sir, the democratic party took hold of your currency when it was at a discount, when it consisted of the notes of wild-cat banks and of a national bank, and when that national bank was attempting to measure arms with the Government of the country it took hold of that institution and exposed its rottenness and corruption, and it gave you a democratic currency of gold and silver. Comparatively few men in the country had ever seen a piece of gold coin until the democratic party of the country came into power and gave you, under the lead of Jackson and Benton, gold and silver and made your currency convertible therein. It is too late for the Senator from Indiana to inquire now about what the democratic party has done. It paid off your national debt during the administration of General Jackson; and I venture, at the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut, to say that, if the national debt that you have created shall ever be paid, it will be paid under the auspices of democratic policy. The country has come to believe that the wasteful extravagance of the republican party, unless reversed, will render it impossible to pay any large proportion of the public debt of this country, and are looking to the democracy to save the country from the ruin which republicanism has brought upon it.

I know that during the administration of the Senator from Massachusetts in the Treasury Department there was some reduction of the public debt, but how? You had enormous taxation upon the country; you drained the people of their resources; you were impoverishing the country and placing its resources in the public Treasury; and then a very unwise policy—I speak it with all due deference to the Senator—was instituted of taking the surplus revenue and applying it so as to enhance the value of the bonds of the Government in the hands of the foreign holders, which should have been applied to redeeming the promise of the Government to pay its greenbacks in coin.

Sir, your republican party has been wholly inefficient and incompetent to manage the interests of this country. Here stands to-day your greenback at a discount, notwithstanding your solemn promise in 1869 that it should be redeemed in coin. Often have I heard the chairman of the Finance Committee hold up that resolution to his brother-Senators on the republican side and call upon them to redeem their promise; but it is not redeemed. Your greenbacks are at a discount still and will ever remain at a discount until democratic policy shall give the country a currency based upon gold and silver and bring up your greenbacks from their depreciated condition to an equality in marketable value with coin.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator were to say that in Ohio, the democrats there would set him down as the worst kind of a black republican. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am afraid there are a good many things wrong in the State of Ohio. I should very much regret to have to part company with my friend, the honorable chairman of the Finance Committee, but if the public sentiment of the people of Ohio was right I am very sure he would be serving his last term in the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe I read this morning in a newspaper a speech made by perhaps the ablest democrat in the State, a campaign speech, in which he denounced the republican party for its attempt to resume specie payments as a great crime against civilization; denounced its efforts to bring about the resumption of specie payments as the most undemocratic measure it has adopted in the life-time of the party.

Mr. SAULSBURY. And I think the criticism was perfectly right. I think that orator, be he who he may, knew full well that the Senator from Ohio and his party when they passed the bill declaring that they would resume in 1879 knew at the time that they would not be able to do it. He knew that it was thrown out as "a tub to the whale;" that there was no sincerity in his party when they declared that they intended to resume specie payments; he knew they were impotent to do it; he knew that they had accumulated a large public debt which required all the gold that could be obtained in the country to pay the interest on that debt, and he knew full well that that was not an honest declaration on the part of the republicans, but was a bridging over a scheme of a republican Congress to prevent a disruption on the currency question. Hence when that gentleman denounced their bill in favor of resumption, he did it because he knew that it was not the honest purpose of the party to resume and that they were wholly impotent for it. Now, sir, the democratic party do mean to resume; but they do not mean to disrupt the business of this country; they do not mean by a violent shock to the business interests of the country to bring it back in a day, and undo in a day all the evil which the republican party has done in fifteen years. But we pledge the country and we pledge the Senator from Ohio that when we come into power we will take measures looking to resumption at the proper time by the proper means, and will give assurance to the country that at no very distant day, and just as soon as we can undo the evils which have been done by the republican party, the currency shall be restored to a sound basis.

Now, Mr. President, I have stated some of the things which the democratic party has done, and I will tell the Senator from Indiana some other things which it has done. It has not been in power for the last fifteen years until fortunately it obtained the control of the House of Representatives at the present session of Congress, but the democratic party has been in existence in all that time. We have been here and in the other House and in the States of this Union protesting against your violations of the Constitution and holding up that instrument before you and asking you to have respect for it. We have at last by awakening public opinion compelled you to pay some respect to that Constitution which for years you seemed to disregard and trample in the dust. I have read somewhere of the man who when his friend fell upon the battle-field bent over his body and defended it from the indignities of the foe. It reminds me of the democratic party that during these past years when the Constitution of the country was stricken down stood over that Constitution and preserved it in some respect from the desecration of the men who were trampling it in the dust, until it has come forth again to have some measure of respect on the other side of this Chamber.

Now, sir, I repeat what I said to the Senator from Indiana when I say that in the other House of Congress, if I may refer to the other House, investigations have been going on which have exposed corruptions, which have exposed loose and wasteful administration of the Government. The Senator asked me what had been loose or had been discovered to have been loose by any of those committees. I will answer that question. I say in reply to the inquiry what have the investigations shown to have been lost by the General Government, that the investigations show that men of influence in this Administration have been speculating upon their influence, upon Navy contracts, upon Army contracts, upon contracts for supplies to the Indians, and the Government has had to pay increased prices which have been charged in the contract. One firm—I do not wish to mention names—acknowledges that in reference to Navy contracts they have made $300,000. Sir, you will find out when the reports of these committees come in what they reveal. I shall not anticipate them. I mention that single instance in response to the inquiry of the Senator from Indiana.

Sir, I repeat again that there never was in the history of this country, I had almost said in the history of any civilized country on the face of the earth, a looser—and I use a mild term when I say "looser"—administration of public affairs than has existed in the last eight years, and the people of the country are waking up to the fact. The people have felt the oppression and are demanding relief. You may oppress the American people to a certain extent, but when their burdens become too oppressive and grievous they will cry out.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will my friend allow me? I really do wish now that he would reply in specific terms to the question of the honorable Senator from Indiana. If there is any corruption in the country let us know what it is, who committed it; give us the facts and circumstances, and I will examine for myself to find out who are guilty and who are responsible. If some Army or Navy contractor has cheated the Government to the amount of $300,000, I should like to know who he is, and I should like to know with whom he combined; and if there is any wrong I will join the Senator and disclose it and expose it. Let him give us the particulars.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator is not a novice in the history of this country; he is not a novice in the history of his own party; and I utter what I have no doubt is true when I express the belief that he himself as chairman of the Finance Commitee has protested against some of the doings of his party privately in the ears of men of authority. It is not for me to point out all the individual robberies that have taken place. Why, sir, I could point to numerous cases. Does he remember the Paymaster Hodge? That was a defalcation, they say; but why were the men placed in power that were suffered to default and rob the Government? Why were the whisky men, McKee and others, suffered to run the whisky business in Saint Louis?

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am speaking to the Senator from Ohio. Let me get through with him.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have got the case of Major Hodge and the case of McKee. I want to know what other cases there are of gross fraud and corruption in which the republican party has been implicated, and I really desire to have the fullest information. The gentleman has had the benefit of about fifty-five investigating committees. Now let us have the names and details, the nature of the case, exactly the extent of our offending, and I think when the matter is examined into a majority of them will be found to be on the other side.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I am not to be diverted from my own line of thought by the ingenuity of the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from Minnesota, who desires to be heard upon this question.

Mr. WINDOM. Will not the Senator allow me to make——

Mr. SAULSBURY. But a few days ago when I was in Saint Louis a gentleman kindly invited me to take a ride with him after the labors of that memorable convention were over which gave hope and promise to this country. I took the ride, and among the other points of the city he said, "I want to show you our jail." I went there and I saw by accident these men, McKee and others. While the sympathies of my nature always preponderate even for the criminal in the dock, and I have never seen one sentenced to the punishment of death but what I felt commiseration for the unfortunate criminal, yet I felt not the pang of regret that these public plunderers who had robbed the Government of its revenue had been ferreted out by an honest Secretary of the Treasury and prosecuted until they found their lodgement in the jail at Saint Louis; and now I want to ask my friend from Ohio why——

Mr. WINDOM rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Not at present; I will be courteous to my friend.

Mr. WINDOM. I thought the Senator from Delaware was through with the Senator from Ohio, and might allow me to put a question.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask why Mr. Dyer, why Secretary Bristow, why Mr. Henderson, why Postmaster-General Jewell have been summarily dismissed? Ah, do not tell, gentlemen, for you would be revealing party secrets. My friend [Senator EATON] reminds me of my venerable friend Pratt, who I believe to be a perfectly honest man. In the Internal Revenue Bureau my friend Pratt is no more. He has gone the way of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the Postmaster-General, of Henderson, and of Dyer, and I do not call upon my friends to tell the reason why, for it might be revealing state secrets.

Mr. WINDOM. Has not my time arrived when I can get a question to the Senator?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will yield to my friend from Minnesota now.

Mr. WINDOM. My purpose in rising a moment ago was to appeal to my friend from Delaware not to permit his courtesy to those whom he called thieves to prevent his giving us the names of those exposed by the House of Representatives. We hear a great deal of "this corruption" in general terms. We have heard a great deal to-day. Now I beg my friend that he will not allow his regard for thieves, as he calls them, to prevent our having their names.

Mr. SAULSBURY. My honorable friend will have access to the reports, and I commend them to him as good reading for every day in the week except the Sabbath, and on the Sabbath day I would ask him to read some of the chapters of Nehemiah, where he will find a perfect illustration of the oppressions which this republican party has brought upon the country. He will find there that when Nehemiah went up to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, after he had become reinstated, the people cried out and complained to him of the oppression which their rulers had placed around them, and he called the rulers before him and compelled them to disgorge and deliver back the mortgaged property to those who had been oppressed Let me tell my friend when our Nehemiah comes in on the 4th of March, and the democrats have the power in the House and in the Senate, we intend to call upon plunderers everywhere to disgorge their ill-gotten gains, and to place them back in the Treasury, or in the conscience fund, if you please.

Mr. WINDOM. If I do not trouble my friend from Delaware——

Mr. SAULSBURY. Not at all.

Mr. WINDOM. I should like to ask him whether I am to find the names of those thieves disclosed by these investigating committees anywhere else than in the book of Nehemiah? If so, please inform me in what report and give the names.

Mr. SAULSBURY. He will find in the reports of the committees that I referred to. He will find that Navy contracts have been given out, if not corruptly yet under a loose administration, whereby the Government has been robbed, and he will find that vessel-knees which cost in my own State only $9 to the contractor were taken to New York and Philadelphia and paid for by the Government at twenty-seven or eight dollars per knee. He will find that men have sold their influence to obtain contracts.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the honorable Senator now give us the name? Evidently he is getting very close to something.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I refer him to the House record, to the reports of the committees. I am not here to deal in personalities. I speak of your party. I eschew that vulgar partisanship which attempts to deal with private individuals; but I deal with your party. I say that from the crown of its head to the sole of its foot, judging by its acts during the last eight years, it is nothing but bruises and putrifying sores.

Mr. WINDOM. That is very general. Cannot the Senator descend to particulars a little more than that?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not choose to answer the Senator's questions. I refer him again to the reports of the committees, wherein he will find revealed the loose administration of public affairs and the corruptions that are cropping out in every department of this Government. Was there no corruption, I will ask my friend, in the squandering of $3,000,000 by the Department of Justice in employing agents, deputy marshals, and marshals to go down through Alabama, through Mississippi, through all the Southern States to intimidate the people, spending the public money for political purposes to deter men from going to the election and voting the democratic ticket? Why, sir, when the facts of your administration become fully revealed the people of this country will be astonished and indignant.

Mr. WINDOM. What I desire is to be astonished now, if the Senator will only reveal what those frauds discovered are.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Well, there some who are so blind that they will not see. If my honorable friend will only look into the history of his own party; if in fact he would divulge what he himself knows, he would not only astonish me but he would astonish the whole country, for I have no doubt that my good honest friend has been inquiring into these wrongs and has tried in his way to help correct them.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield further?

Mr. SAULSBURY. No, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware declines to yield. The Senator from Delaware will proceed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I did not intend to be betrayed into this line of remark. I do not think I should have uttered a word political in its character except for the interrogatory specially addressed to me by the Senator from Indiana. He never rises in his place but what he attacks the democratic party; and we are compelled always when we say anything in defense of the democratic party or retaliate at all on the republican party to refer to the Senator from Indiana. It might be supposed, if we did not know better, that he was the only man in the republican party, because he never suffers any Senator to make a speech on this side of the Chamber which he thinks is doing damage to the republican party but what he deems it his mission to rise and correct the statements and, if he can, to furnish the antidote; and hence none of us can make a speech on this side of the Chamber but we are compelled to reply to the Senator from Indiana. I should be very glad to hear from other gentlemen. There are men of great ability on the other side of the Chamber, men whom I should be glad to hear from occasionally; but the whole monopoly of party management on this floor on the republican side seems to be taken by the Senator from Indiana except as it is contested occasionally by my worthy friend the Senator from Illinois.

I now yield the floor, apologizing to the Senate for the time I have taken and for the line of remark in which I have been compelled to indulge in reply to questions directed to me personally by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I wish that the Senator from Indiana in his animadversion upon what I submitted to the Senate this morning had gone into the facts and made arguments to disprove the points which I made. I regret exceedingly that he saw fit to pursue a line of argument which seems to be common with him on all occasions. He makes an ad hominem argument. He says I lived in one of the Southern States during the war, and that I participated in and was committed to that war and am responsible in some measure for all its errors, and then he goes on in a long speech declaiming against the war and its desolations and crimes and the causes that gave rise to it, &c. I submit to the Senate and country that that is not the way to answer argument. He seems to know and feel that it puts gentlemen in my position at a disadvantage when he can cite the war on us. If he had been where I was, I suspect his record would have been very different from what it is. I deplored the war; I did all that I could to avert it; and when it came, against my judgment and against my wishes, I went with my State, my people, and kindred. I did all that I could to mitigate its horrors. I aided in maintaining law and order till the people made the grand struggle which resulted so disastrously. Since the war I have done all in my feeble power to restore the Union, to restore good-will and feeling between the people of the North and the people of the South. I desire to see the Union restored, not in name, but in spirit. I have no war to make upon the northern people. I regret that there are any northern gentlemen who are unfriendly to the southern people. I wish that the spirit of antipathy, dislike, and hate could be blotted out forever, and that we could see nothing but a national spirit everywhere as cordial as it was at any period since the beginning of the Government.

I have an interest in the Union. My ancestors helped to establish it by their blood and such treasure as they had. I am attached to the Union. I expect to stand by it, to live in it, and to die in it. I hope to live to see a cordial state of feeling prevail from the lakes on the north to the Gulf on the south, and from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific, when we shall be one people in name and one people in spirit. No good comes of talking and declaiming about the dead past. Why should the Senator want always to array the northern people against the southern people, and why should any unpatriotic southern man want to array the southern people against the northern people? I can see no just or patriotic reason for such a course of action here or elsewhere. I have no gushing professions of admiration or love to make. We know that we have passed through a terrible civil war—one that produced tragic and awful results. I wish they could be forgotten, but now that the war is over——

Mr. HARVEY. Will the Senator from North Carolina permit me to ask him whether in his speech this morning he did not arraign the republican party for preserving the country by force?

Mr. MERRIMON. I did not do any such thing.

Mr. HARVEY. I think the RECORD will show it.

Mr. MERRIMON. There is the RECORD. There it will stand. I say the republican party could have accomplished all it did inside of the Constitution. They might have maintained the Union, they might have sustained and vindicated the Union through the American people, under the Constitution, and by a different line of policy and action, and they might have restored the South to the Union and the Union in a different and more satisfactory way to the whole country.

Mr. HARVEY. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him again?

Mr. MERRIMON. O yes, sir.

Mr. HARVEY. Do we understand the Senator to say that the use of force for the preservation of the Union was unconstitutional? His argument is certainly subject to that interpretation.

Mr. MERRIMON. I will not go into that argument. I think it is rather discourteous for a Senator, when he sees another pursuing a particular line of argument, to undertake to divert him from it by questions which can scarcely be called pertinent. I want to see this Union restored. It belongs to me in part. As I said a moment ago, my ancestors helped to establish it. I am here and I mean to stay here. I have no quarrel with the northern people or with the northern soldiery who maintained the Union. I have no quarrel to make with them. I feel this day that I have an interest in the Army as as much as the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] or the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] It is my Army, and I expect to maintain and defend it wherever it shall be necessary to do so. I expect to maintain and defend the honor of this country, not only here, but on every place on the earth where I shall have occasion to go.

I think it is unpatriotic and wrong to be forever waving the war, with its tragic events, its sorrows and desolations, in the face of southern men who have come here in pursuance of the action of the republican party itself. I think it is ungenerous in any Senator or any one to want to see southern gentlemen come here and fall down and worship a party instead of honoring and defending their country. I do not intend to do that thing. While I am here I intend to stand here having and exercising equal rights with any Senator on this floor, and when I cannot have and exercise them I will go out of the Senate. I say furthermore that if I and gentlemen situated like myself are not to be permitted to speak here freely, if we are not to be allowed to discuss economic questions here, all questions of legislation, the sooner the majority turn us out and let the world know it the better. Let them do it, and see if the American people will indorse it. I do not believe the people of this country expect or desire such a state of things.

I said a moment ago that I had no gushing professions to make with respect to the northern people and the northern soldiery. I respect the whole people. I have high respect for them as a people. I honor them for their courage, I honor them for their energy, I honor them for their perseverance, I honor them for all things that constitute a great and noble people. I have profound respect for them. So have the southern people, and so, I believe, the great mass of northern people have for southern people. I shall not make any such false pretensions as to say that I love and admire any portion of the northern people because they happened to kill some of my people or helped to desolate my country. That would be unnatural and false. If I hear a southern man say that he does, I hear him say what is unnatural and false. I do not believe him. If I hear a northern man make such professions, I hear him say what is unnatural and false, and I do not believe him. But it is perfectly natural and proper for men who have been enemies to have profound respect for each other. So it is between the northern soldiery and the southern soldiery. So it is between the patriotic southern man and the patriotic northern man. Patriotic men at the North and patriotic women at the North have respect for patriotic men and women at the South, and so patriotic men and women at the South have all proper respect for the northern people. They can live together as one people, they can restore the Union; they can restore its cordiality, they can restore its integrity, they can restore its prosperity; and out of the desolations and sorrows of the past they may yet draw a measure of comfort, and together they may increase the power and glory of our common country to a degree that no one has yet ever dreamed of. I trust in God that that day is not very distant.

Therefore I say it is ungenerous and unjust, it so seems to me, and I do not mean to be offensive, on the part of the Senator from Indiana, whenever he engages in a debate with some Senator from the South, to brandish the war at him forthwith as though that proved anything. I admit that there was crime during the war. Who ever expected a civil war without crime, crime on one side and crime on the other side, crime that good men deplored and condemned? I know crimes were committed in the South at which I stood horrified and shuddered. I have no doubt that Senators on the other side know of crimes perpetrated on the side of the North at which they stood horrified and shuddered. Are the good people of this land in the North or in the South to be responsible for that? They deplore it, I deplore it, and every good man deplores it; but let the dead past bury its dead. Let us forget the past as nearly as we can, only profiting by the sorrows and desolations that happened to us. Let us go forward to restore the Union, to make the most we can out of our lost fortunes. Let the patriotic northern men come and help us to revive our impaired and ruined fortunes in the South and help to build us up. I believe that is the true policy. When that policy comes to prevail, as I trust it will before a great while, you will find men of little souls who have managed by one means or another to get into place go out of place and go out of the sight of a patriotic people to be heard of no more.

The honorable Senator was pleased to allude to the manner of my election to the Senate as though that bore the weight of a feather upon the issue between him and me. I submit whether that was proper or a fair or gallant way to debate a question. I do not think so.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator spoke of it before I did.

Mr. MERRIMON. No, sir.

Mr. MORTON. O, yes; the Senator spoke of it before I did in reply to a question of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

Mr. MERRIMON. Somebody mentioned it; I beg the Senator's pardon. I cannot conceive that that changes my status here. We all know that we have a half dozen excellent gentlemen on this floor, I believe most of them on the republican side, who were elected by republican and democratic votes. Are they on that account any less republicans? Does anybody suppose that they compromised their honor or principles by accepting an election by a combination of republican and democratic votes? Some of the most illustrious men who ever graced this Hall were elected by a combination of this kind. I might mention a dozen cases. I believe I may refer to the case of the late Mr. Sumner, who at one time was elected by a combination of democrats and free-soilers. True, indeed, I was elected by a combination of democrats and republicans; but I did not sell my conscience, I did not sell my principles. The republicans had faith in me; they believed that I was the friend of this country, that I was the friend of the Union, and that I would stand by it and see justice done them and justice done the country; and so I will. No republican in my State has ever been dealt with in his rights here as a constituent of mine otherwise than as a democrat since I have occupied a place in this Chamber. I have not known party at all in the discharge of my duty to my constituents here. I am as free as any Senator on this floor. If I were not, I would scorn myself and abandon my place here and hide my head forever. No, sir; I am a freeman; I am a Senator in contemplation of law in every respect, and so I will be until my term shall expire.

I repeat, that that system of argumentation is unfair and unjust. I wonder that the honorable Senator pursues it for one moment; it certainly proves nothing. I expect to debate questions upon their merits. If the points I made this morning are groundless, if the figures I cited are false, show it and push me to the wall; but when you come to debate a question with me do not do it by going off on a side and pointless issue. It you cannot meet it, say you cannot meet it and be done with it. So much upon that matter. I might make allusions that would not be pleasant and would seem unfriendly. I cannot afford to do so. I do not care to go into the personal or even into the political record of Senators on this floor. I shall not do it. I might allude to speeches made by the honorable Senator from Indiana upon subjects and show that since that time he has changed his ground, and all that; but suppose he did, what does that prove? It does not prove anything. Suppose I was elected by the republicans, what does that prove? It proves nothing to this point. Suppose the war was horrible and I was responsible for it, the whole South responsible for it, and the democratic party responsible for it, how does that prove anything about this issue? As stated, it only proves that there is an evil, that there is misrule, that there are corrupt practices, that the people are plundered, that the country is disordered and universally distressed, and that, whoever is responsible for it, it is the duty of every Senator here to endeavor to remove it and to bring to the attention of the public and the Senate such means as will result in their cure.

The Senator has with an air of triumph—I do not know that I complain of that—asked a great many questions that seemed to divert myself and my honorable friend who has just preceded me from the points we were making, supposing that they could not be answered. I submit that is not a proper way to debate this question. Other Senators may think differently. I think we ought to have an opportunity to prepare the facts and to bring them before the Senate in a fair and proper shape and way. I hold myself ready to do that upon all occasions. Since I took my seat I have come across an official report which I propose to submit to the Senate and which contains some interesting facts by way of showing a vast sum of money that has been squandered in the internal-revenue system. I will answer the question that the Senator put to my honorable friend a while ago, and I will answer it as answered by a republican House of Representatives. On the 13th day of December, 1870, on the motion of Mr. Winchester, it was resolved by the House of Representatives—

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish this House a statement of the balances due from collectors of internal revenue who are not now in office, and the total amount of the balances so due as they appear on the books of the accounting officers of his Department on the 30th day of June, 1870; that he further inform this House what amount of said balances have been paid, and in detail, by whom, since the 2d day of May, 1870; the names of the collectors who have been sued on their bonds since their removal from office, with the cause of removal in each case; by what President said collectors were appointed and by what President they were removed.

The late Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. BOUTWELL, made reply, as he was required to do, to that resolution and furnished this document, which I would like to incorporate into my remarks, but I reckon I will have to have it read. Before asking the Clerk to read it I wish to call attention to the aggregate sum of money that the Government was defrauded of. The aggregate balance due to the United States from defaulting officers at that time out of office was $20,700,983.33. I desire to call attention to some of the items contained in this report—just a few of the largest ones. Here is J. Bryant, his first term.

Mr. EDMUNDS. From what State?

Mr. MERRIMON. From Illinois. The net balance against him was $436,474.73.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me right there?

Mr. MERRIMON. I will, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state that Mr. Bryant was not a defaulter to this Government for one cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. He was worth a million.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to call the attention of the Senator, for he claims to be fair, to the authority from which he is reading. He ought to know the fact; but if he does not, if he will examine the books, he will see that it does not show defalcations. The fact is that one collector turned over to his successor the uncollected tax-lists which were charged to the collector, and so they stood on the books. These charges appear in that report. The fact is that they were not defaulters to the Government at all; they were simply charged with uncollected taxes.

Mr. SHERMAN. The document from which the honorable Senator reads shows distinctly that these are not defalcations, not debts due.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator read the name of Mr. Bryant, an honorable gentleman of my State, a man who stands high, the brother of the New York poet. He is a gentleman and a scholar. He was charged just as all these other collectors were when the books were turned over with the uncollected taxes. That report makes it appear as though he had defaulted, when he did not owe the Government a cent; and the statement here shows it. I cannot sit here and hear such a statement made without doing justice to these officers.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator if the report shows that these taxes were afterward collected.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly. What I wanted to do was to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Comptroller's report gives that explanation, and the whole thing shows that the Senator's statement is not a correct statement. I will state further that when Mr. Bryant settled with the Government instead of being a defaulter the Government was indebted to him. So it will appear throughout that report. That thing has been explained a hundred times.

Mr. BOUTWELL rose.

Mr. MERRIMON. I wish Senators would let me have an opportunity to proceed.

Mr. EATON. We can suppose it to be a fact. My friend is reading from an official report.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am going to explain all that in a moment. I want, however, to premise by saying that I would not do any man in the world an injustice. I have no desire to do this man an injustice. What the Senator from Illinois means by injustice that I have done I do not know.

Mr. LOGAN. I propose to make it perfectly clear if the Senator will allow me. The report from which the Senator now reads is a report of charges on the books against collectors, and they are charged in the report the same as if they were defaulters, when in fact these were mainly non-collectable taxes charged to the collector and the defalcation as charged is not true as against these men.

Mr. SHERMAN. And they have been settled.

Mr. LOGAN. And they have been settled and the books show the fact. It was not a defalcation for a single dollar.

Mr. MERRIMON. Now I will give the Senate the benefit of the information I have. This is an official paper. It is a paper prepared under the order of a republican House of Representatives.

Mr. SHERMAN. The paper itself shows that these are balances.

Mr. MERRIMON. I want to state that it is a report made by Secretary BOUTWELL and Comptroller Tayler.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator give the number of the Congress and the date of the session?

Mr. MERRIMON. Executive Document No. 140, Forty-first Congress, third session. At the head of the table are these words:

Statement of balances due from collectors of internal revenue who were out of office on the 30th day of June, 1870.

The communication from Secretary BOUTWELL is dated February 18, 1871, more than six months after the time these parties went out of office, before their accounts were settled or adjusted, so as to make the books of the Internal Revenue Bureau show what they ought to have shown.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will my friend allow me to explain that matter now, and let him follow after my explanation? Of course he does not want to do injustice to anybody.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not want to do injustice.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under the internal-revenue laws whenever assessments are made by an assessor of internal revenue they are charged at once to the collectors, the whole balance, good, bad, and indifferent. For instance, the assessor makes up a list of assessments, and on his assessment-roll there may be half a million of dollars. The whole of that amount, under the internal-revenue law, was charged against the collector and stood against the collector until the money was paid, it made no difference whether they found it to be bad or not. This is an old document. The result was that from 1862 up to 1870 the amount accumulated of unpaid taxes in the Internal Revenue Office was $20,000,000. The exact amount is given in the report which the Senator has in his hand, $21,381,487.83. This is the aggregate of uncollected, unpaid assessments that accrued in the service of the internal revenue in a series of nine years, covering an amount of taxes of nearly $2,000,000,000. These were all charged to the collectors. When a collector went out of office this charge still remained against the new collector. It went over, and there was charged to the new collector the whole of this unsettled, unliquidated balance. The document itself shows that fact.

I will now read a paragraph which the Senator could not have read, or I think he would not have mentioned names here. There are excellent men, men who stand high in the community, men of great wealth and great property in that list. For instance, there is one name here that I heard quoted to-day or yesterday, a man in New York worth $2,000,000, Sheridan Shook. He is said to be a very wealthy man in New York and he, according to this report, was a defaulter in hundreds of thousands. He has not defaulted at all.

Mr. LOGAN. His account is all settled and squared up.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is shown, too, by the papers, as the Senate will see. Mr. Tayler, the Comptroller, in giving these balances, states:

The balances and payments as shown by this statement are those which appear by accounts adjusted; but in many of them, I have no doubt, the balances will wholly, or in part, disappear when further reports and vouchers shall have been transmitted to the auditor and been acted upon. In a large proportion of the cases the balances against collectors consist of tax-lists charged to them, but turned over to their successors in office. Under the existing law the accounting officers cannot credit an outgoing collector with lists so turned over unless the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall certify that such outgoing collector has used due diligence. In the absence of such certificate the accounting officers cannot credit collectors with taxes turned over to their successors, and in almost every case a collector must appear to be in arrears, though nothing be due from him, until the required certificate shall have been supplied.

So that here this paper itself shows that this $20,000,000 of uncollected taxes accrued in a period of nine years, during which the internal revenue collected was over $2,000,000,000.

My friend from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] has eulogized Mr. Pratt because he was a member with us. I will ask now, as a proper explanation of this document in order to show the actual cash deficiency in the colletion of internal revenue, to have a very brief letter from Mr. Pratt read.

Mr. MERRIMON. I did not yield to my friend to reply to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply want to have this letter read, because it will show the exact cash balance. There are delinquencies no doubt. Some of these men are defaulters. This letter shows the exact facts.

Mr. STEVENSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if he does not know that there are many hundreds of thousands, and perhaps millions, on that list which have never been paid?

Mr. SHERMAN. No doubt there are delinquencies.

Mr. EDMUNDS. General Steedman, for one; a prominent instance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think it right to go into names.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not want to go into names, but I suppose every man, whether a democrat or a republican, ought to pay his debts.

Mr. SHERMAN. The reason I ask to have the letter read is because the letter shows the facts of the really ascertained defalcations, no doubt to a large amount.

Mr. DAVIS. One minute. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to a single point.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator to let the letter be read.

Mr. DAVIS. I prefer stating a fact, and that is the statement is of defalcations by collectors who are out of office. It does not give the whole amount. There is nothing about those who were in office at that time. That statement is only of such men as were out of office.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, because there was charged over to the new collector the whole amount. The report to which the Senator from North Carolina referred contains simply uncollected balances due from individual tax-payers, so that every man who failed to pay his liquor license, or failed to pay his tobacco license, or failed to pay his income tax, or any tax whatever, was assessed by the Internal Revenue Office; it was charged over to the collector.

Mr. DAVIS. Provided he was out of office.

Mr. SHERMAN. Provided he was out of office. The great body had gone out of office.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Senator from Ohio if it is not true that these amounts charged to the collector who had gone out of office were also charged over, the same items, to his successor in office; that is, if the same sum is not charged to the man who has gone out and to the man who has come in?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is repeated. I think the law is wrong. I helped to frame that law. I think the law unjust; but we went on the ground that we would make the collector account for every dollar returned by the assessor, and he must either produce the money or by proper certificates show the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that he could not collect the money, and until that certificate was furnished he was charged with the whole amount, although it may have been shown that he never received any portion of the money charged on the books to him. I now ask that the letter be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the letter.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., March 18, 1876.

SIR: In compliance with your request, I have the honor to submit herewith the following statement taken from the books and records of this Office:

The total of internal revenue tax returned by the various collectors of internal revenue during the period from September 1, 1864, to March 31, 1865, being from the organization of the internal system to the close of the month preceeding the end of Mr. Lincoln's administration, is $283,111,131; the ascertained "cash deficiencies" of collectors appointed during that period are $414,568.10, or about 13-100 of 1 per cent. of the amount collected. In the period from April 1, 1865, to February 28, 1869, being the period in even months covered by Mr. Johnson's administration, the collections were $817,068,405; ascertained cash deficiencies of collectors appointed in that period, $1,626,302.52, or about 2-10 of 1 per cent. of the amount collected. In the period from March 1, 1869, to February 28, 1876, being from the beginning of the present administration to the close of the last month, the collections are $854,808,237; ascertained cash deficiencies of collectors appointed in this period, $592,751 86, or about 69-1000 of 1 per cent. of the amount collected.

As the balances for the last period mentioned are of comparatively recent occurrence and are now in process of collection, it is believed that a large proportion of it will ultimately be recovered, so that the actual ultimate loss will be very much less than herein shown.

Respectfully,

D. D. PRATT, Commissioner.

Hon. J. S. MORRILL,
United States Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. All I want to show is the total amount of defalcations and losses of the internal revenue from the beginning of the service to that date is $2,632,000, from the first organization of the internal-revenue service down to date.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What percentage is that on the amount collected?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is very small. The amount is given in the letter.

Mr. DAVIS. It will be noticed that the Commissioner says "ascertained" all the way through. He does not say that is the balance of the taxes. It is the ascertained balance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the way everybody's character stands. It is good until it is ascertained that he has stolen something. It ought to be so here.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not care, Mr. President, after what has been said, to have this document read as a part of my remarks. I will scrutinize it a little more, for I am sure I would not do any human being injustice.

Mr. LOGAN. It did a great deal of injustice when it was published to as good men as there are in this country.

Mr. MERRIMON. It is strange to me, however, that such a document should be published under the sanction of the House of Representatives, and by a republican House, when the republican party was to suffer such detriment by it. I may have occasion to refer to this subject again. I will scrutinize the document.

I wish to make another remark and I do not want to detain the Senate very long. It is perfectly idle for republican Senators on this floor to deny the fact that there have been immense losses in the internal-revenue service of this country; not a million only but millions.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MERRIMON. I trust the Senator will not interrupt me; yet I do not want to be discourteous.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator has occupied the floor nearly all day. Will he not permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MERRIMON. I will.

Mr. WINDOM. The question put by the honorable Senator from Indiana was as to what had been revealed by the investigating committees this winter. The honorable Senator in answer to that digs up an old report here made by a republican Congress, that has no earthly connection with the investigations of this winter. He may not be willing to yield to me again and as I have the floor, before I sit down, I want to appeal to him, for I know his good nature, to state if any frauds have been unearthed wherein the Government has lost any money by these investigating committees, and if so, tell us who it is and how much the Government has lost.

Mr. MERRIMON. In the first place, as I said a moment ago, it is exceedingly unpleasant to go into detail in regard to individuals. I do not like to be forced to make personal remarks about anybody, even persons not in the Senate. It is not a pleasant duty to any well-disposed person. But a complete answer to that question, and I think my friend from Delaware answered it a while ago, is this: The reports for the most part of the committees in the House which have been engaged in investigating the frauds and corruptions that have been practiced on the Government are not yet made and printed. What they will develop when they are made remains to be seen. I have seen snatches of some of them that did develop villainies and rascalities not only disgraceful to the republican party, but disgraceful to the American people. If I were disposed to state them now I cannot remember the names, nor is it material for me to do so. It will astonish the American people when they learn that republican Senators here deny that frauds of the grossest character for amounts that are appalling have been practiced upon the Government. The press of the country, the public men of the country, gentlemen in the republican party, republican Senators themselves, have spoken of it, and have insisted upon reform; but this demon of corruption has such a hold upon this organization that they cannot throw it off, and there will be no reform until there is a change of parties in the administration of the Government. A republican President, however well disposed, cannot break the hold of bad, designing men upon the republican party and republican office-holders. They will not loose their hold.

Mr. WINDOM. I want to ask the Senator whether it is merely a lack of memory which renders him unable to mention a single name of a person who has been proved guilty of defaulting the Government by this winter's investigation, or whether it is due to the courtesy of the honorable Senator toward those he designates as thieves?

Mr. MERRIMON. I want to say to my h norable friend that if I knew the name of one as charged by a committee of the House I would not tell the Senate now; but there have been frauds developed. I know that to be the fact. I have read them in reports made in the House. Besides I have not the reports before me now. I would not state them from memory. I would not do anybody injustice. It does seem to me the Senator has a poor way of getting a question answered by asking a question of a Senator who has the floor which he knows cannot be answered at the moment because of the want of the very reports he ought to have in order to answer properly.

Mr. WINDOM. I want to ask the Senator if he considers it a proper thing to do, when unable to remember or unable to give the name of a single individual who has been guilty, or as to one single dollar that has been lost, to make a charge of universal corruption upon the whole party? Is that quite the thing to do?

Mr. MERRIMON. It is, where I know the general fact to be true. I know the general fact to be true. When you come to specify particular items, I may not be able to state them, but I can state the general fact.

Mr. WINDOM. I am asking the Senator how he knows the general fact to be true when he cannot state a single item constituting that general fact?

Mr. MERRIMON. In my speech this morning I showed, and I challenge any Senator to deny them, taking the figures from the record, that over a billion dollars that ought to have gone to the public Treasury did not go there.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the Senator to stick to his text. He has told us what a wonderfully good thing the democratic House has accomplished this winter, and I am on a little line of inquiry in order to ascertain what it is. He appeals again to some old report of a republican investigating committee with regard to the internal revenue, but wholly evades the question as to what these investigations have done. I ask the honorable Senator if it is not a fact that after, I think, there have been twenty or thirty investigating committees at work, after they have ransacked penitentiaries and lunatic asylums, when the whole power of this Government has been behind them, the whole Treasury of the Government at their command, and with all the enmity, the vengeful feeling, they had against the republican party, with these investigations going on for seven months, my friend is unable to point to a single dollar lost by this Government or a single man who has been convicted of stealing from it?

Mr. MERRIMON. I am not only able to point to a single dollar, but I can point to millions.

Mr. WINDOM. Let us have it.

Mr. MERRIMON. I can point to millions in general terms, but I cannot specify items now because of the absence of the reports. It is amazing that the Senator should make such a statement as he does in view of the facts that stare him and the American people in the face on every hand. Look at the whisky rings at Saint Louis, at Chicago, Indianapolis, and elsewhere.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator allow again for a moment——

Mr. MERRIMON. No, sir; I will not yield to my friend again. I think the debate now is not profitable to either side. It is mere desultory colloquy.

Mr. WINDOM. That has been my impression for some time.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not think it is, because neither of us is dealing in facts. [Laughter on the republican side.]

Mr. WINDOM. I am very happy to hear the Senator say that. I do not make that confession for myself.

Mr. MERRIMON. I see nothing to laugh at. It is well that you can see something to laugh at. I see nothing that is amusing. I say when we come to talk about the various items of fraud and corruption that have been developed by the House of Representatives—I have not the data here; I have not the reports of the committees of the House, nor has the Senator, upon which to predicate his question—and therefore it is improper for me to make an answer. Does that afford any reasonable ground for laughter? If the Senators on that side can take any benefit from that, let them have it. If they can laugh at as small things as that, they will have serious things to cry about before they are done with this subject.

I repeat what I said a moment ago, that it is amazing, and it will be amazing to the American people, to know that Senators on this floor seriously—do they do it seriously?—want the people to understand from them that the republican party as an organization is absolutely honest, that it never wasted any money, and nobody ever under its wing and protection perpetrated frauds upon the Government. Senators are surely laughing and trifling in making such attempt.

Mr. MORTON. I beg the Senator from North Carolina to understand that I have no personal feeling whatever in regard to any member of this body, certainly not in regard to himself; but my friend must remember that he provoked by his speech this morning everything that I said. He began by saying that I had defamed the democratic party. He then indulged in general and wholesale charges of corruption against the republican party. If what my friend has said is true it is the most corrupt party this country has ever seen; corrupt from top to bottom and thoroughly rotten. He went on to read long tables of figures to show the vast increase of expenditures, going back and bringing it along during the war up to the present time to show that the republican party had squandered the public money and was responsible for great waste. It was proper and it was right that I should say in reply to that that those increased expenditures, this heavy taxation and this great debt were the result of the rebellion, and that the men who made the rebellion were responsible for it, and not the men who put down the rebellion; that although the republican party had to make this debt, had to collect these taxes, had to make these expenditures, yet it was not to blame for it, but the men who made the war were to blame for it. If my friend did not want me to speak of these things he ought not to have referred to the subject. When the republican party is overwhelmed with the charge of extravagance and vast expenditures, it is competent for its members in self-defense to tell the cause. So far as the charge of corruption is concerned, of extraordinary corruption, of corruption beyond that of the democratic party, I deny it in toto. I say it comes far short of that which has characterized and distinguished democratic administrations in the past.

My friend says I referred to the war. Is not the war constantly forced upon us? Is not the war the cause of all this objection? Are we not to-day dealing with the results of the war? Certainly we are. We want peace. Nobody wants it more than we do. I am sure the republican party desire it quite as much as the other party do; I am afraid very much more, and why? There are slaughters going on in the South from time to time. Need I mention the Mechanics' Institute in New Orleans, Vicksburgh, Coushatta, Red River, Colfax, Clinton, and Hamburgh within a few days ago, where the blood is scarcely cold? With these things happening from time to time, because we raise our voice in objection to them, and say that we ought to protect those people, and that they ought not to be murdered, we are charged with reviving the issues of the war, with calling back the memories of the war! It does not lie in the mouth of the democratic party to make charges against us on this subject.

We are just on the eve of a great campaign. I speak what is in the mouth of everybody when I say that democratic success in that campaign depends upon carrying Louisiana, Mississippi, Florida, North Corolina, and South Carlina, States which are largely republican, having an aggregate republican majority of nearly 100,000. Their chances of success depend upon overcoming that majority, and how? As it was done in Mississippi last year, as it has been done in Louisiana; and the campaign has recently been opened in South Carolina by the events at Hamburgh within the last ten days. Give us peace, give us a fair election, give us protection to men of all parties, to men of all colors and races, and then we shall have quiet, and no more will be heard; but as long as these terrible events continue we must be expected to raise our voices against them.

Mr. MERRIMON. I wish to say just one word. I deny absolutely that I provoked this debate. The Senator well knows, as the Senate well knows, that yesterday morning he opened this debate with a most violent assault upon the democratic party and upon the House of Representatives. I had not intended to say one word on political subjects until he did it. I thought he did injustice to the House and to the democratic party, and I resolved in the course of the evening to say what I said this morning. I regret that I could not say it in a more orderly way, not having had ample time to prepare myself. Sir, if these figures hurt, it is not my fault. And while Senators have laughed somewhat to-day, there will be occasion to weep before the campaign which has just opened is closed. The facts and records will be brought to the public attention that in my judgment will secure a verdict of condemnation of the republican party at the ballot-box in November next.

I repeat, sir, this debate was not begun or provoked by me. I had not intended to take part in it until I heard what fell from the Senator from Indiana yesterday. I did not mean to be offensive to him at all by saying that he had defamed the democratic party. I used that word in a general sense, and I am sure, if I understand what defamation is, he did defame that party in strong and not very select terms. Of course I did not mean any personal allusion to him or anybody else.

Mr. SHERMAN. When I entered the Senate Chamber this morning I had not the slightest expectation of participating in any political debate; indeed I regretted that a political debate had sprung up on this river and harbor bill; but I must confess, when I listened for a while to the Senator from North Carolina and heard the great republican party, to which I have the honor to belong, arraigned as a pack of thieves, with the most opprobrious language, with arguments far-fetched, exaggerated, out of place, I could not help but feel somewhat the old fire rising in me, I could not help feeling some indignation that he should be willing to classify more than one-half of all the people of the United States as being guilty of offenses and crimes which would disgrace the penitentiary of any State. The Senator probably was not aware how broad and sweeping these charges made by him of corruption were or he certainly would not have indulged in them. Then, when you come to look at his argument, this was one of them, and the principal one: that the tax on whisky was $2 a gallon, and somebody had said, I do not know who, that 100,000,000 gallons of whisky were made in a year.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. Fessenden said so in 1864.

Mr. SHERMAN. I remember the remark made by Mr. Fessenden. He was one of twenty million republicans who made an error. There never have been 100,000,000 gallons of whisky made since the tax was imposed. It was estimated in 1860 that there were 100,000,000 gallons made, by the census returns, at a time when whisky was worth fourteen or fifteen cents a gallon; but then it was consumed in burning fluid and in a thousand ways that it cannot be consumed now; but since the tax has been levied on it it has never reached anything like that proportion. Mr. Fessenden simply said that prior to 1860 it was estimated that the whisky produced in this country was 100,000,000 gallons; and upon this fact, detached, separated, the Senator says that the republican party ought to have collected from the people of the United States $200,000,000 a year.

In the first place, no one was foolish enough in the beginning of our internal-revenue taxation to propose a tax of $2. It was a foolish venture. We put on a smaller tax, commencing with twenty cents, and we collected more revenue then than with the two dollars' tax. We gradually raised it until 1866. It was demanded by public sentiment that we should do what we did in 1866. We then raised the tax to $2 a gallon, and that tax remained three or four years. During all the time from 1861 to 1865 the honorable Senator by his logic charges the republican with losing this Government $200,000,000 a year, less the amount of tax we actually collected; and that is the kind of argument on which he goes to the people to show that the republican party was corrupt!

It so happened that when this two-dollar tax was levied the democratic party had control of the executive authority of the Government; it had the President. It is true we elected Mr. Johnson; we made a mistake in doing it and we never ceased to regret our mistake. Mr. Johnson turned over the whole executive power of the Government to the democratic party, and the Senator has presented a numerous list, which contains hundreds of names of men on this list who were defaulters, but I would not read them lest some of them might not have been, but there are on it the names of men appointed by Mr. Johnson who are now active leaders in the democratic party, because most of those who went over with Johnson went into the democratic party. During that time when there was a two-dollar tax we are charged with wasting and squandering $200,000,000 a year collected from the whisky tax, or which ought to have been collected! Why, sir, under the administration of Andrew Johnson the tax collections on whisky went down to twelve millions in a single year. The republican party, however, was charged with the responsibility of the Government. Were we not anxious to collect this tax? Was it not our interest to collect the tax? Did we not pass laws as severe as the Draconian code? Did we not use every effort to collect this tax? And yet under President Johnson we could not do it. Why? Partly because the political disputes of the time made it difficult to collect internal taxes because of bad appointments or differences between the Senate and the President as to appointments, but it was mainly because the law was wrong. We ought never to have attempted in our broad country to put on a tax of $2 a gallon, and we made the discovery that we had made a mistake and in a short time we repealed that law and then we commenced collecting the whisky tax. After we reduced the tax down to fifty cents, I believe that the whisky tax was as thoroughly and completely collected as any tax could be. The only difficulty in collecting the whisky tax after that time was in the States of North Carolina, Tennessee, and other southern sparsely populated States. In the great cities for several years when the tax ranged between fifty and sixty cents a gallon it was collected with great exactitude, great correctness; but there was a difficulty in collecting it in some of the southern and sparsely populated States; there force had to be used to collect it; the Army had to be employed more or less to a considerable extent, but all was collected that could be collected. So it continued.

Now, to make this loss of the whisky tax the substratum of this great effort it seems to me was not treating the Senate of the United States with that proper respect with which it is necessary to be treated. If this was a popular argument to be used in the compaign in North Carolina, the Senator might have reserved it until he went down there to make a speech to that people, where documents could not be produced at once to correct him; but made here in the Senate Chamber he must have expected that it would excite indignation, reply, remark, and exposure if it was not correctly and well founded. That is all the feeling I had about it; but if there was a little heat—I am sorry I had it—it was but natural when the Senator was arraigning us as a set of scoundrels and rascals corrupting the whole party——

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. SHERMAN. The language was most broad that the republican party was the most corrupt that had ever existed.

Mr. MERRIMON. I said expressly in the commencement of my speech that there were in the republican party, as in every other party, good men.

Mr. SHERMAN. But they must be "few and far between," according to the Senator's general declamation. We are sensible men here, and we know very well that the great mass of all political parties of our countrymen are honest, desire to do their duty to their country, to their families, to their God, to themselves; and therefore this broad declamation against parties ought not to be indulged in. We have a right, however, to arraign the official conduct of parties, but in doing so should give particulars; and therefore when the Senator was thus declaiming I asked him, if the republican party was so bad, what had the democratic party done for the last forty years that would induce him to go for it or that would command his respect. My friend from Indiana spread that question a little further, and wanted to know what good measure the democratic party had ever adopted. It is a remarkable fact, Mr. President, and I may as well put in here as this is a political discussion, that there is not a single position taken by the democratic party for the last thirty years on which they now dare to make a stand and defend it. You may look over the whole political arena and you will find it to be so. I say when you contrast the position of these two great parties, what they have done, what they have proposed, where they stand, the contrast may be drawn by any intelligent man. I say the democratic party has been compelled to abandon and recede from every position it has taken, and it will not now in this canvass in which it seeks again to come into power stand upon any position it has taken for the last thirty years.

But, sir, its cry is reform. Well, every honest man is in favor of reform. There never will be a period in the history of mankind that reform will not be an imperative demand. Crimes, offenses are continually occurring; there will be efforts against the interests of the mass of mankind. There has been a continual struggle since Adam was born in this world of ours between good and evil; but we have come to believe that in this Republic of ours good has been in the ascendant and evil has been sent to the penitentiary. Such has been our common thought and among men of all political parties.

But, sir, we are now told that the democratic House, where they have a casual democratic majority, have unearthed corruptions, exposed frauds, shown that the people have been robbed; and we naturally inquire where, when, by whom? And now, gentlemen, it will not do for you to talk about corruption and fraud and dishonesty and wrong in a general hap-hazard way as something that will be disclosed, some bugaboo that will be developed after a while. Where is it? Who has stolen the public money? Name your man. It will not do for my honorable friend from Delaware to say O, well, somebody has plundered the Government to the extent of $300,000 in some contracts, but I do not want to name him? That is not the way. The names have got to be given, the place, the time, the circumstances.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I refer the Senator to the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs where he will find it all given.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was an unfortunate remark for the Senator to make. During the last democratic administration that governed the country the House of Representatives, by a resolution passed by the votes of men of both political parties, denounced the administration of the Navy Department then in terms stronger than can be used now and for the same class of contracts that have been investigated into recently. But I do not wish to go into that; "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." I do not believe that when the report is made and it comes to be discussed, any wrong or fraud will rest upon the head of that Department, and if there is, the republicans will be as swift to punish him as the Senator can be; but until then he is bound as an honest and honorable man to consider him innocent.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have not said a word against the head of the Navy Department; I have not referred to him.

Mr. SHERMAN. We ought not to deal in insinuations. I naturally leaped to the conclusion that there was some wrong or fraud to be disclosed by some committee of the House in regard to the Navy Department, and necessarily its head. Now, sir, ought we to deal in such imputations? Are men's characters to be made a football of? If the House makes any allegation against any member of this Government, we are bound to try him, as judges, sworn under our oath in the particular case, and we have no right to prejudge. The only particular cases that my friend from Delaware gave us—he was unfortunate there—were those of a defaulting paymaster of the Army of the United States and a man convicted of whisky frauds. Paymasters are generally men selected in honor. The Senator gave his name as Major Hodge. Well, Major Hodge was a defaulter; but he was tried, convicted, and sent to the penitentiary for his defalcation. I understood he was a democrat always. I knew his father before him. He was in the regular Army. Would you hold the republican party responsible for his defalcation because he gambled away the public money, lost it, and squandered it? I hear a Senator say we ought to have known it. Are we omniscient? Is the democratic party omniscient? O, no. The very moment his offense was detected he was punished and sent to the penitentiary. I know it is claimed that he was pardoned. I hear it said, "Grant pardoned him." So he did, on the demand of numberless democrats high in official position. If he did wrong, he did the wrong of being merciful to a man who had violated his public duty.

Mr. LOGAN. He pardoned the Ku-Klux, too, on the same kind of recommendations.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not on such premises as that that a great party like the republican party is to be tried and convicted. And you say there were McDonald and McKee—my honorable friend saw them within the bars of the State prison. Who put them there? What democrat shared in that work? Not a democrat. They were put there by republicans; and when did a democratic administration put a democrat behind the bars of the penitentiary for official misconduct? Tell me the case, when, where, and under what administration. But unfortunately they say Dyer, Pratt, and others have been removed; and we are brought in and arraigned, not for offenses charged against the republican party, but because in our administration the Secretary of the Treasury resigns, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue resigns, or disputes, coldness, or disagreement arise in the administration of the Government, and we are at once charged, because these men retire from office, with seeking to shield the guilty instead of protecting innocence. Ah, gentlemen, you must do something better than that if you wish to make an arraignment against the republican party.

But some one said, I think my friend from North Carolina, or perhaps my friend from Delaware, that we had squandered $3,000,000 in the Southern States from the judiciary fund. Why, sir, what became of that $3,000,000? It was the money expended in putting down the Ku-Klux organization, the most infamous organization in modern history since the time of some of those in India, which disgraced the civilization of the old countries. Three million dollars were spent for that purpose, and no doubt some money was wasted, some was defrauded; but that occurs in the administration of every large fund of this kind; there is petty peculation which plunders and robs from the public as well as from private individuals. Public crime as well as private crime exists in every community, in every State, in every land, in the quiet hamlet, in the Connecticut village as well as in the border regions far remote. There will be vice and crime everywhere; it accompanies all agencies that are human, and we cannot avoid it entirely. All we can say in reply is that when these peculations occur we expose them and we punish them; and when we contrast our conduct and our administration with that of others gone before us, ours is far more favorable than theirs.

Here is the official statement of the actual losses that occurred during our war. They are all honorable to us. Scarcely any money was lost in our war by defalcation and peculation; I say scarcely any in proportion to the percentage of other losses. Take the case of the internal revenue, the very service that was sought to be saddled with $20,000,000 of unaccounted balances. Take that case, and we have the fact that only $2,376,000 have been lost of all the taxes that have been levied in the form of internal taxation since the organization of the system to the last year, or $\frac{1}{10}$th of 1 per cent.

There is another remarkable fact shown in our military history. I have not the statement before me, but I saw the statement made that the losses—including Major Hodge's defalcation, which is one of the largest—that occurred by paymasters and other disbursing officers in our war, compared with the Prussian service, the English service, or any service of which we had a record, was only about one-tenth of the amount. The actual fidelity in the disbursements of public men after the war and during the war is almost unprecedented in the history of mankind.

You, gentlemen, have now had the full power of this Government; you have an organized House whose sole purpose has been to delve in and try to find if we have been guilty of rascality or wrong. They have ample means, ample ability, and what has been the outcome? You tell us that something will be disclosed when the reports are printed. Can it be possible that these men are withholding their reports in order to prevent us from answering them, or to prevent the men whom they accuse from answering them in the proper way? I trust not. I do not believe it, and will not believe it. They have here and there fallen upon delinquents. Men of both political parties have been struck at by these committees. They may not have been groping in the right direction, but wherever they groped they found a democrat; and they found no doubt some bad republicans. But if this is to be a campaign of scandal, if this is to be a campaign of abuse, then I warn gentlemen that the people of this country are a kind-hearted people. I never saw an intelligent crowd in Ohio but what turned with loathing and disgust from a man who addressed them in the language of calumny and reproach. Go to that people, talk to them plain common sense; be the orator ever so dull, be he ever so witty, they will bear it all; they will take a joke in kind, good humor; but commence your strain of calumny and reproach by trying to prove that Grant is a rascal and that all these republicans who have carried the American banner in triumph, in peace and in war, are scoundrels, and they will turn their backs upon you unless you bring facts, figures, names, and dates, and prove your charges. Sir, your campaign of scandal and slander will be at an end in thirty days after it has commenced. Your cry of reform will require something else than mere empty air. The people will ask what security do you, the democratic party, give us for reform. Why is Governor Tilden any more likely to reform this Government than Governor Hayes? What is there in the character of these two men that gives one, Tilden, the pre-eminence over Hayes as a reformer? What is there in the conduct of your party that gives you the right to claim to be reformers? You have been driven from all your positions; you do not stand where you stood at any time within the last thirty years. Sir, the people will know who are these prophets of reform before they trust them. You must show something else than the history of the last few years in the Southern States; you must show something else in the nature of reform before they will trust the old associates of Tweed in New York; you must show that the democratic party has in it elements of reform which will give some security for their promises; otherwise the people will not heed your talk about reform.

Sir, I again express my regret to the Senate that I have been led to participate in this debate. I think myself we ought to leave this question to the people of the United States and let them discuss it in their assemblages all over this broad land of ours; and my hope is that, although they may see here and there something to find fault with in the course of the republican party or the republican leaders, they will think on the whole it is better for the North and South to trust that strong, powerful political organization that has guided our country through the perils of war, that has secured reconstruction, and on the whole has given to the country a wise administration of affairs.

I appeal to my friends from the Southern States, because I think I can say that at least I am not their enemy, that the time has not arrived when the democratic porty can again come into power in this country. Its history during recent events has not been such as to excite the hopes and emotions that ought to follow the success of a great political party. It is better for the South that a good man who will be fair and honest and straightforward, true to his word, manly in every undertaking, bold in execution of every promise, should preside over this Government for four years longer before you revive again in a popular contest the old struggle between the democratic and republican parties. At all events I pray my democratic friends not to commence it here by gross exaggeration, by wholesale calumny, by charges that will never be proven, and by pretenses that have not been justified by the past history of the democratic party.

Mr. BOGY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator withdraw that and allow the Chair to announce the conference committee on the consular and diplomatic bill?

Mr. BOGY. Certainly.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore announced as the third committee of conference on the part of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. EDMUNDS, and Mr. WITHERS.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION INVESTIGATION.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to make a formal correction. The resolution to print the report of the Mississippi conmmittee was passed as a Senate resolution. It should have been a concurrent resolution. I ask unanimous consent that it be so journalized and corrected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the correction will be made.

FORFEITURE OF RAILROAD LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1771) to declare forfeited to the United States certain lands granted to the State of Kansas in aid of the construction of railroads by act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate do recede from their third amendment to said bill.

JOHN J. INGALLS,
P. W. HITCHCOCK,
WM. W. EATON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN R. GOODIN,
JAMES W. McDILL,
BENONI S. FULLER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the nature of the amendment?

Mr. INGALLS. This is a bill providing for the recession to the United States of certain lands heretofore granted to the State of Kansas in aid of certain railroads. The House bill provided that those lands should be disposed of under the homestead law; the Senate amendment was that they should be disposed of under the public-land laws of the United States. The committee of conference have agreed, by receding from the amendments of the Senate, that the land shall be disposed of under the homestead law.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas if that report deals with the whole bill, with all the amendments?

Mr. INGALLS. The other amendments were adopted by the House of Representatives. The conference was only on one amendment.

The report was concurred in.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. BOGY. I renew my motion.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Missouri to yield to me for one moment.

Mr. BOGY. Very well, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. I think we ought to go back to the consideration of the river and harbor bill if we intend to pass it at this session; and I should like to have the Senator give way to me long enough for me to make a motion to lay the whole subject on the table, to at least test the sense of the Senate as to whether they want a river and harbor bill at this session. Here it is certainly within a few days of the close of the session, and we have been five days considering this bill and have made practically no progress in its consideration.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. I trust we shall finish this bill to-night. At least let us dispose of one or two of the questions now involved in it.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I propose to submit some remarks to the Senate on this question.

Mr. BOGY, (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) I renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barnum, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Bruce, Cockrell, Cooper, Cragin, Eaton, Gordon, Hitchcock, Kelly, McDonald, Merrimon, Norwood, Oglesby, Randolph Robertson, Saulsbury, Stevenson, and Wallace—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Christiancy, Conkling, Conover, Davis, Edmunds, Ferry, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Kernan, Key, Logan, McMillan, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill, Paddock, Patterson, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Wadleigh, West, Windom, Withers, and Wright—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Dawes, Dennis, Dorsey, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, McCreery, Morton, Ransom, Sharon, Thurman, and Whyte—19.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ALLISON. Before that motion is put I ask leave to introduce a substitute for the river and harbor bill, and ask that it may be printed.

Mr. CONKLING. Then you agree to this motion.

Mr. ALLISON. I only put in a caveat in case the motion prevails.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa submits a substitute to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that it be read. ["No!" "No!"] I see it is a long bill; I will not ask for the reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed substitute will be printed if there be no objection. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] desires to make some remarks. I only wish now to appeal to the Senate after he has finished what he may desire to say on political topics that we shall come back to the business of the Senate and finish this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at five o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 18, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

HON. E. Y. PARSONS.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask unanimous consent to submit and have passed at this time a resolution to which I suppose no gentleman will object in view of the late period of the session at which it becomes necessary to offer it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be instructed to pay to the widow of Hon. E. Y. Parsons, of Kentucky, late a member of this House, the amount that he would have received for the remainder of the term for which he was elected.

There was no objection, and the resolution was adopted unanimously.

THOMAS B. VALENTINE.

Mr. WALLING. I ask unanimous consent to submit for adoption at this time the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the clerk of the Committee on the Public Lands be authorized to attach to any deposition he may be required to give in the case of Hovey vs. Valentine, now pending in the district court at San Francisco, California, a copy of the minutes of the proceedings of the Committee on the Public Lands on House bill No. 1024, [Forty-second Congress,] for the relief of Thomas B. Valentine.

Mr. RANDALL. Is that from a committee?

Mr. WALLING. It is from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GARFIELD. It occurs to me that it is an unusual request that a clerk should certify to the proceedings of a committee. I do not know that I caught precisely what the request was.

Mr. WALLING. While the clerk of the Committee on Public Lands was in California last year, he was subpœnaed as a witness in the case of Hovey vs. Valentine, and they sought to interrogate him about what took place in the Committee on Public Lands of this House. The case is for the claim of an attorney for services rendered his client, a part of those services being before the Committee on Public Lands. The clerk declined to testify, believing that he had no right to communicate in that way what transpired in a committee. This resolution is for the purpose of enabling him to attach to his deposition a copy of that portion of the record of the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. Is it to be the hearsay statement of the clerk, or a statement in regard to the action of the committee?

Mr. WALLING. It is the record of the action of the committee upon that bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. If it is for legal purposes, I have no objection.

Mr. LUTTRELL. What can be the object? I want to know the object.

Mr. WALLING. It is to relieve the clerk of the committee from the embarrassing position in which he is placed by the court.

There being no objection, the resolution was received and adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GAUSE. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Public Lands and have put on its passage at this time the joint resolution (H. R. No. 135) to modify the order appointing a receiver of Hot Springs, Arkansas.

Mr. MORRISON. I object.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask leave to report a bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

Mr. WALLING. As I am compelled to leave to-morrow, I ask leave to introduce a bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is called for; and the morning hour begins at twenty minutes after twelve o'clock. The business in order is the call of committees for reports.

TERRITORY OF OKLAHOMA.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee, from the Committee on the Territories, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 943 a bill (H. R. No. 3922) to provide for the organization of the Territory of Oklahoma and for the better protection of the Indian tribes therein; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I move that this bill be made a special order for the second Wednesday in December next at two o'clock.

Mr. KASSON. I reserve all points of order upon the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

BOUNDARIES OF OREGON.

Mr. WIGGINTON, from the Committee on the Territories, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 630) conforming the boundaries of the State of Oregon to those fixed and defined in the constitution of that State as presented to Congress when applying for admission to the Union; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LAW LIBRARY FOR DAKOTA.

Mr. G. A. BAGLEY, from the Committee on the Territories, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1548) to appropriate money for the purchase of a law library for the Territory of Dakota.

The bill was read. It appropriates $2,500, to be expended by and under the direction of the governor of the Territory in the purchase of a law library, to be kept at the seat of the government thereof, for the use of the governor, supreme and district courts, members of the Legislature, and such other persons as shall be provided by law, and the sum of $200, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is appropriated for the purpose of paying the freight thereon.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me this bill ought to go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It must go there, as objection is made. It will be so referred.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a resolution (in which the concurrence of the House was requested) authorizing the special committees appointed by the Senate and House of Representatives to investigate the immigration of Chinese into this country, to act as a joint special committee.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the joint resolution (H. R. No. 153) to correct an error in the enrollment of the post-office appropriation act.

The message also returned to the House of Representatives for its concurrence the bill (S. No. 892) to encourage and promote telegraphic communication between America and Asia.

ELECTION OF TERRITORIAL OFFICERS.

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee on the Territories, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 3257) to provide for the election of a territorial governor, secretary, treasurer, auditor, and superintendent of schools in the several Territories of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following officers for each of the several Territories (who shall hold their respective offices for two years and until their successors are elected and qualified) shall hereafter be elected by the qualified voters of each of said Territories: a governor, secretary, territorial treasurer, territorial auditor, and superintendent of schools. The term of office of each of the above-named officers shall commence upon the first Monday in January after their election; and the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November in the year 1876 is established as the day of holding the first election under this act; and the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November in every second year thereafter is established as the day for holding all subsequent elections. All votes for said officers must be by written or printed ballots, and shall be cast and counted and the result declared under such registration as may be provided by law; but the first election herein provided for shall be held under the laws as they may exist in the several Territories governing the election of Delegates to Congress at the date of said election. But this section shall not apply to Territories hereafter to be formed until Congress by special act shall so decide.

SEC. 2. That the qualifications and duties of such territorial treasurers, auditors, and superintendents of schools shall be declared by the legislative assemblies of the several Territories; but nothing herein contained shall in any manner change or impair the duties, rights, powers, and obligations of the governors and secretaries of the several Territories as they are now, or may hereafter be, provided for by act of Congress, except so far as the manner of their selection and their term of office are hereby changed.

SEC. 3. That the President may at any time, for good cause, remove either the governor or secretary of any Territory, and, with the consent of the Senate, appoint a successor to hold his office during the unexpired term of the person removed; and the cause of any such removal shall be communicated by the President to the Senate at the next succeeding session thereof; and the President, by the consent of the Senate, may fill all vacancies in the office of governor or secretary occasioned by death or resignation, and in such event the appointee shall hold his office during the unexpired term of the officer who has died or resigned.

Mr. KASSON. This bill should go to the Committee of the Whole, as it creates a new office.

Mr. PATTERSON. It creates no new office.

Mr. KASSON. Is not the superintendent of schools a new office?

Mr. PATTERSON. No, sir; that office is already provided for by the statutes.

Mr. STEELE. And paid for by the Territories.

Mr. KASSON. I understood from the reading of the bill that it created some new obligations which would involve the payment of money.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. From the reading of the bill the Chair would be inclined to the same opinion as the gentleman from Iowa; but he will hear the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, upon a cursory examination of this bill, it might be supposed to make a very great innovation upon the present method of selecting and appointing officers of the several Territories belonging to the Government, yet when the bill is scanned closely it will be found that the innovation is not so great as might be supposed, but that the measure is rather an attempt upon the part of Congress to regulate some very evident abuses which have grown up in the management of the Territories by the General Government.

The law as it now stands provides five territorial officers: a governor, a secretary of the Territory, a treasurer, an auditor, and a superintendent of schools. The first two officers are appointed by the President with the consent of the Senate, and their salaries are paid out of the national Treasury, while the last three officers, the treasurer, the auditor, and the superintendent of schools, are appointed by the governors of the Territories with the consent of the territorial council, and their salaries are paid out of the territorial treasury, not by the General Government.

While the law as it stands purports to have these three last officers selected from the people of the Territory, yet they are all substantially the officers appointed by the President of the United States, because the governor being appointed by the President, selects the treasurer, the auditor, and superintendent of schools, and in no way is the appointment of these officers given to the people except as the territorial council may see fit to indorse or repudiate his selection. In this year of reform inaugurated by both political parties, and in this centennial year, when the people are all returning to the fountain of their liberties for the purpose of drinking anew the waters of freedom, the Committee on the Territories thought it would be a fitting reform to inaugurate, to permit the people of the several Territories to elect these officers for themselves. The only change that is introduced is in permitting the people to elect. By the provisions of the proposed law, where they are elected by the people, they are under the control and management of the Chief Executive of the United States, because, sir, the power is expressly given to the President, the power which he now has, of removing the governor or secretary for good cause, provided only that he shall communicate the cause to the Senate of the United States at the next session of Congress.

The benefits which would accrue from this change are very evident; benefits of the civil service at large, and certainly great and inestimable benefits to the people of the several Territories. It is a fact well known and beyond dispute that, as a rule, the men who are selected to fill the offices of governors and secretaries of the several Territories——

Mr. DUNNELL. The gentleman seems to be advocating the passage of the bill, and not answering the objection.

Mr. PATTERSON. What was the objection?

Mr. DUNNELL. That it was subject to the point of order.

Mr. PATTERSON. I did not understand I was called upon to answer that objection. If the gentleman from Iowa is still of the opinion it is open to the point of order, I will answer the objection he makes.

Mr. KASSON. I will say to the gentleman and to the Chair that I hold it is subject to the point of order. We have always held, so far as I know, and Speakers of the House have always heretofore held, where a new office is created for which no appropriation is made and no compensation is affixed, yet the creation of the office by Federal law implies a right to Federal compensation, and therefore it is subject to the point of order that it should have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PATTERSON. Before I answer the gentleman from Iowa, I wish to ask him this question: What new office is created by this bill?

Mr. KASSON. There are three officers which are not now paid by the United States, at least in the bill: auditor, treasurer, and superintendent of schools.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will state to the gentleman from Iowa that they are already provided by law. The only change made by the bill is that, instead of having these officers appointed by the governor of the Territory, with the consent of the territorial council, they shall now be elected directly by the people. It in no manner changes the mode of compensation.

Mr. KASSON. I may be mistaken on this point, but I was not aware the United States ever created the office of superintendent of schools for the Territories.

Mr. PATTERSON. The law of Congress provides that the governor of a Territory shall, as one of his powers, appoint the three officers named in this bill, and that his appointment shall be ratified by the territorial council.

Mr. KASSON. Are they now paid by the United States or the Territory?

Mr. PATTERSON. They are paid by the Territory out of the territorial treasury.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does this bill contemplate any change in that regard?

Mr. PATTERSON. Not in the slightest; simply that they shall be elected by the people.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It creates no new office?

Mr. PATTERSON. It does not.

Mr. HALE. Does it not in some degree change the source from which the money comes from which they are to be paid?

Mr. PATTERSON. Not in the slightest degree.

Mr. HALE. Not in reference to any single officer?

Mr. PATTERSON. Not in reference to any single officer; not the slightest change; not the dotting of an i or the crossing of a t, so far as the present mode or source from which the payment comes.

Mr. HALE. From what fund are the expenses of the election to be paid?

Mr. PATTERSON. From the territorial fund, every dollar of it.

Mr. HALE. By territorial tax?

Mr. PATTERSON. Every dollar of it. The expenses of elections for members of the Legislature and county officers—indeed of every election held in the territory—are paid out of the territorial fund raised by taxation on property within the Territories.

Mr. HALE This, then, only applies to election by the people?

Mr. PATTERSON. That is the only change proposed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Upon the statement of the gentleman from Colorado, [Mr. PATTERSON,] the Chair considers that the bill is clearly not subject to the point of order. The gentleman from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. GARFIELD. May I be allowed to call the attention of the Speaker for a moment to the rule?

All proceedings touching appropriations of money and all bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriations to be made, or authorizing payments out of appropriations already made, shall be first discussed in a Committee of the whole House.

It seems to me that this rule fairly covers appropriations to be made out of the territorial treasury or our own; because we have complete legislative control over the Territory in this, that if we disapprove of their laws they are void. Now it occurs to me that the recent rule, Rule 112, covers just such cases as this, because it is legislation that will result in an appropriation which can be an appropriation only by our consent. I do not know if the Speaker has looked at this particular rule, which is the new rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Rule 112?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has that rule before him.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will say that the subtilty of the argument of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] surpasses my understanding. I have to repeat again that the existing laws for the payment of salaries to officers of Territories are not changed in the slightest degree. The bill neither adds to nor takes from them. The matter of payment, of appropriation, and of salaries, are all precisely as they are under existing laws.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman from Colorado to say that the laws relating to those matters are not affected at all by this bill, and that the change has reference only to the mode of election of these officers?

Mr. PATTERSON. That is all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the statement of the gentleman from Colorado the bill, in the judgment of the Chair, is not liable to the point of order.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Colorado be good enough to inform me if there is any statute of the United States authorizing the territorial Legislatures to create these offices by name?

Mr. PATTERSON. No, sir.

Mr. KASSON. So I understand.

Mr. PATTERSON. The law provides for these three latter officers as officers necessary for the purpose of carrying on the territorial government.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman allow me to inquire if the law to which he refers as authorizing these officers is not section 1857 of the Revised Statutes, which says that—

All township, district, and county officers, except justices of the peace and general officers of the militia, shall be appointed or elected in such manner as may be provided by the governor and Legislative Assembly of each Territory; and all other officers not herein otherwise provided for, the governor shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the legislative council of each Territory, shall appoint.

Are not these three officers therefore designated by the authority of the territorial Legislature under this general law?

Mr. PATTERSON. No, sir; they come under the latter clause:

And all other officers not herein otherwise provided for, the governor shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the legislative council of each Territory, shall appoint.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will come to order. It is impossible in the confusion for the Chair to hear the remarks of gentlemen.

Mr. KASSON. The point I wanted to get before the Speaker and the gentleman from Colorado is this: The gentleman was not quite accurate when he said that these officers were provided for by existing United States law. The language is, and I will read it again in the hearing of the Speaker:

And all other officers not herein otherwise provided for, the governor shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the legislative council of each Territory, shall appoint.

Now, instead of their being local territorial officers appointed by territorial authority, which gives them no claim upon the United States Treasury, this bill makes them officers distinctly by name under Federal law, and as such creates them officers distinctly by Federal authority; as I regard it, giving them a claim upon the Treasury of the United States, as all officers newly created by the Federal Government would have unless there is a clause in the bill to the contrary, stating that they are to be paid for out of the territorial revenue.

Mr. PATTERSON. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] does not appreciate the scope of the expression "not herein otherwise provided for." That refers to other officers than those spoken of for township, district, and county purposes, who are elected under laws of the territorial Legislature.

Mr. KASSON. That I agree to.

Mr. PATTERSON. But the officers "herein otherwise provided for" are the officers that are, I think, provided in other sections of the statutes of the United States bringing these officers into existence.

Mr. KASSON. I would like the gentleman to point to the section of the Revised Statutes that creates these three officers. I cannot find it. I may have overlooked it.

Mr. PATTERSON. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. STEELE] has the United States Statutes before him, and will satisfy the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I want to call the attention of gentlemen, and especially the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] to the fact that where the Territory makes a law, and the United States concurs in it, that is the law. Now these officers are made by territorial law. The United States have confirmed that law, and they are officers by law.

Mr. KASSON. Allow me to say that the United States does not concur in territorial legislation except by implication. The territorial laws remain in force until repudiated by legislation of Congress. And that does not make them United States officers, and this bill I think does.

Mr. PATTERSON. Section 2 of the bill as reported recognizes the present standing of the three officers referred to.

Mr. HALE. What does the gentleman propose to read from?

Mr. PATTERSON. I read section 2 of the bill:

SEC. 2. That the qualifications and duties of such territorial treasurers, auditors, and superintendents of schools shall be declared by the legislative assemblies of the several Territories; but nothing herein contained shall in any manner change or impair the duties, rights, powers, and obligations of the governors and secretaries of the several Territories as they are now, or may hereafter be, provided for by act of Congress, except so far as the manner of their selection and their term of office are hereby changed.

That makes a clear distinction all the way between the three latter-named officers and the two former.

Mr. HALE. Has the gentleman any objection to this amendment being inserted, which would save the point made by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] "nor shall anything herein be so construed as to render these three officers officers of the United States, with a claim upon the Treasury for the payment of salaries?"

Mr. PATTERSON. We have not the slightest objection to that amendment, and I know that I speak the sentiment of the Committee on the Territories, if that will satisfy the minds of objecting members. If that is their understanding of the bill we have no objection to having it amended in the way proposed by the gentleman from Maine; it is as broad as it is desired.

Mr. KASSON. I want to say that I make the point of order that this bill should be considered not in the morning hour, but in Committee of the Whole. It makes a change in the practice of the Government for one hundred years, and I think we ought to insist upon the right to consider it by sections. I therefore make the point distinctly that there are three officers named in this bill that are not named in the laws of the United States, and that being the case they would have claims on the United States Treasury for their future compensation.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I would say that these officers are now officers of the Territories under and by virtue of the laws of the territorial government or under and by virtue of the laws of the United States now in existence. The present bill in no possible manner creates new officers or a new mode for the payment of these officers, but simply provides, as has been well said by the gentleman from Colorado, that those officers shall be selected in a different manner. The bill does not provide for new officers or new salaries, but simply prescribes the mode and manner of their selection; they are to be elected by a vote of the people instead of by the appointing power of the Government, and therefore I submit that the point of order does not lie.

Mr. KASSON. I think the gentleman from Ohio and myself can come to an understanding. We both agree that in some of the Territories at least we have these three officers, but the incumbents are not appointed by authority of the United States law. They are simply territorial appointments at the option of the territorial authorities. Now the proposition is to create these three offices under United States law in all the Territories of the United States; that is the distinction on which I insist.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I think the gentleman from Iowa puts the case too strongly.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, allow me to say just one word in reference to the point of order and in reference to the question raised by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] as to the creation of new offices. The organic acts of all the Territories of the United States provide that the district, township, and county officers may be selected in a particular mode, namely, by an election by the people. All other officers and those new officers created by legislative enactments in the various Territories are to be appointed by the governor of the Territory by and with the advice and consent of the legislative council of the Territory.

Now, then, the only difference there is in the present method of selecting these officers and the proposed method is this, that Congress having authorized the several Territories to create such offices as may be necessary for their government, every one of the Territories has created these offices, defined their duties, and prescribed their compensation; they are paid for to-day by the money of the people of the Territories raised from them by taxation, and yet the people who create these offices and pay the officers their compensation have no vote in their selection under the present system. Now the only change proposed is in the method of the selection of these officers, instead of being appointed by the governor that they shall be elected by the people. No change is proposed in reference to the qualifications, duties, and compensation of these officers. They are to remain as they are to-day, and they are to be paid by the people of the Territories and not by the Government of the United States.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] says that this bill, if passed, will be going back on the precedents for one hundred years in reference to the selection of officers for the Territories. I think it is time for Congress to go back on the precedents of one hundred years in depriving the people of the Territories of the rights of citizenship and allow the people to choose the officers whom they pay for themselves, and I would suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that it is a good season for the commencement of reform in reference to the Territories, and to establish a principle which would give them the right to home rule and local self-government.

There is nothing in this bill which looks to the compensation of these officers by the United States. The bill expressly provides that their duties and qualifications shall be prescribed by the Legislature of the Territory, as they are at the present time.

Now the only objection to the reference of this bill to the Committee of the Whole is not a fear of the fullest discussion in reference to it, but the gentleman from Iowa knows well that if it goes to the Committee of the Whole it will sleep that sleep that knows no waking.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the merits of the bill cannot be discussed on the point of order.

Mr. JACOBS. I desire to say a word on the point of order. The organic act of Washington Territory passed in 1853 was an exception to the other organic acts, and one of the provisions of the organic act of that Territory was that the auditor, school superintendent, and treasurer were to be elected by a joint convention of the Legislature.

The Legislature was to meet together in joint convention and elect them. At the last session of Congress this was changed. That Congress changed the mode of the election of these three officers in that Territory. Now, if the last Congress had the power to make this change in the election of those territorial officers in that Territory, I cannot see why this Congress has not the power to pass this bill.

Mr. HURLBUT. I do not understand it to be a question of power, but a question of order that is before the House, and I desire for a moment to address myself to the question of order.

As I understand this proposition there is no law of the United States which in terms creates these three offices. There is a law which allows the Territories to create these or other offices at their discretion, and there is an implied approval of the action of the Territories in that regard by Congress in not interfering with their action. Under the existing law it is discretionary with the Territories to have these three officers or not. The bill now pending proposes to make it obligatory and compulsory upon each Territory to appoint these officers, and there is in my judgment a doubt as to whether the point of order attaches to this bill. It is creating by act of Congress imperatively and decisively in all the Territories, without discretion, three officers whom they might not themselves desire to create.

Mr. PATTERSON. Allow me to say one word in reply to the points which have been made, and I think that any difficulty about this matter will be easily set aside. Let us grant that what the gentleman from Illinois says is true, it is simply a general power that is given to the Territories to bring into existence the three offices named in this bill, and that Congress tacitly recognizes the bringing of them into existence and that this bill specifically creates them. Let us admit that each of these propositions is true, and yet it cannot possibly be objectionable under Rule 112. And why? Because Rule 112 must necessarily refer to appropriations of money out of the general Treasury and cannot refer to appropriations made by any other political organization, either State or territorial. Such a construction has never been placed upon this rule.

Now, the gentleman from Maine, if the Chair had any doubt in his mind upon that proposition, has offered an amendment which specifically meets the supposition that this bill might possibly give color to a claim that the money to be paid to these officers is to be drawn from the Treasury of the United States.

The gentleman from Maine has proposed an amendment, which is accepted by myself in behalf of the committee, which entirely and positively prevents such a supposition from being entertained.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Colorado will observe that the mere fact that that amendment is necessary in order to bring the bill within the rule is in itself a sufficient reason why the point of order should be sustained by the Chair. And it could only be by the unanimous consent of the House that that amendment obviating the objection to the bill could be accepted. The Chair is inclined to think that the bill in its present form does practically create three offices not specifically provided for by the statutes of the United States. The Statutes at Large provide in general terms for the appointment of officers within the Territories, but this is a specific declaration of law on the part of the United States that these three officers shall be provided, and it designates their term of office, and they are mentioned in immediate connection with other territorial offices the expenses of which are provided for by the General Government. The Chair therefore holds that the bill of the gentleman is liable to the point of order raised by the gentleman from Iowa.

The bill might possibly be so amended as to avoid the point of order, but upon its face and for the reasons stated by the Chair it is now certainly subject to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the bill ought to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union where it can be debated by sections.

Mr. PATTERSON. If that is done it will pass out of the centennial year and half its virtue will be gone.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, I cannot but think that we ought to debate this bill in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union by sections.

Mr. PATTERSON. In order to obviate the objection of the Chair I desire on the part of the Committee on the Territories to present a modification of section 2 of the bill and to ask that it shall be considered as a part of the bill as reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. KASSON. I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. PATTERSON. I have seen the same thing done thousands of times this session; an amendment suggested and accepted.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman certainly will not claim that the modification he proposed to the bill has been submitted to the Committee on the Territories?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can only act on the bill as reported. The point of order has been made and sustained by the Chair, and the bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask that this bill may be made the special order for Saturday next after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That will require unanimous consent.

Mr. HURLBUT. I object to making any more special orders; we have more now than we can dispose of.

PENITENTIARY AT BOISÉ CITY, IDAHO.

Mr. FORT, from the Committee on the Territories, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 1972) to authorize the construction of an inclosure around the United States penitentiary at Boisé City, in the Territory of Idaho.

The bill appropriates the sum of $2,000, or so much thereof as may be required, to construct a wooden inclosure around the United States penitentiary at Boisé City in the Territory of Idaho, to be expended by the United States marshal for the district of Idaho, under the direction of the Attorney-General of the United States.

The amendment reported from the committee was to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$1,500."

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to reserve any point of order that may lie against this bill until I can hear some explanation of it.

Mr. FORT. I do not suppose any explanation is necessary. This is a penitentiary belonging to the Government of the United States, and it is cheaper to build a fence around it than to guard it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not make any point of order on the bill.

The amendment reported from the committee was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FORT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SIOUX CITY, BLACK HILLS AND PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I am instructed by the Committee on Railways and Canals to report back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, House bill No. 3000, incorporating the Sioux City, Black Hills and Pacific Railroad Company. There is no subsidy or Government aid in this bill; it is an ordinary railroad charter for a railroad from Sioux City, Iowa, westward, through Nebraska, Dakota, Wyoming, Idaho, and Oregon, to Portland, Oregon.

Mr. SAVAGE. I will reserve any point of order upon this bill until it is read.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill, but before concluding,

Mr. EDEN. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I rise for the purpose of moving to go into Committee of the Whole on the joint resolution in relation to the protection of the Texas frontier.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman to yield to allow me to introduce a bill for reference only.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I will yield for that purpose.

COINAGE OF THE SILVER DOLLAR.

Mr. KELLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3923) to provide for the coining of the standard silver dollar of the United States and for restoring its legal-tender character; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

W. J. MURCHISON.

Mr. REAGAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3924) for the relief of W. J. Murchison, postmaster at Weldon, Houston County, Texas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

JAIL ON JUDICIARY SQUARE, WASHINGTON.

Mr. KIMBALL. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report back, with an amendment, Senate bill No. 842, authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to remove the jail on Judiciary Square to grounds near to the Washington Asylum for the use of the District.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and empowered to tear down and remove the jail situate on Judiciary Square, in the city of Washington, and, with the material thereof, and such other as may be necessary, to locate and construct within the present year a suitable building or buildings for the work-house of the Washington Asylum, for the use of said District, upon the following grounds, namely: Upon the public reservation in said city of Washington now occupied in part by the buildings of the Washington Asylum, beginning on the east side of Nineteenth street east, at the southwestern angle of the ground occupied by said Washington Asylum; running thence south along the east line of said street to the point at which the north line of E street, if prolonged, would intersect the east line of said Nineteenth street east; running thence east three hundred feet; thence north to the south boundary of the asylum grounds; thence west three hundred feet to the point of beginning; and that it shall be lawful to use said building or buildings and grounds for the imprisonment under the laws of persons sentenced to imprisonment by the police court of said District, or by the supreme court of said District in cases appealed from said police court, for violation of the municipal laws or ordinances in force in said District.

SEC. 2. That said commissioners shall not expend more than $14,000 in and about the aforesaid work of tearing down, removal, and construction; which sum is hereby appropriated for that purpose out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 3. That for the removal of the earth and rubbish, grading, sewerage, and other improvements of Judiciary Square, the sum of $2,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in lieu of the money to have been derived from the sale of the jail in said square, and appropriated June 3, 1874.

The amendment reported from the committee was in section 2 of the bill to strike out the words "money in the Treasury" and insert in lieu thereof the words "revenues of the District of Columbia."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KIMBALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

L. D. EVANS.

Mr. HANCOCK. I am directed by the Committee of Ways and Means to submit a report upon House bill No. 3141 for the relief of L. D. Evans; and I move that the report be printed and recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CONGER. Not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Committee of Ways and Means has the right to report at any time.

Mr. CONGER. To report revenue bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a private bill, not a revenue bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not notice the character of the bill.

The motion to print and recommit was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FRUIT BRANDY.

Mr. HANCOCK. If my colleague [Mr. SCHLEICHER] will yield to me, I desire to report from the Committee of Ways and Means, for consideration at this time, a bill relating to the production of fruit brandy, and to punish frauds connected with the same.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I will yield if it does not take too much time.

Mr. HANCOCK. I desire to report this bill for present consideration. It has been prepared by the Internal Revenue Department, and has the unanimous approval of the Committee of Ways and Means. The Representatives from California insist that it is very important to have it passed now in order that the people may avail themselves of its provisions in connection with the present crop of grapes.

Mr. LUTTRELL. It will require but a moment to pass the bill; and I hope the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] will give way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order to debate the bill now.

Mr. HANCOCK. I suppose there will be no objection to it.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill now?

Mr. CONGER. I object.

Mr. HANCOCK. I ask, then, that the bill may be printed and recommitted.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 3925) was reported, read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I rise for the purpose of moving that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the joint resolution for the protection of the Texas frontier.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw my objection to the consideration of the bill reported by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HANCOCK.]

Mr. LUTTRELL. The objection is withdrawn; and I hope the bill will now be considered and passed. It is a very important measure to the people of the Pacific coast.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot go back, after other business has intervened, to take up business which has been objected to.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent that the concurrent resolution from the Senate in regard to a joint special committee upon the subject of Chinese immigration be taken from the Speaker's table and considered now.

There being no objection, the resolution was taken from the table and read, as follows:

Whereas on the 6th day of July, 1876, the Senate authorized the appointment of a special committee of three Senators to investigate the immigration of Chinese to this country; and whereas on the 17th day of July, 1876, the House of Representatives authorized the appointment of a special committee of three members of the House to discharge similar duties:

Be it enacted by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That said special committees shall act as a joint special committee of the two Houses for the purposes aforesaid, and with the powers conferred by the resolutions appointing them; the expenses of the said joint committee to be paid one-half out of the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was concurred in.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, of New York, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same.

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 153) to correct an error in the enrollment of the post-office appropriation act.

HEIRS OF WILLIAM H. ARNOLD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report on the bill (H. R. No. 3780) for the relief of the heirs of William H. Arnold; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

PENN'S COVE MILITARY RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports concerning the Penn's Cove military reservation, Washington Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

PROTECTION OF TEXAS FRONTIER.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I now renew my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 96) to provide for the protection of the Texas frontier on the Lower Rio Grande. Pending that motion I move that all debate on the pending section and the amendments thereto be limited to twenty minutes.

Mr. SMALLS. I ask the gentleman to allow a little more time. Twenty minutes will allow only ten minutes for each side. I hope the gentleman will agree to give at least an hour.

Mr. GARFIELD. I trust the gentleman from Texas will at least consent to allow thirty minutes. I think that will be satisfactory.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and modify my motion accordingly.

The motion to limit debate in Committee of the Whole upon the pending section and amendments thereto to thirty minutes was agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. SCHLIECHER that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. MONROE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 96) to provide for the protection of the Texas frontier on the Lower Rio Grande.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose it had under consideration an amendment to section 1, offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. SMALLS,] which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no troops for the purposes named in this section shall be drawn from the State of South Carolina so long as the militia of that State peaceably assembled are assaulted, disarmed, and taken prisoners, and then massacred in cold blood by lawless bands of men invading the State from the State of Georgia.

Mr. SMALLS. I offered that amendment, and desire to say a word upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending section and amendments thereto has been limited by the House to thirty minutes. Speeches have been made for and against the pending amendment, and it will be well for the gentleman therefore to preserve the proper order and submit an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SMALL. I move as a formal amendment to strike out the last word.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in offering the amendment which has been read by the Clerk I did it believing that the race to which I belong are being outrageously treated in the district I have the honor to represent upon this floor. Notwithstanding that, sir, the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] rose upon this floor and attempted to state to the House and to the country that I had introduced this matter for bad political purposes. If it has been the custom of the gentleman from New York to bring in matters here for bad political purposes, it is not so with me.

That gentleman early undertook to state to the House that South Carolina was the worst-governed State in the United States; that it was rotten to the core—rotten all round its borders. I agree with the gentleman from New York that South Carolina is rotten all round its borders, and for that very reason I have offered the amendment to this bill to cut off that rotten part all round South Carolina so as to let the core stand. It is those rotten parts which are troubling us. We are getting along all right ourselves.

He stated that I vouched for the author of that report. I state again to this House that that report which was read from the desk was signed by an honorable gentleman, a loyal gentleman, one who risked his life for the protection and defense of this Government. I say again I know that if I had given his name to this House in the next few hours it would have been known at Hamburgh, South Carolina, and I would not have given ten cents for his life, for General Butler, the gentleman who was attempted to be made a saint of in this House, would at once have organized another band of Ku-Klux and hunted him down.

I will tell the gentleman from New York that I was vouched for by nearly fourteen thousand majority of loyal men to this Government, and, sir, I will say men of my native State, the State of South Carolina, where I was born and reared. I will ask the gentleman in God's name who indorses him, whether the people of New York or the people of Ohio?

Mr. COX. Both of them. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMALLS. It is a good thing if the gentleman is indorsed by both of them. I do not desire to take up the time of the House, as gentlemen on that side have only seen fit to allow us ten minutes to debate on this question. Thank God, I hold in my hand the official investigation of the attorney-general of that State, and if that report does not place everything charged in that former letter upon General Butler's head, then I do not know how any man can be proved guilty of any crime within the borders of the United States.

I have nothing to say in reference to the complimentary remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JONES] in regard to General Butler. General Butler might have been in the days he knew him everything he has stated in regard to him, but I can tell him that since General Butler left him he has either got into bad company or has been badly advised, for there has not been a row or riot in South Carolina since reconstruction in Edgefield that General Butler has not led; he has been the leader of every riot or outrage perpetrated upon the good people of that State.

Why, sir, this military company is a regularly organized body of the militia of that State. It was celebrating the Fourth of July, and men having no authority at all asked those men to give up their arms.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SMALLS. I ask that the report of the attorney-general of the State of South Carolina be printed as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SMALLS. Also the statement of the coroner and other papers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

DOC ADAMS'S STATEMENT—THE STORY OF THE TWO-HOURS' SIEGE, AND HOW HE WITH A DETACHMENT OF HIS COMPANY ESCAPED FROM THE ARMORY.

[From our special correspondent.]

AIKEN, SOUTH CAROLINA, July 12.

I send you a statement of Doc L. Adams, the captain of the militia company, just as it has been given by him. He saw a part of the affair and was quite an interested party. Here is the statement:

I am captain of Company A, Eighteenth Regiment National Guard of the State of South Carolina, which company has been stationed at Hamburgh; in fact it was made up there from the citizens of the town and vicinity.

On Saturday, the 8th day of July, about half past four o'clock, General Butler, with about thirty or forty men, assembled at the office of Trial-Justice Rivers, in Hamburgh. The occasion of this was because at that hour the trial of the militia officers was to take place. I went to Trial-Justice Rivers and stated to him that I and the other officers of the company did not want to be tried before him that evening, and that we would give bond for our appearance before the circuit court. My reason for saying this to him was because I had heard threats made against myself and others by the forty or more armed men who were crowded round Rivers's office. On making this statement to Rivers he told me I could use my own judgment about the matter, as he was of the opinion himself that it would be unsafe for myself and the other officers to be tried at that time. I, having concluded not to go to the court, a committee came from General Butler for me to meet him at the house of S. B. Spencer, where a hundred or more armed white men were congregated. I refused to go, believing my life would be unsafe. The white men were armed with revolvers and sixteen-shooters. I then made the proposition that if General Butler would meet me half way and keep his men back I would meet him, and we would try and settle the matter without any trouble. This General Butler refused positively to do, and sent a message to the effect that the arms of the company and the officers must be given up to him, and that he would not guarantee any protection whatever even if the arms and officers were surrendered. I refused to agree to this, as I saw if I did my men and myself would be at the mercy of General Butler and his men. I then, to preserve the lives of my men and myself, took refuge in a brick building we used as an armory. There were thirty-eight of us in all. We had hardly got in and secured the entrance before General Butlers' men opened fire on us. At this time General Butler had about two hundred men. They kept up a brisk fire on the building for over half an hour before we fired one shot from the building. General Butler's men were posted under the trestle of the Charlotte, Columbia and Augusta Railroad and under the abutment of the bridge of the same company. This was between six and seven o'clock p. m. We remained in the building until about eight o'clock.

My reasons for leaving was because I heard threats made by General Butler's men to blow the building up, and to send to Augusta for cannon, and I knew we could not hold it if either of these means were resorted to. After getting out of the building with my men the company divided, and I took command of one portion and gave Lieutenant Attaway command of the other. The number with me amounted to about a dozen or so men; Attaway had twenty-one. I went to the left of the building with my men and escaped. Attaway and his men were captured. This is all that I can speak of positively, as when I made my escape I and the portion of men with me came right on to Aiken. At the time I left I think there were four or five hundred men under General Butler, with re-enforcements coming in from Augusta and Edgefield. Between twelve and one o'clock at least two thousand men were present, armed to the teeth. I left for Aiken about three o'clock Sunday morning.

DOC L. ADAMS,
Captain Company A, Eighteenth Regiment N. G. S. S. C.

The above statement is signed with Adams's own signature. He seems to be a man of some intelligence, and as "mild-mannered" as possible. He gave the statement without hesitation and in a manner which convinced me of his sincerity.

PRINCE RIVERS'S STATEMENT.

The testimony was closed at this point, and though many other witnesses were waiting, this was deemed sufficient. The verdict has not yet been rendered.

Prince Rivers made the following written statement in substance to Attorney-General Stone to-day: On the affidavit of one Robert Butler, he issued warrants as trial justice for Doc Adams and the other commissioned officers of a militia company in the town of Hamburgh for obstructing the highway and preventing the said Robert Butler from passing. This was on the 5th of July, 1876. Owing to some confusion taking place in this office on the said day he postponed the trial till Saturday, the 8th, at four p. m., at which time General M. C. Butler appeared as counsel for Robert Butler. During the said trial M. C. Butler asked for more time, which was granted, he, Butler, promising to be ready within an hour; but he never returned to Rivers's office any more, but went to Augusta and returned with two companies of soldiers, and demanded the immediate surrender of the arms in the possession of the militia to him. After some talk with Rivers he, General Butler, granted them a half hour to comply with his terms. Rivers then went to the drill-room of the company and consulted with the men who were there assembled to get them to give up their arms sooner than have bloodshed. This they refused to do, saying that General Butler had no authority to make them give up their arms. The time having expired, General Butler gave the order for the troops under him to fire, which they did, and said fire was not returned by the militia for some time. Butler told me he would have the arms or burn the town. I, Rivers, offered to box the guns and send them to Chamberlain, but Butler would not agree to this.

THE HAMBURGH RIOT—OFFICIAL REPORT OF ATTORNEY-GENERAL STONE.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL,
Columbia, South Carolina, July 12, 1876.

SIR: According to your request of Monday last I have visited Hamburgh for the purpose of ascertaining the facts connected with the killing of several men there on the night of the 8th of July.

My information has been derived chiefly from Trial-Justice Rivers, and from the testimony of persons who have been examined before the coroner's jury now in session, and from those who received wounds from the armed body of white men who had taken them prisoners.

From this information the following facts seem to be clearly established:

During the administration of Governor Scott a company of State militia was organized at Hamburgh, of which Prince Rivers was captain. This company was known as Company A, Ninth Regiment National Guard of the State of South Carolina. Arms were at that time furnished to it and some ammunition. This company, previous to May, 1876, had for some time but few names on its roll, drilled rarely, and scarcely kept alive its organization. But in May of this year the number of members increased to about eighty, and one Doc Adams was chosen captain.

On the 4th of July the company drilled on one of the public streets in the town of Hamburgh. The street on which they drilled was between one hundred and one hundred and fifty feet wide, but it was little used, and was overgrown with grass, except in that portion which was used as a carriage road. While the company was thus drilling Thomas Butler and Henry Getzen, his brother-in-law, came along in a carriage and demanded that the company should make way for them. Adams halted the company, remonstrated with Butler and Getzen for thus seeking to interfere with the company, and called their attention to the fact that there was plenty of room on each side of the company to pass.

Finding them unwilling to turn out of their course, Adams finally opened ranks and allowed them to drive through.

This incident seems to have angered Butler and Getzen, who made complaint before Trial-Justice Rivers against the militia company for obstructing the highway. The trial justice on the following day issued a warrant against Adams, as he was the captain of the company, and had him brought before him for trial. During the progress of the trial Adams was arrested by the trial justice for contempt of court, and subsequently the case was continued until four o'clock Saturday afternoon, July 8.

At that time Butler and Getzen, with General M. C. Butler, who had been employed by Robert J. Butler, father of the former, as their attorney, repaired to the office of the trial justice, but Adams did not appear.

General Butler inquired as to the nature of the charges against Adams, and asked if the trial justice was to hear the case as trial justice or in his official capacity of major-general of militia.

To this the trial justice replied that he was to hear the case as a trial justice, but if the facts showed that a military offense had been committed, Adams would have to be tried by a court-martial.

General Butler then stated that he thought the case might be arranged, and at his suggestion time was given him to see the parties.

After this the trial justice did not see General Butler at his office, but learned that he had gone over to Augusta.

In the mean time the trial justice had been informed that some two hundred or three hundred armed white men were in Hamburgh, and that a demand had been made by them that the militia should surrender their arms. After a consultation with Messrs. Jefferson and Spencer, Rivers sent for General Butler. He rode up to the back gate of Rivers's house. The two had a conversation, in which General Butler said that he had given orders to have the guns given up in half an hour, and the time was nearly up.

Rivers asked if some other arrangement could not be made, to which General Butler replied in the negative.

Rivers then asked if he would not consent to have him receive the arms, box them up, and send them to the governor. To which General Butler replied that he would box them up and send them to the governor, and if he, the governor, should return them to the company it would be at his own risk. Rivers then asked if they would give a bond for the arms, to which General Butler said that he would stand the bond, and turning to another person—I think R. J. Butler—asked if he would not go on a bond also, to which he replied that he would.

Rivers then asked for time before fire should be opened on the militia, so that he might have a conference with the militia officers. This was acceded to, and Rivers then went to the building known as the Sibley building, in the second story of which the company had its armory and drill-room, and where it was then assembled, and told Captain Adams what might be expected if he should refuse to give up the arms. To this Adams replied that General Butler had no right to the guns; that the company held them, and he proposed to hold them, unless General Butler showed some authority to take them.

After this interview Rivers returned to General Butler, with whom was Robert J. Butler. He told them the decision to which the company had come. Then Robert J. Butler said that General Butler was his attorney; that he had come to settle the matter. If the company would apologize for the insult to his son and son-in-law he would do nothing more. But the whole matter was in General Butler's hands. General Butler said that, as the men would not meet him, he would have no more to do with them. General Butler was asked by Rivers if he would guarantee the safety of the town should the militia surrender their arms. He said that would depend on how the men behaved themselves afterward.

This statement is confirmed by S. P. Pixley.

While these negotiations were going on the armed body of white men in the town were concentrated on the bank of the river near the Sibley building. Soon after they were broken off firing began. Men who were in the building say that it was commenced by the whites firing upon the building. Adams gave his orders not to shoot until he directed them to. The company had very little ammunition, and all they had was a portion of that issued to the company when it was first organized.

After the firing had begun it was returned by the militia, and one of the attacking party, McKie Merriweather, was shot through the head and instantly killed. After this a piece of artillery, said to belong to the Washington Artillery, of Augusta, was brought over from Augusta and four charges of canister were fired from it upon the armory, but without injuring any one. The persons in the armory escaped from the rear by means of ladders, and hid under floors of adjacent buildings, or wherever else they could find shelter.

The first man killed by the whites was James Cook, town marshal. He had been in the armory, but was not a member of the company. He had gone into the street from the rear of the Sibley building, and was at once fired on and fell dead instantly, pierced by five or six bullets.

Afterward the whites began their search for the members of the company. They succeeded in getting about twenty-five colored men as prisoners, some of whom were never members of the company. As fast as the men were captured they were taken to a place near the South Carolina Railroad, where a large party of armed men stood guard over them.

None of those thus captured had arms in their hands.

Subsequently, and at about two o'clock a. m., six men took A. T. Attaway out of the "ring." He and his mother begged for his life, but in vain. He was then told to turn round, and was shot to death by the crowd.

David Phillips was next taken out and was similarly killed.

Pompey Curry was next called out. He recognized among the bystanders Henry Getzen and Dr. Pierce Butler, and called on them to keep the other men from killing him. He ran, and was shot at as he ran, one bullet striking him in the right leg below the knee.

Afterward Albert Myniard, Moses Parks, and Hampton Stevens were killed. Stevens did not belong to the company. Nelder John Parker, who has been commonly referred to in the newspaper reports as John Thomas, was corporal in the company.

When he was arrested and taken to the spot where the other prisoners were, he recognized among the party two gentlemen of Augusta, named Twiggs and Chaffee. He appealed to them for protection. They said he should not be hurt. He states that General M. C. Butler asked him if he was one of the d—d rascals. The reply was in the affirmative. He was then shot in the back. Messrs Twiggs and Chaffee then said if he was shot again they would shoot the ones who did it. They took him off, and had him taken to Augusta. He was shot before Attaway was killed. He may recover from his wounds.

One Butler Edwards was taken as a prisoner. He says he was taken before General Butler, who, at the time, was in the street near the Sibley building. This was about twelve o'clock.

Threats were made to shoot him. General Butler directed that he be taken to the others. He recognized among the crowd one Captain Carwile and ——— Dunbar, of Augusta; said he had a long talk with the former. He was among the prisoners who were let loose and told to run; as they ran they were fired at and he was shot in the head. He was not a member of the company.

Willis Davis, one of the members of the company, was taken to the place where were the other prisoners. The men stated that John Swaringen, of Edgefield County, had charge of the prisoners. He states that he saw General Butler before the men were killed, who asked him what he was doing, and told him he would have enough of it before he got through. He was shot in the arm, near the elbow, when about twenty paces distant from the crowd. The ball is still in his arm, and he suffers much pain. He also states that some of the young men from Georgia remonstrated against shooting the prisoners, but in vain.

Besides the killing and wounding of the men herein named, the party broke open several stores and houses, and, in some instances, robbed the inmates. They took from Mr. Charles Roll, the postmaster, and a very respectable white citizen, a gun which he had in his store, and his private property. From an old colored man, named Jacob Samuels, in his employ, they took a watch and set fire to his house. They broke open the house of Trial-Justice Rivers, and did much damage, as well as robbed him of clothing. They obtained kerosene oil and attempted to set fire to a house, but were prevented by Colonel A. P. Butler from doing so. The ropes of the public wells were cut and some fences were torn down.

So far as I can learn, the primary object of the whites was to take away from the militia their arms.

The man Parker, who was wounded, states that on Friday, the 7th instant, he had a long talk with one Harrison Butler (white) on Broad street, Augusta. Butler told him that if Rivers did not give orders for the militia to give up their arms they would take them any way on the next day.

On Saturday rumors were abroad in Hamburgh that there were armed parties coming in to take the guns, but little credit was attached to them.

One of the white citizens of Hamburgh heard a conversation between David Phillips and General Butler in the afternoon. Phillips talked very "big," as the gentleman said, and General Butler told him that they wanted those guns and were bound to have them.

In the afternoon Colonel A. P. Butler went to the various stores in town and told the proprietors that they must not sell any liquor to his men. In spite of this, however, some of the men compelled one of the storekeepers to furnish them liquor. From the same person they obtained kerosene oil to use in setting fire to a house.

The whites were armed with guns and small arms of various kinds, and many of them had axes and hatchets.

It is proper to state that the intendant of Hamburgh, Mr. Gardner, was informed by General Butler, in an interview with him, that the arms of the company must be given up.

Trial-Justice Rivers is now holding an inquest and taking the testimony of witnesses. Until their verdict is rendered, it will be impossible to tell who were engaged in the attack on the militia and the subsequent killing and wounding of the colored men.

It may be possible that a careful judicial investigation may show some slight errors in some of the minor details stated in this report. But, making due allowance for such errors, the facts show the demand on the militia to give up their arms was made by persons without lawful authority to enforce such demand or to receive the arms had they been surrendered; that the attack on the militia to compel a compliance with this demand was without lawful excuse or justification; and that after there had been some twenty or twenty-five prisoners captured and completely in the power of their captors, and without means of making further resistance, five of them were deliberately shot to death and three more severely wounded.

It further appears that, not content with thus satisfying their vengeance, many of the crowd added to their guilt the crime of robbery of defenseless people, and were only prevented from arson by the efforts of their own leaders.

Yours, very respectfully,

WILLIAM STONE,
Attorney-General, South Carolina

HON. D. H. CHAMBERLAIN, Governor.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I have no response to make to what has just fallen from the other side. It was advertised pretty largely that I was to be in some way or other attacked to-day by somebody of a different color and race. The attack has been made. I said the other day that South Carolina was bad at the center and to the circumference. I presume, Mr. Chairman, that South Carolina is worse now than she was when this book which is in my hand was written. It is entitled, "A Prostrate State: South Carolina under Negro Government. By James S. Pike, late minister of the United States at The Hague." The author is a republican gentleman of observation, honesty, and intelligence. In this little book he has shown the effect of this terrible negro government upon the resources and morals of South Carolina. In chapter 3 all the foulness of the State government is developed. It shows how the treasury has been drained by thieves. It shows that the State treasurer can be of no use there because all the means of the State have been robbed. It shows how, after the carpet-bag governments had taken nearly all, there was a worse crew of robbers called native Africans of South Carolina. It refers to them especially. I do not know whether the members from South Carolina in this House belong to the Chamberlain faction or to the other faction, or to what class they do belong. All I know is that this little book authentically states the fact that—

They are the highwaymen of the State. They are professional legislative robbers. They are men who have studied and practiced the art of legalized theft. They are in no sense different from or better than the men who fill the prisons and penitentiaries of the world. They are, in fact, of precisely that class, only more daring and audacious. They pick your pockets by law. They rob the poor and the rich alike by law. They confiscate your estate by law. They do none of these things, even under the tyrant's plea of the public good or the public necessity. They do all simply to enrich themselves personally. (Chapter 8, page 58.)

Following the example which has been set, I make some other extracts from this book to show how utterly wicked is the government of South Carolina:

That the State has been victimized, plundered, and robbed by audacious scoundrels from abroad is not to be denied. But at home she is mainly rescued from their clutches, and it is not they whom the people of the State will have much longer to contend with. Those who would reform South Carolina in the future will have chiefly its native population only to deal with. (Page 36.)

Mr. Chairman, this is a commentary on the virtue of carpet-bagism compared with native rascality.

The author, in chapter 17, treats of the principal frauds practiced in South Carolina under several heads, as follows:

1. Those which relate to the increase of the State debt.
2. The frauds practiced in the purchase of lands for the freedmen.
3. The railroad frauds.
4. The election frands.
5. The frauds practiced in the redemption of the notes of the Bank of South Carolina.
6. The censns fraud.
7. The fraud in furnishing the legislative chambers.
8. General and legislative corruption.

In regard to the first of these he says, on page 122:

We have elsewhere stated that in round numbers the State debt of South Carolina has been increased from $5,000,000 to $15,000,000 since the war closed.

It turns out in this as in almost every other point that the fuller the investigation the worse the disclosures. The debt is a great deal more than $15,000,000, with nothing to show for it.

And again, after a careful statement of the debt question, he concludes on page 127:

Striking out, then this item of indebtedness to the bank, which we will allow to be offset by its credits, though it is quite possible this makes too favorable a showing for the State, we find the following result as the upshot of the comptroller's report:

Whole State indebtedness	$26, 621, 917 00
Deduct due to bank	1, 839, 011 00
Total	24, 782, 906 00

Leaving an outstanding debt of $24,783,690 in round numbers.

Why, sir, South Carolina to-day is a victim of this joint black and white rapacity. Pillage is the rule and honesty the exception. One more extract will suffice in this connection. From chapter 3, page 25, is the following:

The corruption of the State government of South Carolina is a topic that has grown threadbare in the handling. The last administration stole right hand and left with a recklessness and audacity without parallel. The robbers under it embraced all grades of people. The thieves had to combine to aid one another. It took a combination of the principal authorities to get at the treasury, and they had to share the plunder alike. All the smaller fry had their proportions, the legislators and lobby-men included. The principal men of the Scott administration are living in Columbia, and nobody undertakes to call them to account. They do not attempt even to conceal their plunder. If everybody was not implicated in the robberies of the treasury some way would be found to bring them to light. All that people know is that the State bonded debt has been increased from five to fifteen millions, and that besides this there are all sorts of current obligations to pay afloat, issued by State officers who had authority to bind the treasury. They are all tinctured with fraud, and some of them are such scandalous swindles that the courts have been able temporarily to stop their payment.

The whole of the late administration, which terminated its existence in November, 1872, was a morass of rottenness, and the present administration was born of the corruptions of that; but for the exhaustion of the State, there is no good reason to believe it would steal less than its predecessor. There seems to be no hope, therefore, that the villainies of the past will be speedily uncovered.

If there were any justification, which I do not say there is, for any outrages either on or from black or white, and I will not decide on that, sir, until the Hamburgh inquest is properly made up and returned—if there were any justification, it would be found in the provocations of this miserably bad government, which Mr. Pike locates not on the borders, nor outside of the borders, but in the very heart of the State, in Columbia, and from the center all around. Does he not say (page 24) that the principal rascals live in Columbia and nobody calls them to account; that they do not even conceal their plunder and their scandalous swindles? They boast of stealing and are proud that they are not discovered.

Here, Mr. Chairman, is one chapter in this volume devoted entirely to the State debt scoundrelism of the State government. It runs up the debt from five millions to some twenty-four or twenty-seven million dollars. But can anybody tell how much more it is, owing to the malfeasance of the officials and the various kinds of frauds that were perpetrated? There is another chapter devoted to the fraud in the expenditure of $700,000 appropriated by the Legislature to buy lands for the freedmen.

For the freedmen! If there is one thing worse than another it is a white rascal above a black rascal. All through the late experience of Congress you have seen, sir, that the worst men who have preyed upon the negroes in this country have been their white allies. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DOUGLAS] can tell you, from his Committee on the Freedman's Bank, how $64,000 was discovered by his committee to have been robbed from soldiers, sailors, and marines; how much was stolen by your Freedman's Bank, not to speak of the Bureau. How much? At least a million and a half. Am I not correct? Did not the gentleman's committee so report?

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COX. O, honey, sit down. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAINEY. I rose to ask the Chair a question.

Mr. COX. I did not ask you to get up. Allow me to finish.

Mr. RAINEY. I wanted to know what was the pending question before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. COX. No, sir.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman should not raise issues that are not embraced in the pending question.

Mr. COX. I do not desire to have any collision with the gentleman. One of the colored members said the other day that I was good in everything except in being a democrat. I have always had the kind words of those gentlemen. I have never, as some gentlemen on the other side have done, called them "niggers." I did once call them colored members, for which I was called to account. I did not know how else to describe them. I believe they are to be treated under the Constitution and the law with fairness and equality. Why not? They have the same immortal souls. Some of them are better looking than some of their white confrères across the way. [Laughter.] I do not see why we should be all the time keeping up this race contest.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, if I may attempt to bring the committee back to good humor—I believe in what an old parson once said to a congregation in Ohio. Members of Congress and others used to go down and hear him preach; and one day, when one of my predecessors was sitting there with a gold-headed cane, and brass buttons on his blue coat, the type of a statesman of the old school, he gave this illustration: "There is the old judge; when he goes to the market-house to buy a roast of mutton, does he ask whether it be a black sheep or a white sheep? No. All he seeks to know is, is it good mutton?" So it is, said he, at the last great day when the horn shall sound, and the question will be not "whether he was a black sheep or a white sheep, but whether it is good mutton." [Laughter.]

It may be that the great body of the black people in South Carolin a belong to the category of the good sheep; but I am afraid from the testimony in this book that some of them will not go on the right side on the day of judgment. I am afraid the Good Shepherd will not provide for them.

Mr. SMALLS. Have you the book there of the city of New York? [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I presume that the gentleman from South Carolina, by making that remark, seeks to embarrass me in consequence of the fact that I belong to that portion of the democratic party, along with Governor Tilden and others, who drove out the rascals, as you did not in your party in South Carolina. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I have no time to talk about South Carolina, but—

There is a land of pure delight
Where saints immortal reign, and that land is the city of New York. The population of South Carolina in 1870 was 716,500, the population of the city of New York was 942,000. The population of South Carolina was about three-fourths of that of the city of New York. The gentleman from New York who has just taken his seat [Mr. COX] said that the republican administration are eating out the substance of South Carolina.

Now, sir, the debt of South Carolina over and above every deduction is less than $10,000,000. The debt of the city of New York over and above every deduction is $114,000,000. Who eats out the substance of the people?

But, sir, more than that. Gentlemen say that bad men with bad motives have ruined the State of South Carolina. How about William M. Tweed? He was the ruler of the city of New York in one form or another for more than twelve years. He was the ruler of New York through Tammany Hall at the time when the gentleman from Ohio brought his little "carpet-bag" to the city of New York and set it down in Tammany Hall, which was then flourishing in all its power and glory, and looked up smilingly for the approbation of William M. Tweed. [Great laughter.] While William M. Tweed ruled New York $40,000,000 was stolen from that people by Tweed and his immediate associates, and there is to-day a judgment entered against William M. Tweed for his share of the stealings which could be traced to his hands of over $6,000,000; Peter B. Sweeney, the city treasurer, stole another share; Richard B. Connolly another share; Andrew J. Garvey stole his share; and Ingersoll stole still another share of the $40,000,000, and every man of them has left this country for his country's good excepting two—Garvey, who is in State's prison, and Ingersoll, who has been pardoned out by the "reform" governor of the State of New York. But there was not only this stealing of $40,000,000 by this Tweed gang, but Thomas C. Fields, another glorious leader of Tammany, got an appropriation from the Legislature to the amount of more than $100,000 nominally for the benefit of the firemen, but he actually stole every dollar of it. Henry Genet got an act passed for a court-house in the city of New York and stole the $100,000 appropriated for the court-house, and the sheriff of New York let him run away. The present sheriff allowed William M. Tweed to go to his residence and go up-stairs unattended to see his wife and allowed him thus to leave for parts unknown, and the "reform" governor of the State has not found time to investigate the outrage of letting him escape or to remove him from office, as he had the power to do. This is the party of reform and retrenchment in the city of New York from which my colleague [Mr. COX] hails.

But, sir, we have not told the whole story yet. Tammany elected judges to protect these thieves and robbers—George G. Barnard, McCunn, and Cardoza—every one of whom was impeached and two of them convicted and one resigned. But, sir, we are not through yet. There are now some decent judges in New York and Tammany opposed every one of them, and if Tammany opposed them my colleague who sits over there talking about purity and reform voted against every one of them, for he has never found occasion to quit Tammany yet. And when Boss Tweed's successor, the noted John Kelly, came and waved his wand over him as he sat in our Speaker's chair and said to him, "Come out of that chair and go with me to Saint Louis to carry out the great farce which we have planned," and said, "We have elected our delegates, and we want you, Brother COX, to go with me to Saint Louis in the attitude of the brother of the temperance lecturer. You know that while the one brother was lecturing on temperance the other was exhibiting himself as an awful example; and that is the part you and I will enact at Saint Louis." [Laughter.]

The gentleman went out, and he and Mr. John Kelly enacted the farce and tried to make the world believe that if they nominated Tilden they would be opposing Tammany, that notorious sink of political corruption.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COX. I am glad that my colleague has at last brought before the House this new story of New York and Tweed and Sweeney and others. For driving him out, Governor Tilden to-day is perhaps the most eminent candidate for the Presidency of the United States. For that Governor Tilden is responsible. I know the gentleman does not support Governor Tilden or the men who like John Kelly aided him in driving out the Tweeds, Connollys, and Sweeneys from New York and Tammany; but there is one thing that you cannot plow around, and that is that, whereas in New York the authorities there, democrat and republican alike, with Governor Tilden at their head, have been instrumental in punishing their rascals, yet, according to the authority I have quoted, the South Carolina rascals still go unconvicted and unpunished in the courts of justice.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I suppose that when Tweed ran away he ran to punishment.

Mr. COX. Although Tweed was a rascal he had the aid, every time he wanted it, of legislatures and their members, which were republicans. The gentleman from Troy knows well—I do not say that he had any part in it, but still he knows well—that Tweed bought up the republicans in a body and controlled the Legislature of the State for his nefarious purposes. So that if there is anything in that he is as much to blame as I am for such associations. The gentleman talks about my bringing my carpet-bag from Ohio to New York. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. And putting it into Tammany Hall.

Mr. COX. Now wait a moment. You did not do it well enough when you were up, and now that you are down you cannot observe the rules and behave, as I did when you were speaking. I want to say to the gentleman that I have always maintained here the right of locomotion. It is the right of going and coming when and where we please. I had a right to go back to New York, within sight of my grandfather's old congressional district. And if, after eight years of honorable service here as a Representative from the State of Ohio, the people of New York in a republican district nominated and elected me to Congress, it is not to my discredit. When I had been there two years I declined to run, when the candidacy was tendered, in a congressional district where there was a democratic majority of 17,000 because I thought that some day or other some mean man would call me a carpet-bagger. I ran two years later in my own district, where I lived, in a republican district; I ran there twice and was elected each time, not by the aid of Mr. Tweed, though not with his opposition. I did so because the people supposed then, as they did afterward when they adopted me as their candidate at large for the State of New York and gave me 17,000 votes more than any of the rest of our ticket—they supposed that under the Constitution of this country I could come and go as I pleased, without asking the gentleman from Troy as to my business.

I never in this Hall called any gentleman to account for carpet-bagging. I do not care where a man is born, so that he is good and just. Our Saviour was born in Bethlehem, in a manger, and came out of Nazareth. We worship him, though he was in one respect a foreigner. We do not, however, necessarily worship the little African fetishes that come from Congo and Guinea, which are the objects of devotion of the gentleman from Troy, and about the only devotion which he has shown this session worthy of the name of religion.

This South Carolina amendment does not properly belong to this Texas bill. I do not care whether or not, for this legislative purpose, this outrage shall be laid at the door of the whites or blacks. We have outrages in the North. We had an extraordinary outrage not long ago at Newark, New Jersey, but we do not invoke the Federal sword for that. The point is, shall the Federal Government intervene whenever lawlessness occurs or a trouble arises between the blacks and the whites in the southern country? Shall the power of the Federal Government be aggrandized and abused so that no conciliation can ever come to this distracted country? It never will come under the teachings of such men as my colleague from the Troy district.

One word more and I am done. A proper amendment to this bill, ad absurdum, would be that the Army should not be moved from the State of New Jersey because of the troubles there recently in Newark, where several men were murdered in a tannery and in a river; or from Indianapolis or Pennsylvania, or anywhere else where there is any conspicuous trouble or crime. What I stand for here is not to recriminate against South Carolina or to answer criminations against New York. This South Carolina amendment came here not by our motion. But when the black race is arrayed against the white race, when the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARTRIDGE] rises here and asks time for a fair discussion and a fair hearing of these charges, it becomes us, when important legislation is asked for on a bill connected with the defense of the border of Texas, to inquire into the facts of the case and to wait for the inquest to develop the true state of the facts.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is not the least sad of all the sad facts in the subject that we are now engaged in considering, that so grave an occurrence as the one which has been introduced officially by a member of this House has elicited so little attention from the majority that the whole drift of the discussion should have been turned away into a partisan direction, and partly and mainly turned into laughter.

Now I want to state in a word what I understand to be the facts which we are called upon to consider by this amendment. A legally organized militia company, parading with arms that are legally held by them, in their own town, on the centennial Fourth of July, were accosted by two young men who demanded that the company should get out of the road; and because the whole company did not at once move out of the road for the two men who could have gone quite as well a little at one side, it was resolved by sundry persons to disarm that legally organized military company of the State; and because the company did not consent to be disarmed at the command of unauthorized persons, an organized mob, led by a distinguished gentleman who served as an officer in the war against the Union, assailed, surrounded, opened fire upon them, captured some of them, and after capture murdered in cold blood without warrant or authority a considerable number of American citizens. This has been stated here in the House, on the official authority of the attorney-general of South Carolina. The papers of the dominant party in that State and Georgia admit that the real and only ground of this outrage was the fact that the military company was composed of colored men; that colored men had used their rights as citizens to organize themselves as a part of the State militia. Now I have no doubt that there are multitudes of good men in the South and many on the other side of this House who deeply deplore this bloody and atrocious outrage. But how has it been treated in this discussion? The first utterance was by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] who arose in his place and declared that the negroes began the affray by killing a white man. That statement has been answered by the fact that they made no hostile demonstration until they were fired into by the mob. Again the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] stated that this matter was introduced here for a bad purpose, a bad motive, to stir up bad blood, and to affect the elections. And to-day we have been treated to an extreme example of his usual method. He has attempted to laugh at a group of atrocious murders. His levity was never so horribly out of place.

The only calm and thoughtful declaration which has been made on this subject on the other side of the House was by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HARTRIDGE,] who spoke manfully and regretfully upon the subject and suggested that we should wait until the official examination was had.

I am more troubled than by the mere fact of the murder about the symptoms that I see around me. Has it come to pass that a murder like this cannot be discussed in this House without its being charged that there is a bad motive for speaking of it? Do our northern democrats care more for the interests of their party than for the safety of the lives of citizens? But I am still more anxious to know, and to know from gentlemen of the South who can speak with knowledge and by authority, whether this is a sporadic case of murder, or whether it is a symptom which indicates a general condition of feeling in their section. My anxiety is to know whether this instance indicates a settled purpose to declare that black men shall not be legally organized into militia companies, shall not parade peaceably in the streets under arms, shall not be allowed all the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizens of the United States of whatever color. That, Mr. Chairman, is my great anxiety in regard to this case.

We fought a great war to establish the Union and the equal rights of citizens before the law; and I wish we could lay aside all the bitterness of that contest; but I say distinctly to gentlemen from the South that the era of our good feeling can never be ushered in in its fullness until you let us know that the old spirit of caste and race which caused the war has been laid aside with the weapons we carried in the field; and until a black man, while he behaves himself, lawfully and peaceably shall enjoy all the rights, all the privileges, all the protection, and all the guarantees of the Constitution that a white man enjoys in all our States. When that is done, we can shake hands in full assurance of peace, and can hang the olive branch over all our doors; until that time comes, we must keep watch with that eternal vigilance which is the price not only of liberty but of equal justice to all citizens.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss or analyze this terrible and disgraceful affair at Hamburgh, although I think that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has not given a fair and impartial statement of the circumstances in which it originated. But those circumstances are of no moment here upon this question, nor are the provocations which led to the final fearful tragedy involved in the proposition now before us. Nor are they in my opinion (and here I differ with the member from Ohio) the legitimate topic of debate or discussion on this floor; they belong to another tribunal to which the constitutions of States as well as that of the Federal Government remit these subjects.

Whether in the circumstances and these provocations the whites or the blacks were most to blame is a question to which I shall not now recur. Through all the confusion which has been thrown around this transaction, (and I must say, notwithstanding the honorable character of the informant of the member from South Carolina, which I do not question in the slightest degree, his document was evidently written, and perhaps very naturally, under great exasperation and excitement,) through all the uncertainty which exasperation and exaggerations have thrown around this subject, there is one fact which gleams out acknowledged, or, if not acknowledged, is indisputable. It is that a body of white men did without authority of law put to death a number of black men, who had been taken as prisoners; I mean who had been captured and deprived of their liberty, but who were not prisoners in the legal sense of the term, inasmuch as those capturing them had no right under the law to deprive them of their personal liberty.

Now, sir, I wish to say here in my place—and what I say here just as it drops from my lips and falls upon the reporter's notes is at once sent throughout the entire South and every constituent of mine in every home and hamlet will read what I say; and even if I were base or ignoble enough to utter here what I would swerve from there, as has been falsely charged against southern men, the RECORD would always convict me—in my place here and with the responsibilities surrounding me, I assert that no excuse or palliation can possibly be found for these outrages and this barbarism. [Applause.]

As a southern man and as a democrat I have a remark or two to make upon this subject. Mr. Chairman, we of the South have a lawless class precisely as you of the North have lawless classes. As a consequence we have riots in which human life is lost precisely as you have such riots, with this difference: Ours without preconcert flame up in different localities and are confined to short periods of time, while yours in more than one instance have held several counties in terror, have extended over months of time, and have involved a larger loss of human life, defying the authorities of your States.

There is another fact which I wish to mention. In those Southern States where disorders and violence occur there are governments of a peculiar character and type, invariably governments of one character and type. They are governments which are called republican governments, but it is a spurious republicanism which has no identification or sympathy with the views and purposes that have inspired the following of the great republican party of this country. And, sir, those State governments have invariably encouraged these disorders and these murders by their inefficiency, by their imbecility, by their cowardice, and by their connivance, for they have in every instance not only failed to punish these murders, not only failed to administer justice, not only failed to execute the laws, but they have used the occurrences as occasions to appeal to Congress and to the North for help in maintaining the power which they are so ruthlessly exercising.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the committee will allow the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] to conclude. I very much want to hear the statement he is making. If no member objects, I hope the Chair will not interpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can only say that the House strictly limited debate in committee to six speeches of five minutes each, and rather more than that time has already been occupied.

Mr. GARFIELD. If no member objects, I hope the Chairman will allow the gentleman from Mississippi to go on.

Mr. BANKS. If the Chairman does not interpose, there will be no objection upon the floor.

Mr. CONGER. We begged gentlemen to give longer time. I will move that the committee rise in order that the House may extend the time.

Mr. LAMAR. I would like very much to reply to a remark made by my friend from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. GARFIELD. And I would like a reply to my inquiry.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the committee rise in order that the time may be extended.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I gave the longest time that was asked for. Twenty minutes had been agreed upon; but at the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] it was extended to thirty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Discussion is not in order.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. If we keep on extending the time for discussion it will go over until to-morrow, and I do not know how much longer, for, sir, the time never will be in this when some member does not wish to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the committee rise for the purpose of extending the time for debate on the first section of the pending bill.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 101, noes 43.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. MONROE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 96) to provide for the protection of the Texas frontier on the Lower Rio Grande, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SCHLEICHER obtained the floor.

Mr. CONGER. The committee rose for a special object on my motion, and I insist that I am entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is supposed to know nothing of what takes place in committee. The gentleman from Texas is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CONGER. I believe the Chair was present when my motion was made and when it was carried by a vote of the committee.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and pending that motion I move that all further debate on the first section of the pending bill and amendments thereto be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend that by extending the time for debate to one hour, giving the first five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] who was on the floor at the time the debate closed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HALE. It is understood by these gentlemen that it is to be divided up into five-minute speeches.

Mr. CONGER. Yes; under the five-minute rule.

Mr. LAMAR. In view of the evident difficulty we are getting into I will say that I do not wish to prosecute my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All this discussion is unnecessary and out of order.

The House divided on Mr. CONGER's amendment; and there were—ayes 74, noes 129.

Mr. CONGER. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. KASSON. I will move to make it twenty minutes.

Mr. CONGER. I demand the yeas and nays on my proposition.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 137.

So (one-fifth having voted in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOSKINS. In view of the lateness of the session I ask we may compromise this matter by allowing thirty minutes for debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONGER. I prefer to have the yeas and nays on my motion.

The question was taken; and decided in the negative—yeas 67, nays 126, not voting 93; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, George A. Bagley, John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Blair, Bradley, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, White, Whitthorne, Charles G. Williams, James Williams, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, Woodworth, and Yeates—93.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

During the vote,

Mr. CUTLER stated that his colleague, Mr. HAMILTON, was absent on account of illness.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, stated that his colleague, Mr. POPPLETON, was absent by leave of the House.

Mr. COCHRANE stated that Mr. HUNTON was absent on account of sickness.

Mr. POWELL stated that his colleague, Mr. ROSS, was absent on account of illness.

Mr. HUBBELL stated that he was paired with Mr. DURHAM, of Kentucky, who if present would vote in the negative, while he himself would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, stated that his colleague, Mr. STONE, was absent from the city.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] that when the House again resolves itself into Committee of the Whole all debate on the pending section and amendments be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend that by making the time forty minutes. I ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] to accept that proposition.

Mr. HANCOCK. We made one contract with you already and you would not stand by it.

Mr. RANDALL. The time was fixed by the request of that side of the House and that time has expired.

Mr. CONGER. When was it fixed?

Mr. RANDALL. This morning. The original time suggested by that side was twenty minutes, and the agreement was finally made at their request that there should be thirty minutes. What they asked was acceded to, showing that there has been no disposition to cut off debate.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania cannot deny that there has been a disposition to cut off debate. We have asked an hour, or forty minutes, or thirty minutes, and that is refused with a strong hand.

Mr. RANDALL. This is brought in to excite bad feeling. We want to preserve peace.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman does not want us to discuss particular subjects. That is the trouble. I will modify my amendment and move to strike out ten minutes and insert thirty minutes; and upon that I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 47.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MILLS. I suggest that we compromise on fifteen minutes and give it all to the gentleman from Michigan.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The proposition of the gentleman from Texas is not in order. It can only be entertained by unanimous consent.

The question was taken on Mr. CONGER's amendment, and there were—yeas 73, nays 111, not voting 102; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, George A. Bagley, John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Blair, Bradley, William R. Brown, Horatio C. So Mr. CONGER's amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the Texas border bill, and pending that motion I move that all debate upon the first section and amendment thereto be closed in twenty-five minutes, and on that motion I move the previous question.

The question was put on seconding the previous question, and on a division there were ayes 105, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. SAVAGE. I desire to know whether the twenty-five minutes are to be an addition to the time already allowed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time already allowed has expired. This motion is to allow twenty-five minutes for debate upon the commencement of the session of the committee.

Mr. HALE. This is the motion of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. SCHLEICHER,] is it not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is to extend the time twenty-five minutes.

The question was taken on Mr. SCHLEICHER's motion, and on a division there were—ayes 119, noes 30.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. MONROE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 96) to provide for the protection of the Texas frontier on the Lower Rio Grande.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon this bill is now limited under the five-minute rule to twenty-five minutes, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] is entitled to the floor for five minutes.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Chairman, I shall speak as rapidly as I can. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] asked if this was a sporadic case or one typical of the general condition of things South. I answer that there is no community in the South that is not thrilled with horror at such occurrences. Sir, it is a wonder that society does not go to pieces under the operation of governments that allow such lawlessness to stalk abroad in the land unpunished. They are governments which live on violence and disorder, and when they cannot have violence they provoke it in order to use it as an instrument of political power.

A word in answer to the argument of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] Saturday, in all good-temper. The use of the Army never produced any good effect in such cases as this. The troops always get to the scene of the disturbance after the occurrence and too late to prevent it, and as a means of righting personal and private wrongs, as a means of preventing violence to personal security, the Army is slow, cumbersome, is ineffective, and almost useless; and in spite of the efforts of the Army officers to the contrary, whose actions cannot be too highly commended, it is converted into a monstrous engine of political oppression and corrupt political intrigues. That is the only use to which it is put in the South. The gentleman must see how utterly inappropriate the use of the Army is in such cases. A riot like this in the streets of a town or village is not a thing for the Federal Government to intervene about, for it violates no Federal law, it does not conflict with national authority, it has no relation to the exercise of the right of suffrage.

This was a riot like the riots which occurred in the State of Pennsylvania in the mining regions, or in Indiana, where, on the day of the last election, three or four colored men were killed; or like that which occurred the other day in New Jersey, where seven men were killed, two of them put to death by stoning. Why do you not apply the same remedy there? Why confine your Federal intervention to prevent murder and riot to one section alone?

What is the remedy in this case? It is clear. It is the duty of the governor of South Carolina to take prompt and severe measures to have apprehended and punished the men who committed such a crime. He cannot use measures too vigorous or too summary to bring the men who shot down these prisoners in cold blood to a swift retribution. I understood the eloquent and gifted gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARTRIDGE] to promise the co-operation of the governor of Georgia, if the case touches Georgia in any way, to bring these men to condign punishment. Is the governor of South Carolina doing anything in that direction? If he is he will meet my support and praise and that of the good citizens of South Carolina; but if instead of doing that he is rushing to Washington to invoke once more the demon of discord and sectionalism, to drag their material of passion through this Chamber, he will not be doing that which will prevent disorders in that State. I say, sir, if there is lawlessness, it is because these so-called republican governments have been not only corrupt and lawless themselves, but also because they have encouraged it by giving it impunity through their imbecility and cowardice, and often by actually inciting it. I say that wherever, as in the State of Arkansas to-day, the governor has ruled with a firm hand and enforced the law, lawlessness has been crushed out and all citizens, black and white, are alike secure. Governor Garland has in one year put down the spirit of lawlessness in that State, and it is now as peaceable a community as any in the country. I repeat, it is not the fault of the people, whose property interests and business investments and industrial arrangements depend upon peace and order, and are utterly ruined by such disorders, but of governments either too inefficient to put down crime or so much interested in producing that they furnish provocations to it.

Why, sir, the other day Governor Kellogg, of Louisiana, appointed as a tax-collector to a parish in that State—so I read in the press—a man who was a captain of a band of murderers and robbers. If he had sent his police to hunt him down and shoot him like a wolf, him and his marauding band, he would have done his duty. But instead of that he legalizes robbery and theft by making the robber a public officer, and when riots and disturbances grow out of such actions as these he comes here to Washington and calls on this Government to bring about order. Sir, these occurrences are ruinous to the South, they are unnatural and morbific elements, and disappear wherever this kind of men is eliminated from political and social control in the South and the management of affairs falls into the hands of her own people.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, for the first time during this debate the House has heard from a gentleman of the opposition a distinct, direct, and pointed condemnation of this most serious and alarming outrage upon human life, human liberty, and constitutional rights.

Mr. LAMAR. The gentleman is mistaken. I only repeated what my gifted friend from Georgia [Mr. HARTRIDGE] said.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Georgia "deplored" the outrage. I failed to hear him condemn the men who were involved in its commission.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. The gentleman will allow me a word?

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman must excuse me, as my time is so short. Even the gentleman from Mississippi was not able to close his eloquent denunciation of the outrage without impliedly turning the responsibility for these riots and outrages upon the republican element in the South.

Let us come to the point before this House under debate. On the 4th day of July last a militia company was assembled in the streets of Hamburgh, South Carolina, celebrating the anniversary of their national independence and ours. They were lawfully observing it, when two young white men got into a quarrel with them; but the day closed without disaster. On the following day an armed organization from Georgia, where the chief criminals yet remain, invaded the State of South Carolina and committed murderous outrages which are certified in the report of the attorney-general of South Carolina over the signature of Governor Chamberlain, which report I now hold in my hand. The question is, were these militiamen violating the law when they were attacked? Had this militia company the right to assemble and parade on the national holiday? Your Constitution tells you, in the second amendment to it, that—

> A well regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

And yet the gentleman, General Butler, who is commended as a noble exponent of chivalry, (and his personal character may be all that his friends claim,) proposed, as is admitted, that the arms borne by this militia company should be surrendered to unauthorized persons, and to deprive the militia of South Carolina of the right secured to them by the Constitution of the United States. And then from that first proposition to violate a constitutional right they went on to other and more serious violations of constitutional rights and liberties, even to the taking of prisoners who were lawfully in the militia company, and not only that, but disarming them of the arms they had a lawful right to hold. And not only that; "let the angels weep, but let honest men do more than deplore;" let them condemn with all the energy of which human nature is capable; they told these prisoners to run, and as they ran from them they "chivalrously" amused themselves by shooting them down, and even in two instances mutilating their dead bodies!

And when the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. SMALLS,] whose State and district have thus been invaded and outraged, brings the matter to the attention of this House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] calls it bad in morals, bad in motive, and charges that it is brought in here for a bad political purpose. Sir, the democratic party did not always take this position. In 1840 they declared in their national platform:

> That every citizen of every section of the country has a right to demand and insist upon an equality of rights and privileges and to complete and ample protection of person and property from domestic violence or foreign aggression.

They re-enacted that in their platforms until 1864. But when there came to be citizens of another color, citizens who were dependent, ignorant, poor, and needing protection, the democratic party commenced leaving out of their platforms this principle of the right of the citizen to protection in person and in property. I stand here, independent of all party on this question, to say that, be the wronged citizens white men of Texas or black men of South Carolina, this great Republic of 44,000,000 of people owes all its energy and all its power to protect all citizens of this country against outrages upon liberty and life such as have been perpetrated in this case. This is what the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SMALLS] has asserted, as is his right. And I rise here to defend him and the race he represents against being laughed out of this tribunal of the nation and from the presence of the American people when they bring their complaints before them and demand redress and protection in the name of humanity and of constitutional right.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I did not intend to participate further in this debate, and I should not now do so were it not for certain words which have fallen from the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] who has just taken his seat. I desire to state to that gentleman and to to this House, simply as a repetition of what I had the honor to utter in his hearing on Saturday last, that I deplore this occurrence as much as any gentleman upon this floor; that the people of the State of Georgia deplore it, and, as I then said, I now say that the people of Georgia, through their press, are calling for a rigorous and thorough and vigorous investigation of this matter; and they stand pledged, when the truth is elicited, to stamp with their condemnation all who are to blame and to aid in their punishment. Can anything be clearer or plainer than that?

I not only deplore, but I here pledge my constituents, I pledge my State through its official authorities, to aid in the investigation of this matter and to punish those who are guilty. But I desire to wait until we learn who are guilty. I am not prepared now, from what I have heard and what I have read, to give my judgment as to who is guilty or who is innocent. I am not prepared to say upon this floor that the people of Georgia or the people of South Carolina, white or black, are guilty in this transaction. I am not prepared so to say upon the statements of Governor Chamberlain and his attorney-general, and to give a judgment now.

I wait for the evidence that is to be given under oath. I wait for the evidence upon which the governor of South Carolina shall base his official action; and if he sees fit to demand any one from the State of Georgia who has been guilty of this crime, when that demand comes, based upon his official investigation, based upon evidence setting forth the facts, my word for it the authorities of Georgia will respond according to justice and the Constitution.

Why, sir, gentlemen upon the other side of the House do not understand our condition to-day in the South. You seem to think that there is all the time a war of races there between the blacks and the whites. Is it not our interest to live together there in peace? Is not the black race the only race fit to furnish us labor? Must not the white race furnish the capital? Is it not the interest of capital and labor to live in peace and friendship? Why, then, should we provoke these disturbances? Why should we excite these outrages? Why should we seek to overturn and subvert all the means of our prosperity and happiness?

The cupidity of the North, engaging in the African slave trade, put this race in our midst as slaves. The power of the North has left them to us as freemen. There they must live; with them we must live; and unless the two races live in accord and harmony there is no future of happiness or prosperity for us. More than that, there is something in the hearts of southern people. We are not savages. There is some feeling on our part toward this race among whom we were born and reared, and with whom we daily live. There is scarcely one of us upon this floor from that section who can look back to the days of his infancy or childhood without seeing something to bring up pleasant and loved memories in connection with this race. For my part, were I to seek to outrage this colored race, there would rise to rebuke me the memory of the nurse of my infant years—the memory of her whose bosom, although dark with the hue of slavery, yet tenderly and softly pillowed my infant head; whose hands, although hardened by toil, yet kindly ministered to my infant wants; whose voice, although untrained and untutored, sweetly sang the lullaby that soothed my infant slumbers. I tell you, gentlemen, there are ties of interest, there are ties of policy, there are ties of memory and the best emotions of the heart to bind the white people of the South to the colored race. [Applause.]

Mr. HALE. Mr. Chairman, this House has presented this morning a remarkable spectacle. This has been no ebullition of sentiment. The subject-matter before us has been nothing of fancy. It has come up from no desire to "shake the bloody shirt." The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. SMALLS,] representing a defrauded and murdered race, has offered a practical amendment to the bill before the House, a perfectly germane amendment to a bill which proposes to regulate the movements of the United States Army. The amendment is in these words:

> Provided, That no troops for the purposes named in this section shall be withdrawn from the State of South Carolina so long as the militia of that State, peacefully assembled, are assaulted, disarmed, taken prisoners, and then massacred in cold blood by lawless bands of men invading that State from the State of Georgia.

The circumstances calling out this amendment are that at least six men, citizens of the United States, equal citizens with you, sir, and me and the leaders upon the other side; men whom we have undertaken to clothe with all the high privileges and rights that spring from our Constitution and the laws; men whom we have made fellow-citizens with us, have been wantonly and foully murdered. And yet the majority of this House upon a deliberate roll-call have refused to allow sixty minutes debate upon this subject of the slaughter of our fellow-citizens. Why, sir, the taking of the life of a single British subject, entitled to the protection of the British flag, has forced entrance to the House of Commons and has there dominated all other subjects for weeks and months. And the French Assembly has again and again debated for days and weeks upon the wrongs of a single French citizen. This tenderness for the life and property of the citizen has been the common pride of every legislative body that has ever been known to the civilized world. And yet the majority of this House decline to give an hour for debate to this overweening, overmastering subject, or inquiry into the causes which led to the murder of these six men and for discussion of the means by which we may prevent like occurrences by the presence of United States armed forces.

The gentleman from Georgia asks why do these things continue to occur? Let me tell him that they will continue just as long as members on that side of the Chamber rise as one man to stamp down the discussion of these atrocities. Let me tell him that so long as the democratic party are led by men in whose neighborhood these scenes are enacted, and who have nothing but good words for the actors in the terrible drama, the raiders and murderers in Georgia and South Carolina will go high-handed on their bloody work, and will, as they believe, be protected in it.

Sir, there is something to do besides invoking sentiment and quoting poetry, as has been done in this case. I charge upon the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] who has a philosophical, speculative mind, and has human sympathies; who sees the wrong and infamy of these things—[here the hammer fell]—I charge upon that gentleman, who has been twice chosen by his constituents a Representative in this House, and has been further indorsed by election to a seat in the Senate—I charge upon him the responsibility, not of the acts themselves, but of putting a stop to these things in his State. I charge upon the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARTRIDGE] that he and his associates must stop them there. [Here the hammer again fell.] I charge upon the leaders of the dominant party in all the Southern States that they must stop these murders. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. LAMAR. I have discharged my responsibility in part by defeating the authors of such disorders in my State.

Mr. MACKEY, of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the subject now under discussion the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has seen fit to denounce South Carolina as one of the worst-governed States in the Union. For this assertion there is no foundation whatever, and instead of South Carolina being badly governed at present she has a better government to-day than she has had for years. I would like to remind the gentleman of this fact, of which he seems to be entirely ignorant, that to-day the only question dividing the democracy of South Carolina is whether or not they shall nominate as their candidate the man who is now the republican governor of our State. If the present government of South Carolina is so bad and corrupt, why are the democrats discussing the propriety of making the head of that government their candidate in the next election? It is an indisputable fact that should Governor Chamberlain again be the nominee of the republican party he will receive hundreds of democratic votes. Many of the leading democrats in the State know this, and hence they argue that it would be inexpedient to nominate a democratic candidate should Chamberlain receive the republican nomination. At one time the State government of South Carolina may have been exceedingly bad, but such is not the present condition of affairs. Taxes have been reduced, assessments lowered, corrupt officials removed, and numerous reforms inaugurated, and the vast improvement in the government is fully recognized by two-thirds of the democratic papers in the State. Quotations from Pike's Prostrate State have no application whatever to the present condition of affairs in our State. This much I have deemed it necessary to say in refutation of the assertion that South Carolina is to-day the worst-governed State in the Union.

In regard to the Hamburgh affair, I think no language too severe can be used in condemnation of it, and I am gratified to see that nearly every democratic paper in the State denounces it. But while the democratic papers of South Carolina denounce this Hamburgh affair as a most brutal outrage it is rather surprising to find northern democrats attempting to palliate and excuse it. Even admitting that South Carolina is badly governed, it is no excuse whatever for such acts of brutality. Really this whole affair is so revolting that I do not believe the people of South Carolina will thank any gentleman here or elsewhere for making any defense of it, for a defense of this affair almost involves an approval of it, and I cannot believe that the people of South Carolina approve of such barbarity.

That particular section of the State where this affair occurred has for years, in my opinion, been a disgrace to the State of South Carolina. Ever since the war that region appears to have been infested with a gang of desperadoes who upon the slightest provocation murder a man with as much coolness as if they were killing a wild boar. Even the murder of white men by white men is not an uncommon occurrence there, and it is looked upon by the rest of the State as the dark corner of South Carolina. The Hamburgh massacre is only the outbreak of a lawless spirit which has prevailed in that section for years. It was this spirit of lawlessness and of terrorism which in 1868 at the presidential election actually prevented any polls being opened in Edgefield County, because no republicans could be found to risk their lives to serve as commissioners of elections. It was the only county in the State in which no election was held.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MACKEY, of South Carolina. I desire to print some extracts.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs to ask one small favor of the committee. It has been the purpose of the Chair, because he found it would be agreeable to the committee, to divide the time with exact equality between the two sides of the House in the debate on this question. He kept the time as carefully as he could, and having been earnestly pressed to give one of the Representives of South Carolina on the left the floor he did so with the belief that he had divided the time with exact equality in view of the fact that the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi had had two five-minute speeches. But gentlemen on my right who claim to have kept the account correctly expressed to the Chair the opinion he has somehow kept from them one five-minute speech. If so, the Chair regrets it.

Mr. RANDALL. The Chair need not be uneasy on that score, for we are all satisfied of his impartiality and fairness.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad to have an additional five minutes allowed to gentlemen on the right. He did the best he could. Is there objection——

Mr. RANDALL. We are satisfied, and we hope now to have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from South Carolina printing with his remarks the extracts he refers to?

Mr. HILL. I do not know what he wants to print.

Mr. COX. Let him print them; and I ask to print a report in answer to the gentleman as to the outrages and bad conduct there in South Carolina.

Mr. KASSON. What date?

Mr. CONGER. I object.

Mr. COX. Then I object to any other printing.

Mr. KASSON. That is all right.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman has printed thousands of pages that way.

Mr. COX. I am not accountable to the gentleman from Michigan for anything I print.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman from South Carolina will be allowed to print the extracts he refers to.

Mr. COX. I object.

Mr. HANCOCK. I wish to move a substitute for the pending amendment.

Mr. CONGER. Have the twenty-five minutes allowed for debate expired?

The CHAIRMAN. There have been five speeches of five minutes each.

Mr. CONGER. But five minutes were given to the gentleman from Mississippi.

The CHAIRMAN. That was part of the twenty-five minutes, as the Chair understood.

Mr. HOGE. I ask to be heard on this question.

Several members objected.

Mr. HOGE. I have no doubt you object.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. COX. I withdraw my objection to the gentleman from South Carolina printing his extracts.

Mr. CONGER. Then I withdraw my objection to the gentleman from New York printing.

Mr. HILL. I wish to say a word to the House. This whole matter is being investigated by a coroner's inquest. It will be judicial, and I do not think anything ought to be printed until then. Wait for the facts. Get the facts and print them, but do not print speeches in advance.

Mr. CONGER. The point I make is that I am under the impression that but twenty minutes have been occupied.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is willing to be governed by the committee.

Mr. CONGER. My impression is that but four gentlemen have spoken under the extension of time.

Mr. EDEN. I object to debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair's impression is that there have been five speeches of five minutes each.

Mr. MACKEY, of South Carolina. I desire to know if there is objection to my request to print certain extracts?

Mr. COX. I make no objection if I am permitted to print a report from a committee of this House.

Mr. HILL. I object to all this printing, and I did so a few moments ago. I object because nothing should be printed upon this subject which is not official. All these prejudgments are improper.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made to the printing, leave is not granted.

Mr. FOSTER. I desired to submit some remarks on the question which has just now been under discussion, but did not find an opportunity to do so in the time allowed for debate. I ask unanimous consent of the House to print some remarks as a part of the debates.

Mr. SHEAKLEY. I object.

Mr. FOSTER. We can speak on the next section just as well as on this. It would be a saving of time to give leave to print.

Mr. HANCOCK. I send to the desk what I offer as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of the troops provided for by this resolution shall be taken from any State or service where troops shall now be stationed, if, in the judgment of the President, the public service requires the continuation of troops in such localities.

Mr. SMALLS rose.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to the gentleman from Texas——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized; but no debate will be allowed. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SMALLS. I rose for the purpose of accepting, if it is in my power to do so, the substitute of the gentleman from Texas for my amendment.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman has a right to do that.

Mr. CONGER. I move an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. COX. I call for the reading of the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it again.

The amendment offered by Mr. HANCOCK was again read.

Mr. COX. I hope that will be voted down.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment. I move that the words "or hereafter" be inserted after the word "now;" so that it will read "where troops may now or hereafter be stationed;" so that it shall be a law which shall have force hereafter as well as at this time.

Mr. HANCOCK. I have no objection to that.

Mr. COX. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to know who is the Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States, the President or Congress?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is obliged to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that debate is not in order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman from Texas has accepted the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan as a part of his own amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it forms part of the amendment. The Clerk will read it as now modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of the troops provided for by this resolution shall be taken from any State or service where troops may now or hereafter be stationed, if, in the judgment of the President, the public service requires the continuation of troops in such localities.

Mr. COX. Would it be in order to offer an amendment to that, to add the words:

Provided, The President be called upon by the constitutional authorities or the governors of the States for that purpose!

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the amendment of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. PAGE. I object.

Mr. COX. I have a right to offer that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will reduce his amendment to writing and send it to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. COX. I will not press this amendment, though it be a constitutional one. I will simply ask that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas be voted down.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. COX. I ask that the amendment be again reported as it now stands with the addition suggested by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

The amendment, as modified, was again read.

The question being taken on Mr. HANCOCK's amendment, as modified, there were—ayes 90, noes 95.

Mr. CONGER called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HANCOCK and Mr. SCHLEICHER were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 86, noes 83.

So the amendment was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the second section of the joint resolution.

Mr. CLYMER. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question being taken on the motion that the committee rise, there were—ayes 71, noes 92.

Mr. COX. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SCHLEICHER and Mr. CLYMER were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 73, noes 83.

So the committee refused to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The clerk will now report the second section of the joint resolution.

The Clerk read the second section, as follows:

SEC. 2. That, in view of the inability of the national government of Mexico to prevent the inroads of lawless parties from Mexican soil into Texas, the President is hereby authorized, whenever, in his judgment, it shall be necessary for the protection of the rights of American citizens on the Texas frontier above described, to order the troops when in close pursuit of the robbers with their booty to cross the Rio Grande, and use such means as they may find necessary for recovering the stolen property and checking the raids, guarding, however, in all cases against any unnecessary injury to peaceable inhabitants of Mexico.

Mr. HOGE. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak upon this question I will say that I had hoped the occasion would not have arisen at this late period, when I as a member of Congress should be called upon to rise in my place and speak upon the subject that now is occupying the attention of the House. I was in hopes that the time had passed in South Carolina when these outrages, these deeds of blood and murder could ever occur again. I was in hopes they were forever passed.

I can remember, Mr. Chairman, that in 1868, during the memorable election in the third congressional district, which I had the honor to represent on this floor, there were nearly three hundred of our citizens that were murdered; so that this outrage that has been perpetrated in Edgefield is nothing new in the history of South Carolina. Over three hundred of my constituents at that time suffered loss of life by adhering to and advocating the principles of the republican party. But while this state of affairs has existed, I do not want to make the statement to-day to this House, nor do I believe it, that even in South Carolina all the white men who belong to the democratic party are in favor of the murderers. I do not believe that. On the contrary, I know there are many men in our State that belong to that party who are as much opposed to these deeds of blood and violence as I am.

But I do state to-day, and I stated from the knowledge that I have gained from experience, after nearly eleven years' residence in South Carolina, and having been intimately connected with the politics of that State during that time—I do state that there is an element in the democratic party either controlled or partly controlled by the men who headed the band of murderers at Hamburgh, a party headed by such men as General M. C. Butler and General Geary, and men of that class, who by their acts and their words, by their counsel to the people who do these deeds of blood, urged them on to commit these great crimes. While perhaps General Butler would be too much of a gentleman or too honorable a man to shoot a negro if he had told him to run off, for the mere pleasure of seeing him fall, yet by his advice these dirty scoundrels and murderers who did that shooting were actuated and encouraged to do these deeds of blood; it was by just such men as Butler and Geary, of Edgefield County. Those are the men who advocated and recommended this outrage upon the colored people; and it was simply because they are members of the republican party, because they cannot control their suffrages and get them to put them in office by their votes. They say to them, "You have to act with the democratic party in South Carolina, or we will make you do it." The edict has gone forth that a black man in South Carolina must either vote the democratic ticket in the future or follow in the footsteps of those who fell at Hamburgh. It has placed my distinguished friend from Mississippi—no, I do not know that he would allow me to call him that—it has placed him in a position to obtain a seat upon this floor, to be elected to the Senate. He says that they have peace in Mississippi and in Arkansas. So they have; but it is the peace of the grave; it is lasting peace to the colored man and to the white man who dares to advocate those great principles of civil and religious liberty that have been advocated by the leaders of our party—principles which came down to us from our forefathers, and which it is our duty to perpetuate and hand down to our children as a sacred heritage.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOGE. I believe that I am entitled to an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. No; the general debate was closed upon this bill some days since.

Mr. HOGE. Then I desire to have printed as a part of my remarks a statement of Governor Chamberlain upon this subject.

Mr. EDEN. I object.

Mr. COX. I rise to oppose the amendment for the simple purpose of saying that it is a sign of good government where the people are contented. The people of South Carolina are not contented.

There is something wrong, but my friend from Ohio—I mean from South Carolina, although I believe he came originally from Ohio——

Mr. HOGE. I did not carpet-bag as you did. I took a knapsack instead of a carpet-bag; that is all.

Mr. COX. I have no doubt that the gentleman had a knapsack and a trunk, too, for he had more to carry than I could possibly get together; but I wished to have read only when about to be interrupted a pertinent extract from a report, No. 481, part 2, of the Forty-third Congress, first session. It is a very good description of that sort of government in South Carolina which has provoked so much misconduct and for which the Federal Government should not be called upon to give a remedy. I ask the Clerk to read the extract I have marked from that report.

Mr. RAINEY. Unless the gentleman will allow me to put in a counter-report, I will not consent to the reading of the extract.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has a right to have it read as a portion of his remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

Their allegations are, in substance as contained in the memorial and as made known to the committee in its presentation, that the entire population of the State consists of 415,814 negroes and persons of color and 289,667 whites; that of all these only about 300,000 are tax-payers, and all the remainder are non-tax-payers and a very large proportion non-property-owners; that the present taxable values or property of the State of all kinds on which taxes can be now levied amount in the aggregate to about the sum of $150,000,000 as against the taxable values of the State before the war of $500,000,000; that the annual levies of taxes now amount to the enormous sum of $2,500,000 levied upon the $150,000,000, as against a little over $400,000 levied upon the $500,000,000 before the war. This astounding exhibit is in no way met or modified by the suggestion of the majority that before the war slaves were estimated in making up the taxable values, or that per capita taxes and taxes upon trades and professions were levied. There stands the present levy of $2,500,000 upon the valuation of $150,000,000, whereas before the war only about $400,000 was levied upon the people and property of $500,000,000 in all the ways and forms suggested. Nor is this increase of the oppressive burden made to appear any the less by the comparison of it with the levies in other States, for the reason that the actual levies in South Carolina are scarcely a moiety of the moneys expended, the debt growing and increasing at an annual rate greater than the taxes assessed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOGE. I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. I renew it. I have a word to say on this subject to gentlemen from the South. It has been my good or bad fortune politically (I do not know which) to join other gentlemen in a report on Louisiana affairs in which the truth was told when it bore heavily on my party friends. I denounced the fraud of the returning board of Louisiana, and joined heartily with Mr. WHEELER in bringing about the compromise that bears his name. I have never failed to denounce my party when I found it in the wrong.

I concede that you have had bad government in some of the Southern States, perhaps in South Carolina, though I doubt it now. Under Governor Chamberlain the government of South Carolina has greatly improved.

If I know myself I have none but the kindest feelings for the people of the South. I long to see the day when peace shall reign throughout your borders, when prosperity shall bless all your undertakings. I long to see the day when we will hear no more of the color line; when every man, be he black or white, shall be in the full, unrestrained possession of every right vouchsafed to him by the Constitution and the laws.

I cannot, however, close my eyes to scenes of horror and bloodshed, of which the Hamburgh massacre is a sample; scenes and outrages that would disgrace the savage.

Talk not to me about your chevaliers, your men of high honor, when they stand by and witness (and, as I believe, encourage) the barbarities of Hamburgh.

Are Mississippi outrages and tactics to be transplanted to South Carolina? Did you sell out the solid vote of the South to Tilden; and do you propose to ratify your bargain by scenes of bloody barbarity, a parallel of which can only be found in the South where you prate so much of honor and high breeding?

Let me tell you, gentlemen of Georgia, that it lies within your power to stop these infernal outrages. Be as active in hunting out the human fiends who crossed the bridge at Augusta, Georgia, to Hamburgh, South Carolina, with artillery to shell out of the citadel the forty negroes that could not be dislodged by hundreds of armed whites from your State and the State of South Carolina. See that they are caught and punished.

Mr. COOK. What evidence is there that a single man went from Georgia?

Mr. CONGER. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. COOK. These men never went from the State of Georgia.

Mr. FOSTER. They did. General Butler admits it.

Mr. COOK. No, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. When you have caught and punished these men then sing to us a panegyric to the vindication of outraged law, instead of talking to us about noble blood. Ay, a nobility that murders in cold blood a captured negro.

If you gentlemen have not the influence to stop these outrages you are not fit to be Representatives in the American Congress. You can do it if you will. When you have tried and have succeeded you will hear the most welcome shout of "Well done, good and faithful servants" that has been heard since the dawn of Christendom. We will fall on your necks and rejoice.

[Laughter on the democratic side of the House and loud cries of "O, no!"]

Mr. COOK. You must not fall on my neck; you have fallen on our property and on our rights as it is, and now you want to fall on our necks. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSTER. We did fall on you, and you remember the fall.

Stretch out your hands in charity to God's poor whom you have with you. Give them to understand by every act of yours that you recognize their complete political rights. Wipe out all distinctions in your laws on account of color.

Let them feel and know that their old masters are their friends, and that they will if need be fight the world in arms to preserve their liberty, notwithstanding it was obtained against the masters' will.

Your professions will not do. These barbarities must cease. If they do not you must expect that the power of the Government will be exerted to its full limit if need be to protect the humblest African in your midst.

Lay not the flattering unction to your souls that because you can give Tilden a united vote he will be elected.

The instrumentalities used to bring about a united South for Tilden will as certainly give the North to Hayes.

We are as tired of southern misrule as you are. This misrule is not a one-sided matter South as well as North. The rascals hunt in pairs, as they do in the North.

When you catch a Belknap you catch a Pendleton with him. [Laughter and cries of "O!" "O!" on the democratic side of the House.] So in the South, the stealings are divided between the parties.

I beseech and implore you, men of the South, to stop these outrages upon the black man, thus restoring confidence in you in the North, and then henceforth we will dwell together in unity, peace, and goodwill. The horrors of the war will be forgotten. Then we will go hand in hand exalting and glorifying the Republic.

Mr. LE MOYNE obtained the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LE MOYNE] commences his remarks, the Chair begs leave to make a single suggestion. That is, that as gentlemen on both sides of the House will have their opportunity to be heard, it would be much better not to interrupt gentlemen who are speaking where they decline to yield; let those gentlemen save their remarks until they themselves have the floor.

Mr. LE MOYNE. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to talk politics, and it may be as well for the committee now to consider some questions of law involved in the resolution now before us. It has already been somewhat discussed, and I have been surprised at some of the propositions of law adduced in its support, and quite surprised at the argument of that eminent lawyer the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER.] He says we are warranted in taking the course authorized by this resolution by the law of nature—by the right of self-preservation. He surely will not contend that our self-preservation, the preservation of our sovereignty, depends upon restoring the property stolen from the citizens of Texas. Not taken by the authority of any State or government, but only by the theft of outlaws. Whatever rights we have by the law of nature we have in common with all other nations. Mexico is as fully entitled to self-preservation as we are, and we have no natural rights which we are not bound to yield to her. Yet by the proposed action you override and destroy her nationality. You assume to send your representatives without her consent into her territory, where she has exclusive jurisdiction, to control and dispose of the rights of property. You do this as a nation. You disregard her rights and treat with contempt all her authority. But the gentleman says it may be considered as an act of "reprisal," and this is not a belligerent act. Reprisals have always been considered sufficient cause for the declaration of war, and I would ask if the gentleman can adduce a single instance within the present century where a reprisal has been made that it has not been followed by war, and we all know that in modern times a reprisal made on the property of persons residing within the limits of the state making it would be certain to produce war. How much more certainly would it do so if it was made by invading the territory of the nation to be punished? But this is not an ordinary reprisal, where the amount of damage is ascertained and compensation for that amount taken. It is a reprisal without limit as to time and without measure as to damage.

The gentleman by his illustration recognizes the rule that the same general principle prevails in inter and intra national law. He says, "If a dog attacks me and by one of my limbs pulls me within the border of my neighbor, have I no right to follow him up and make him desist?" Does he mean that the Mexican thieves are likely to drag our soldiers across the line? I presume not; if they did, our soldiers would hardly be in condition to then either capture them or recover the property. A more apt illustration would be this: If I lose my property, may I break into my neighbor's house by force and seize it or its equivalent in value? Such measures of redress subvert all government and abrogate all law. But what will be the practical operation of this resolution. It provides that the President may when he thinks proper order the military to cross the frontier. It is not intended when the occasion arises to then procure his authority. No; he must deputize his discretion—must deputize it to the commander of every little post along the frontier. When any man loses his cattle, he applies to the officer to get it for him across the border. The officer is then in much the same position as a sheriff executing a writ of replevin, except that the sheriff is armed with a writ issued by a judicial tribunal, which has found that there is sufficient cause for the issuing of the writ. When the sheriff is armed with this writ, he can only execute it within his own bailiwick.

The sheriff has no authority beyond the jurisdiction of the court issuing the writ; but here you would authorize one of your servants to exercise his functions in territory over which you have no control whatever.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The five minutes of the gentleman have expired.

Mr. COCHRANE. I take the floor, and yield my five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LE MOYNE.]

Mr. CLYMER. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. COCHRANE. I hope not till the gentleman from Illinois has concluded his remarks.

Mr. FORT. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LE MOYNE] is entitled to the floor, and cannot be taken from it by a motion that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the impression that that is a sound view of the case. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LE MOYNE] will proceed in the time yielded to him by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COCHRANE.]

Mr. LE MOYNE. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy.

It is said this is not an act of war. Then it is a peaceful function. If you can authorize such an act by a military officer, can you not also confer authority upon a civil or judicial officer? Can you send a judge into Mexico and by the authority you confer can he adjudicate upon property there found? Of course not. Yet, by every principle of either natural or positive law, you can as fully authorize such acts by a judge as by a soldier. But the soldier, upon being applied to by a claimant, enters Mexico, is shown the property claimed; but some one else, being in possession, also claims it. In all civilized communities under such circumstances a judicial tribunal hears the claimants and determines their rights. But here an officer of dragoons is the court; an officer who is acting under the influence and perhaps control of one of the parties; and he disposes in this foreign territory of the rights of property, no matter how large or important the interests concerned are; and from this decision there is no appeal unless it be an appeal to arms, which would be the only appropriate appeal, as the only law governing such a tribunal is the law of brute force. But this officer at once proceeds to execute his own judgment, to remove the property beyond the jurisdiction of the only tribunals having the right to control it.

The condition of Texas is greatly to be deplored, and her citizens have the right to be protected; but modern civilization has some rights, and the decencies of nationality demand some deference.

I do not argue this upon any sentimental grounds or urge the rights of the weak republic, &c., for I have a certain degree of contempt for the so-called rights of the skulking savages that infest our borders; but we cannot afford to do wrong. Our own honor demands that we regard the principles of universal law. Our good name forbids that we trample on the rights of any, however weak, however mean, however despicable the victim.

To pass this resolution would in my opinion be discreditable to this House as a body of lawyers and law-makers. To attempt to carry it into effect would be a cowardly act, disgraceful to a powerful people.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Chairman, in my remarks yesterday I spoke of an amendment which I proposed to offer as a substitute for the second section. I ask now to submit it.

The Clerk read as follows:

That whenever it shall appear to the President that the government of Mexico is unable to prevent the existing lawless invasion of the territory of the United States from Mexico for purposes of plunder or robbery, he shall be, and hereby is, authorized, if in his judgment it becomes necessary, after due notice to the government of Mexico, to order the troops charged with the defense of the territory of the United States, when in close pursuit of such invaders, to cross the Rio Grande and to use such means, not amounting to acts of war, as may be requisite for the recovery of stolen property and to protect the citizens and territory of the United States against the acts of outlaws and robbers.

Mr. BANKS. I do not wish to make any extended remarks on this question, but simply to say that the difficulty in this case is that the invaders of Texas, after committing their robberies, cross the river, stop on the opposite side with their booty, and there defy our troops. This amendment, without involving the country in any danger of war, would authorize the President, if he thought it necessary under the circumstances, after due notice to the government of Mexico, to order the troops to cross the river and recover the stolen property. The proposition is entirely within the rights and powers of this Government, and will meet the whole difficulty without involving the Government in any danger of war.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I move to amend by striking out the last word, and yield my time to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. HOGE.]

Mr. HOGE. Mr. Chairman, in addition to what I have already said, permit me to remark that the opposition to the colored man in the South, leading to these deeds of violence and blood, is the result of the prejudice existing in the minds of the white people there against him as a colored man—the prejudice of race. It is the objection they have and have had to him——

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order. As long as the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SMALLS] providing that troops should not be withdrawn from that State was pending to the first section, all this debate came within the scope of the question before the committee. But since that section has been passed, I do not see what earthly connection there is between the subject which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HOGE] is now debating and the question before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. While the Chair agrees with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] as to the questionable pertinency of much that has been said on all sides of the House, yet this latitude of debate, so far as the Chair knows, has always been allowed upon subjects of this kind, and therefore the Chair permits it to go on.

Mr. HOGE. I find that this state of affairs is the result of that prejudice which has grown out of the institution of slavery, a condition of society in which men have been in the habit of carrying revolvers and bowie-knives and of resorting to the shot-gun to settle their personal difficulties.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I rise to a question of order. I think the Chair is under a misapprehension in one respect. When the House is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and has not under consideration a special order, the latitude of debate is unbridled; but under a rule which I desire the Clerk to refer to, the debate when the House is in Committee of the Whole upon a special order must be confined to the question under consideration and cannot take the latitude which the gentleman from South Carolina is now seeking to take.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is aware of the point which the gentleman makes, and has thought of it often during the debate, but has inferred that it was the wish of the whole committee to allow speakers this latitude. The Chair dislikes——

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. But any gentleman can raise the question of order whenever he thinks proper, and the Chair must then enforce the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it would hardly be fair to make the point now, just before adjourning, against a gentleman who has but a few minutes left.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. That is a matter for the party who makes the point, not for the Chair.

Mr. RANDALL. What is the rule?

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I think five minutes more upon this question will not hurt gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. HOGE. There is this prejudice existing in the minds of the white people where slavery has existed; it is one of the results of that institution. This opposition to the colored man and to his enjoyment of civil and political rights has come under my observation in South Carolina and other States of the Union having a similar state of society from the commencement of reconstruction up to the present day. There is a deep-seated hatred against the black man. There is but one thing he can do to win forgiveness from his old master; that is, to bow down to him, to surrender all his political rights, and agree to vote the democratic ticket.

Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen from Georgia who have spoken on this question and condemned the acts of these men must not forget that some of the men from the soil of Georgia dared to cross the Savannah River and invade the sacred soil of South Carolina without any authority of law, without being called upon by its government, and took part in these murders, assisting in shooting down private citizens of South Carolina. And it is not the first time citizens of Georgia have crossed the Savannah River to invade the rights of black men in South Carolina. They have been doing it ever since 1868 up to the present hour. The edict has gone forth that they intend to carry South Carolina, that they intend to do it peaceably if they can but by violence if necessary, just as Georgia has been carried and is to-day under the control of the democratic party.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HOGE. And Mississippi is in the same condition——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HOGE. Arkansas is in the same condition——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. I rise now for the purpose of ending this political debate.

Mr. PAGE. I make the point of order that the gentleman from New York has spoken on this subject.

Mr. COX. But not on this amendment.

Mr. HOGE. I have had but three minutes of my time, the other two having been taken up by questions and points of order.

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair gave the gentleman his full time, exclusive of interruptions, and the gentleman from New York is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, this debate was given a partisan turn by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] who crossed over the border for the purpose of bringing in matters irrelevant to this Mexican question.

Mr. HOGE. The gentleman will allow me to ask the House for the privilege to print.

Many MEMBERS. "No!" "No!"

Mr. HOGE. I merely wish to print this little statement of facts.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made by many members.

Mr. COX. I hope I will not be interrupted, Mr. Chairman, while you are in the chair.

Mr. HOGE. I only ask that to be done.

Several members objected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has the floor.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from South Carolina should not take up my time.

Mr. HOGE. I ask the gentleman from New York to allow me to ask to print additions to my speech. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. COOK. I object to the printing of any libel upon the State of Georgia from any newspaper.

Mr. COX. Under the domination of the other side for many years when it was in the majority upon this floor, we never had a chance to respond at the end of a debate. I claim the right now at this time to respond.

Mr. GARFIELD. O!

Mr. COX. The gentleman never rises to a moral attitude when he interrupts me. He is always making remarks in his seat which are reported, but he does not give a fair chance for answer by allowing what he says to be heard.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] made a tender speech here to-day from a deliberate piece of writing, and then there was, as advertised for two days, an attack upon me; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] and the gentleman over in that corner [Mr. SMALLS] made it to-day in pursuance of the notice. It was a partisan attack.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] desired to fall on the necks of this side of the House for some good purpose or other. I understand that sort of affection. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSTER rose.

Mr. COX. Wait a moment. It is my chance, and my only chance. I say let him fall on the manly neck and form of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. SCHLEICHER,] who can support him. [Laughter.] Why does he not tender his sympathetic affections to his own party, and fall on the neck of Mr. Bristow, who was discarded because he pursued the guilty? [Laughter.] Why does he not fall on the neck of that other large man from Indiana, Mr. Pratt, who was turned out of the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue?

A MEMBER. Because he was innocent.

Mr. COX. Yes, because he was honest. Or on Mr. Yaryan, or Mr. Dyer for the prosecution of whisky thieves? Or Mr. Jewell, who retired for some reason as yet to the grand jury unknown?

I know, sir, on whose neck he falls. I know where his sympathies are and where his class of men fall, who so eagerly desire to be affectionate toward the South, and to this side, and to help South Carolina out of this trouble. They fall on the neck of McKee. [Laughter.] And McDonald, and Joyce, and Babcock. [Laughter.] And Delano and Avery. [Laughter.] And sometimes they fall so as to embrace a barrel of crooked whisky. [Great laughter.]

Mr. COOK. And why do not they fall on the Freedman's Bank, which robbed the colored people of over $1,000,000?

Mr. COX. The Freedman's Bank I have already referred to. Does the gentleman from Ohio—does that side of the House—think the republican party has not defended the Administration, and thereby defended all these men? Let him read the plank in the Cincinnati republican platform now before me.

When the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] talks of Tweed and others with whom I have no association, I would ask how is he on Yaryan?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. When did you dissolve your association with Tweed?

Mr. COX. How is he on Babcock, on Williams, and the rest of the men that your President keeps in office?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. When did you dissolve your connection with Tweed?

Mr. COX. I never had a connection with him to dissolve. It was the republican Legislature, of which you were the great comforter, that helped Tweed to commit his frauds upon New York City. Everybody knows that I never once gave my voice or vote to help him in my life; and I will submit to no such insinuation.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. You never voted free of Tammany influence since God made you. [Loud cries of "Order!" "Order!" and rappings of the Chairman's gavel.] You had to leave that chair, thank God. [Cries of "Order!" "Order!" and rappings of the gavel, during which Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, made further remarks that were inaudible.]

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] will take his seat.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman from New York intimates that I left that chair at the beck of any man, he states what is untrue. That statement ran for several days in the press, but there was no truth in it. I was elected as a delegate from my district; and no alternate being there, I went to Saint Louis, but at no man's call; and that remark is a falsehood from beginning to end.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COX. Now, I ask to say in conclusion——

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. COX. So you do not want to hear any more!

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] has been recognized.

Mr. TUCKER. I rise to offer the amendment of which I spoke the other day as a substitute for that offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS.] I ask that it may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States be authorized and is hereby requested to present to the government of Mexico a formal statement of the injuries and damages done to the citizens of the United States by the inroads and invasions of the United States by lawless bands from the Mexican states; and, furthermore, to demand that the government of Mexico shall prevent and restrain all such inroads and invasion in future.

If the Mexican government shall not within four months after such formal statement and demand take effective measures to prevent such inroads and invasion, the President of the United States is hereby authorized to use the Army of the United States, or so much thereof as he may deem necessary, to drive out any bands of invaders and to pursue them into the territory of Mexico for the sole purpose of recovering the property taken from citizens or others under the protection of the United States, guarding in all cases against any unnecessary injury to the persons or property of peaceable inhabitants of Mexico.

The President is further requested at once to notify this joint resolution to the Mexican government with an earnest remonstrance against the wrongs done to the people of the United States, and that while forbearing to take any measures but such as are recognized as just and proper between nations at peace, the government of the United States will be constrained, saving the peaceful relations between the two countries, to take such action as is indicated by this joint resolution, unless the Mexican government shall effectually prevent the evils complained of in the future.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having taken the chair, Mr. MONROE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 96) to provide for the protection of the Texas frontier on the Lower Rio Grande, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SHEAKLEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn, leave of absence was, by unanimous consent, granted as follows:

To Mr. FRANKLIN an extension for six days;

To Mr. ROSS, of Pennsylvania, indefinitely on account of sickness;

To Mr. POWELL for four days; and

To Mr. LANDERS, of Connecticut, for two weeks on account of illness.

The motion to adjourn was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and seven minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. HILL: Memorial of Mrs. Mary A. Washington for equitable compensation for property at Hot Springs, Arkansas, of which she has been deprived by a decision of the United States Supreme Court, to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. JENKS: The petition of 100 oil-producers of Pennsylvania, for the prevention of unjust discrimination by common carriers, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. McDILL: The petition of John Barke and 95 citizens of Iowa, for the establishment of a post-route from Red Oak to Sidney, Iowa, to the Committee on the Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 19, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of Thaddeus S. Stewart, of Mount Pleasant, Iowa, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of A. B. Meacham, chairman of the late Modoc peace commission, praying compensation for injuries received in the Modoc Indian massacre while treating with the Modocs under a flag of truce, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 800) relating to the promotion of commodores on the retired list of the Navy, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CRAGIN. The same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 148) in reference to the wreck of the United States monitor Tecumseh, have had it under consideration, and have instructed me to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

I beg to make a brief statement in relation to this resolution. The United States monitor Tecumseh was sunk by a torpedo during the war in Mobile Bay in forty-five feet of water. There were on board about one hundred and twenty-five officers and men. Only eight or ten of them escaped, and it is supposed that about one hundred and twenty men are now entombed in the vessel. It was an iron-clad, and was sealed almost water-tight when it went down. In 1873 the Secretary of the Treasury under authority of law sold this vessel to a man by the name of Slaughter, in Alabama, for $50, and he made certain assignments to other parties. They propose to blow up this vessel, in order to raise the iron, &c., and get at the safe and find what money there is in it, and what other property. There was a protest made against this proceeding as being an outrage upon the remains of the brave officers and men who are now entombed in this vessel. The owners applied to Congress for authority to be given the Secretary of the Navy to employ them to remove these bodies and to inter them at the nearest national cemetery, a reasonable price being paid therefor. The House committee reported a joint resolution, which passed the House, forbidding the owners, the parties who bought this vessel from the Secretary of the Treasury, from blowing it up or disturbing it unless they first remove the bodies; and, if they refused to do that, to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to them the purchase-money with interest from the day it was paid. As this involves a legal question, the rights of the owners to the vessel, &c., after its purchase, the committee thought best to report the resolution back and ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 946) for the relief of Gibbes & Co., of Charleston, South Carolina, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 221) to refund to the State of North Carolina certain moneys therein named, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WRIGHT. The same committee, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 3273) for the relief of Mrs. Ellen J. Brosman upon what is claimed to be additional evidence, direct me to report it adversely. We find that the evidence which has been committed to us in this case is substantially what we had before, and we again recommend the indefinite postponement of the bill.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WRIGHT. A few days since the Committee on Claims reported upon the petition of James Tebault and others, praying additional compensation as laborers in the Treasury Department, recommending the rejection of the claim and the indefinite postponement of the bill (S. No. 820) for the relief of James Tebault and others. It was recommitted upon what was claimed and stated to be additional evidence. We have considered that additional evidence, adhere to the former report, and again recommend that the claim be rejected.

The report was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to say a word on this subject. I know that it is impossible for Senators, when appealed to to move for the recommittal of a case of this kind, to examine the testimony to see whether there is or is not additional evidence such as would justify a recommittal. It imposes very great additional labor upon us to have these cases recommitted from time to time and when we come to examine them find substantially the same evidence. Of course we cannot resist these motions; but I wish to say now that when a case shall have passed the time under the rule for a motion to reconsider to be made I shall feel it to be my duty to resist such motion, unless I can have the assurance of the Senator making the motion that he has examined the case and is satisfied that there is additional evidence of some weight.

H. P. JONES & CO.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1427) for the relief of H. P. Jones & Co., to report it without amendment and recommend its favorable consideration. I ask that the bill may be now considered. It is a very small amount.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to H. P. Jones, P. B. Ruffin, and James F. Cain, trading as H. P. Jones & Co., the sum of $200.10, being the amount of drawback of tax due to them on certain tobacco exported by them.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. KELLY. If there is no further morning business, I ask——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not called all the orders. The introduction of bills is next in order.

Mr. HARVEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 996) for the relief of George W. Smith; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 997) for the relief of William Morrison; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 998) for the pardon of deserters from the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to move that the bill (S. No. 530) to re-imburse purchasers at direct-tax sales in Arkansas declared illegal by United States courts in consequence of a defective board of commissioners be recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1972) to authorize the construction of an inclosure around the United States penitentiary at Boisé City, in the Territory of Idaho; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the resolution of the Senate authorizing the special committees appointed by each House to investigate the subject of the immigration of Chinese to this country to act as a joint committee.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 842) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to remove the jail on Judiciary Square to grounds near to the Washington asylum for the use of the District, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker pro tempore of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 153) to correct an error in the enrollment of the post-office appropriation act; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If there is no other morning business, before the Senator from Oregon goes on, as I have to leave the Chamber, there is a bill which will create no discussion that I hope the Senate will take up. I wish the Senate to consider the bill (S. No. 938) for the relief of George T. Olmsted, jr. It will lead to no discussion.

Mr. KELLY. I cannot give way, because two or three Senators have asked the same thing. If there is no further morning business I insist upon my bill being considered.

Mr. INGALLS. I gave notice yesterday that during the morning hour to-day I should ask the Senate to consider House bill No. 3625, which is a matter of very great importance to a large number of people in my State, and which has been pending for a considerable time. I trust the Senate will allow me to get that bill up.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think that an important bill, and I will help the Senator from Kansas to get it up if he will first help me to pass the bill for the relief of Mr. Olmsted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asked for the consideration of a bill upon the conclusion of morning business. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. KELLY. No; I beg to be excused for the present.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I rise to morning business if the Senator from Oregon objects.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island rises to morning business, which he will present.

ROCHAMBEAU PAPERS.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I offer a resolution of inquiry, and I desire, in a few words, to state its purport. Among the distinguished foreigners drawn to Philadelphia by the exposition was the Marquis de Rochambeau, grandson of the illustrious captain who led the forces of our generous allies in the war of Independence, and who with Washington received the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. The marquis held, and I suppose still holds, the commission of the French government in connection with the Exposition. A part of the purpose which he had in visiting this country, with which his name is so closely and gratefully associated, and to which his hereditary attachment has been increased by study and by intelligent observation, was to visit this capital, in order to better witness the workings of our Government and to make the acquaintance of our public men. An unexpected summons from home called him away suddenly, and left this part of his plan unfulfilled.

The Marquis de Rochambeau has inherited the papers of his grandfather. Among them are many of very great value connected with his service in America, including reports of the état major, memoranda, letters, maps, charts, plans of battles, of marches, and of military operations, which have never been made public. A gentleman connected with our legation in Paris, a man of culture and scholarship, well known to my friend from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] and who is himself addicted to historical studies, has written to me on the subject. After speaking of the marquis as an amiable and accomplished gentleman, bearing a great name with undiminished honor, he says:

> I have been more especially interested in his acquaintance as I found that he possessed among his family papers a perfect treasure of untouched historical material concerning our revolutionary war. You are aware that in the records of that period which have been preserved there is a comparative paucity of staff reports giving minutiæ and technical data, which form the basis of accurate military history. It is precisely in this kind of material that the Rochambeau papers are richest. I have repeatedly talked with the marquis since I have seen these archives of the fitness of allowing them to be printed and the originals preserved by our Government. He is animated by a very liberal spirit and a just pride in his illustrious grandfather, and it will not be difficult to make some arrangement which will place the documents within the reach of all historical students.

Mr. MORTON. By whom is the letter signed?

Mr. ANTHONY. By Mr. Hitt.

I also have a letter from the marquis, in which he confirms his desire to place these papers at the disposition of our Government, either for publication, under his own editorial supervision, or to be deposited among the public archives. I am sure I need not, in this place and in this centennial year, urge the importance of anything which illustrates the military history of the Revolution, especially documents so precious and authentic as these; and with a view of obtaining further information on the subject I offer the following resolution:

> Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency and practicability of obatining the papers of the Count de Rochambeau relating to the war of Independence and now in the possession of his grandson, the Marquis de Rochambeau.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

GEORGE T. OLMSTED, JR.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask the permission of the Senator from Oregon to enable me to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 938.

Mr. INGALLS. I beg the Senator's pardon. Having given notice yesterday that to-day, at the expiration of the morning business, I should ask the Senate to take up a bill, it really seems to me that courtesy to me would allow that matter to be proceeded with.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If my friend will permit me, I will state that I called up this bill also yesterday morning.

Mr. KELLY. And I have called up my bill two or three times.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Oregon certainly has no precedence by way of unfinished business in the morning hour. As when I reported this bill yesterday I gave notice, and no objection was made, it seems to me, considering the importance of the bill, I certainly ought to be entitled to have it considered by the Senate now.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The bill which I wish to get up would have been passed by the Senate before this time if the Senator had not intervened.

Mr. KELLY. I will yield to the Senator from New Jersey if the bill is to take but a minute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon was recognized, and he now yields to the Senator from New Jersey. The Senator from Kansas will be recognized after the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 938) for the relief of George T. Olmsted, jr.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The House has already passed this same bill as House bill No. 3855. I move to substitute it for the Senate bill. Both of them have the unanimous report of the Military Committee of each House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is suggested to me that it will require the bill to go to the House again if we adopt a substitute, and therefore I move that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the consideration of the House bill, as their report in the shape of the Senate bill is printed, and that the vote be taken on the House bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection; and the bill (H. R. No. 3855) for the relief of George T. Olmsted, Jr., is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

It authorizes the President to re-appoint George T. Olmsted, jr., late a captain of the Second Regiment of Artillery, United States Army, a captain in the Army, and to duly commission him as the same. This is not to be so construed as to authorize Olmsted to receive any pay or allowances for any time that he has not been in the actual service of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN KLAMATH INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. KELLY. Twice House bill No. 1316 has been under consideration, and I now move that the Senate take it up and dispose of it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1316) to adjust the claims of the owners of lands within the limits of the Klamath Indian reservation in the State of Oregon, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. SHERMAN in line 12, after the word "mineral," to insert "and which are then subject to entry under the homestead or pre-emption laws of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move to amend the bill by striking out, commencing in line 19, the following words:

And likewise any indemnity lands within the limits of said reservation that have been selected and approved to the State of Oregon under the provisions of said act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. Let the bill be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. This appears to be a bill in which my colleague took some interest and was proposing some amendments. I understand he is absent on a committee of conference. I submit to the Senator from Oregon that it is hardly fair to take up this bill in his absence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Vermont that there was an amendment pending which the Chair was not aware of, and it will now put to the Senate, proposed by the Senator's colleague, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] The Secretary will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "act," in line 31, the amendment is to insert "or any act of Congress amendatory or supplemental thereto."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not know whether that is all the amendment my colleague proposed or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are amendments of the committee not yet acted on which the Secretary will report.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the fifth line of the bill the Committee on Public Lands propose to insert after the word "scrip" the words "for quantities of land not less than one section;" and in line 12 to strike out the words "the subdivision" and insert the words "one section."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the bill read as it stands now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read as it now stands.

The CHIEF CLERK. As amended, the bill reads:

That the Commissioner of the General Land Office be, and he is hereby, authorized, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to issue scrip for quantities of land not less than one section to the legal owners of the land granted to the State of Oregon by act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, to aid in the construction of a wagon-road from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of the State, authorizing them to select and locate, of the unoccupied and unappropriated public lands of the United States, not mineral, and which are then subject to entry under the homestead or pre-emption laws of the United States, and in tracts not less than one section, as provided for in the United States lands laws, and if unsurveyed when taken, then to conform when surveyed to the general system of the United States land surveys, a quantity of land equal in amount to the lands within the limits of said grant embraced in the Klamath Indian reservation designated and set apart by the Commissioner of the General Land Office as lands in place, the quantity of said lands to be ascertained by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. And the said Commissioner shall issue patents for the lands so selected: Provided, That no scrip nor patents shall issue as hereinbefore provided until the owners of the lands embraced in said reservation shall execute and deliver to the Commissioner of the General Land Office a deed conveying to the United States all their right, title, and interest to the same: Provided further, That no scrip issued in pursuance of the provisions of this act, or any act of Congress amendatory or supplemental thereto, shall be located upon other than the public lands lying within the said State of Oregon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I did not expect this matter to come up this morning, and my excuse for not being here is that I was obeying the order of the Senate in attending a conference committee, but it is up and we must consider it, as little ready as we may be.

This grant to the State of Oregon is from Eugene City, by way of a certain pass in the mountains near Diamond Peak, to the eastern boundary of the State, and was for a military wagon-road. Here is the Klamath Indian reservation in green, [exhibiting a map,] and this land grant runs with a broad red color sweeping across this Diamond Peak pass, then turning south and taking a swoop diagonally across the reservation so as evidently to take all the best part of it, then bending to the east and south again clear to the southern border of the State, and then northeast up to the Territory of Idaho. Undoubtedly I am bound to suppose that the topographical necessities were such as to make it necessary to sweep in that particular way and to pop down upon that identical reservation and, as they say out West, scoop it. Judging from the peculiarity that as soon as they got through the mountains they took a sudden turn to the south so as to cross that reservation, I take it there must have been some high topographical necessity for it; and I want to have it borne in mind, as the fact is as shown by the dates of the statutes and of this Indian treaty, that when this road actually started, before the legislative grant took effect, the reservation had been already set out by the treaty and the Indians were being gathered upon it; so that when the road was built there it was built to the knowledge of the builders across the reservation. The reservation did not cover the road, but the road covered the reservation.

Now I propose to show to the Senate, if I can have its attention, for I have examined the subject a little more carefully than I did when I had the honor to address the Senate the other day, that the State of Oregon and its grantees never acquired any title at all to the lands within the reservation under that grant. I stated the other day that that was my impression. A careful examination of the subject since has convinced me that my impression was perfectly correct, and that the people who are now making this claim for 100,000 acres of land to be taken somewhere else in the State of Oregon never had any rights to lands in this reservation at all and have not any now. They are neither the legal nor the equitable owners of a foot of that land.

The grant was made, as will be found in volume 13, page 355, of the Statutes at Large, on the 2d of July, 1864—

That there be, and hereby is, granted to the State of Oregon, to aid in the construction of a military wagon-road from Eugene City, by way of Middle Fork of Willamette River, and the most feasible pass in Cascade range of mountains, near Diamond Peak, to the eastern boundary of the State, alternate sections of public lands, designated by odd numbers, for three sections in width on each side of said road.

Alternate sections of public lands on a line to be laid down going from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of the State passing near Diamond Peak. I stated the other day—and that is perfectly well settled law, every body knows it and I never heard it disputed—that a grant of that kind gave nobody any interest in any particular land until the grant should be located. If it were otherwise, no lands in Oregon after this act could be sold to a pre-emptioner, taken up as a homestead, or in any other way disposed of, because they were all subject to this mortgage and the settler might be turned out of his possession by the subsequent location of the road over his section of land. That is not the law. These floating grants, I repeat, the law is perfectly well settled, give no interest in any particular foot of territory at all until the location is made and the line defined by marks upon the earth and notice given to the proper land officer.

Then all the lands that at that time, at the time of the location, are the property of the United States and within the description of the statute are those to which the grant attaches and no others; so that, in this vast distance of four hundred and sixty-one miles from Eugene City to the boundary of Idaho, every settler who between the 2d of July, 1864, and the time when in 1867 or in 1868 or whenever it was this road began to be located and built had taken up his little homestead or his pre-emption claim or his bounty-land claim or whatever it might be, when the road came along within three miles of his section, was not to be turned out of it. He had acquired a title to his section before the location of the line, and the grantees had no right ever to turn him out, and nobody ever thought they had such a right, and so far as I know they never attempted it. Certainly if they did attempt it, they attempted to violate the law.

So then, Mr. President, this shows, what as I have said the law clearly is, that whatever rights were taken under this grant were acquired from foot to foot and yard to yard and mile to mile according as the road was located and the proper returns made to the Land Office of the United States, so that it could be known where the float, as it is called, was to lie down, and when it did lie down it only attached to the lands that at that time, not at the date of the passage of the law, belonged to the United States and were not in any respect affected by the private claims and private ownership.

That being the state of the case, this treaty was made in October, 1864; made before the State of Oregon had accepted this land grant at all, before she had transferred it to the Oregon Military Road Company; and in that treaty this reservation was made and described by metes and bounds, with territorial limits perfectly notorious to the State of Oregon and everybody there, for it was in her interest that the reservation was established and the Indians were gathered in from the rest of her territory to live there. At that time, I say, this location of this Indian reservation was made, and at a time, as I repeat, when the State of Oregon had not acquired a title to a single section of this land that is claimed, or any other under the grant made by the act of 1864.

Now the question is simply whether the right of the Indians under this treaty is to be overborne and we are to buy off these claimants, or whether the claimants or those from whom they claim under this grant were entitled to any alternate section within the Klamath reservation. I am perfectly convinced, as I have said, that they are not entitled to any at all, because at the date of the grant and at the date of its location this Indian reservation was not the public land of the United States the subject of grant to a railroad company. One authority for that—many might be cited—the last one decided this very winter, is the case of Newhall vs. Sanger. That arose in the State of California. In that case there was a grant, I believe not merely of public land, as this act expressed it, but a grant of the lands of the United States to the Western Pacific Railway Company within certain limits, twenty miles, I believe, of the line of the road, of all lands of the United States by alternate sections. On one part of this road, after it was located and laid down, it was found that there was then existing a claim under an old Mexican grant. It turned out within two weeks after the location of the road, by a decision of the Supreme Court, that that Mexican claim was absolutely groundless and that the claimant to that piece of land thus within the twenty-mile limit of the railway had no title to it whatever, and that under the treaty of the United States with Mexico of 1848 the land was public property of the United States. As soon as this decision was made settlers under pre-emption and homestead and other rights, in accordance with law—it does not make any difference how they got in, but it was under the statutes as to public lands—went and took up some of the sections on this old Mexican claim. The railway company insisted that both within the spirit and letter of the law, inasmuch as it turned out that there was not even a claim to this land on the part of anybody when the statute was passed giving it to the company, nor a just claim on the part of anybody when they located their line of road, they were entitled to it and not the pre-emptors who went there after their road was located and after it had been ascertained that there never had been any valid claim to this land, but that it had always belonged to the United States.

I had the honor to argue that cause in the Supreme Court, and I expended what little resources of ingenuity I possessed to convince the court that the claim of the railway was right and that these people who had interpolated themselves by pre-emptions and homestead claims, &c., after the location of the road and after it had been ascertained that there was no claim upon the ground when the road was located at all, were not entitled to set up their pretensions against this grant of Congress to the railway company. But unhappily for me, or rather for my client—it only made me unhappy in the moral sense of being defeated in a cause that I argued—the Supreme Court held exactly the reverse, and said this:

> The act of July 1, 1862, (12 Statutes, page 492,) grants to certain railroad companies, of which the Western Pacific by subsequent legislation became one, every alternate section of public land, designated by odd numbers, within ten miles of each side of their respective roads, not sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of by the United States, and to which a homestead or pre-emption claim may not have attached at the time the line of the road is definitely fixed. It requires that within a prescribed time a map designating the general route of each road shall be filed in the Department of the Interior, and that the Secretary thereof shall then cause the lands within a certain distance from such route to be withdrawn from pre-emption, private entry, and sale. The precise date of the location of the Western Pacific road is not stated in the record, but the inference is that it took place between the first day of the December term (1864) of this court and the 13th day of February, 1865.
> * * * * * * *
>
> It is a conceded fact that the lands embraced by it fall within the limits of the railroad grant, which were enlarged by the amendatory act of 1864.
>
>
> There can be no question that by the withdrawal in question the grant took effect upon such odd-numbered sections of public lands within the prescribed limits as were not excluded from its operation, and the question arises whether lands within the boundaries of an alleged Mexican or Spanish grant, which was then sub judice, are public lands within the meaning of the act of Congress under which the patent, whereon the appellee's title rests, was issued to the railroad company.
> The subject of grants of land to aid in constructing works of internal improvement was fully considered at the present term in Leavenworth, Lawrence, and Galveston Railroad Company vs. The United States.

Another decision at the same term which lays down with more amplification the same doctrine I have already stated, as to when grants take effect and what are "public lands" within the sense of the acts of Congress making land grants to corporations:

> We held that they attached only to so much of our national domain as might be sold or otherwise disposed of, and that they did not embrace tracts reserved by competent authority for any purpose or in any manner, although no exception of them was made in the grants themselves. Our decision confined a grant of every alternate section of land to such whereto the complete title was absolutely vested in the United States.

Now, mark what the court say next, which covers this subject completely:

> The words "public lands" are habitually used in our legislation to describe such as are subject to sale or other disposal under general laws. That they were so employed in this instance is evident from the fact that to them alone could, on the location of the road, the order withdrawing lands from pre-emption, private entry, and sale apply.

If it be the law, as it certainly is settled to be, that the words "public lands" are habitually used in our legislation to describe such as are subject to sale or other disposal under general laws, then it seems to me that it is perfectly manifest that the land covered by this Klamath reservation does not fall within the grant made to the State of Oregon, but exactly the reverse. Even at the date of the act of 1864, to go no further down, the Indian title, which was the only question in the Lawrence, Leavenworth, and Galveston case, had not been extinguished; and in no sense under the statutes of the United States were these lands occupied by the Indians that were afterward diminished to the reservation kept for them and the rest of them in the same treaty granted to the United States, subject to the general land laws of the United States; they were not subject to entry; they were not subject to pre-emption; they were not subject to homestead; they were not subject to any of the land laws of the United States. They were within its political jurisdiction and subject to its political control; but as property of the United States it was property not yet reduced to possession and not yet subject to grant, because the Indian title had not been extinguished; and although it is the law that the Indian title to lands in States or in Territories held by their original right is not a title in fee which they can dispose of by grant or conveyance, yet it is a title which gives them exclusive right of occupancy forever until they cede it away or until by conquest, as in the case of a war with a foreign nation, we acquire a complete jurisdiction over it. That was the state of it at that time.

The law, therefore, Mr. President, as it appears to me and as it has appeared to the Supreme Court in its decisions now brought down to this last crystallized statement as to what is meant by the term "public lands" in these land grants, was that the grantees of this right to build this wagon-road under the State of Oregon and the grant to the State of Oregon never attached to the land covered by the Klamath reservation. More than all that, as I have said, the treaty by which these lands were kept by the Indians and all the rest of their lands in that part of Oregon were ceded to the United States was made in October, 1864, and before the State of Oregon had accepted this grant at all, and before a single step had been taken for the construction of this road.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. Without reference to the merits of this controversy at all, one way or the other, I desire to inquire of the Senator from Vermont why it is that in his judgment the rights of this company did not attach to these lands; whether it was because the Indian title had not been extinguished, or because some other rights had attached by virtue of the treaty?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will answer my friend on both grounds.

Mr. MITCHELL. I inquire for my own personal information.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, on both grounds. According to these late decisions of the Supreme Court, in two cases where as I have said I presented all the reasons I could think of against that construction, the term "public lands" in all land grants to a corporation or to a State covers those lands that have been so dealt with before as to be subject to sale or other disposal under the general laws of the United States, and my friend knows just as well as I do that under the general laws Indian lands that have been brought within the control of the United States and the Indian title not extinguished are not yet subject to the general laws of the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now I desire to ask the Senator from Vermont if he does not know that the Indian title has never been extinguished to any of the public lands in Oregon, except a very small proportion indeed, upon which to-day there are hundreds of settlers owning the land in fee and having title from the occupants in possession?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know how that is, and I do not care how it is. I am talking about what the law is. If the people of Oregon have overrun all the Indians, Congress so far as I know is not responsible for it in respect to this particular question; and whether they are right or are wrong in respect to the possessions they have acquired has nothing to do with what is the law. The Supreme Court have determined what the law is. Of course that does not bind Congress in the exercise of its discretion. If we think the Supreme Court have made a mistake in construing a statute of the United States, we can correct that mistake by changing the statutes and making them something else; but I am speaking about what this bill says that we are to pay these people for one hundred thousand acres of land of which they have the title and we want to buy it in order to preserve to the Indians all that we agreed they should have by the treaty.

Now, sir, I come to the treaty, Mr. President. The treaty was not ratified until three or four years afterward, and I do not know but that meantime—I have forgotten how the fact is if I ever knew—the construction of this road had begun, and I do not know but that it had reached this reservation, though I think not. I do not know how that is.

Mr. KELLY. It was completed on the 17th of February, 1870.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The report does not say whether it was completed in conformity with the statutes or not, and I have had a letter from an Oregonian, who appears to be respectable and who writes a good hand and writes English, in which he rather more than insinuates that the building of this road was rather a catamount performance, and that as a "first-class road in every respect," as the statutes about the Pacific railroad said, it would hardly have passed muster. But I do not know how that is. The committee must inquire.

Now, the question is, next as to the effect of this treaty. The treaty, as I have said, was made in October, 1864, and before any claim on the part of the State of Oregon, if one could have existed to these lands, had arisen. It was not, as my friend says, ratified until afterward. Take that to be so, what is the settled principle of public law upon a question of that kind? It is that a treaty when ratified and confirmed takes effect in respect of the rights that the parties under it are to obtain or retain, from the date of its negotiation. Therefore, whatever right these Indians were to acquire in this territory they took as the title stood at the time of the date of the treaty, even if it had not been ratified until this time, and the parties who built their road across it built it at their peril, knowing what the law was, and that if the treaty was ratified their title to the alternate sections of land would never exist. We can all see that there is a reason for that. Suppose the case of a treaty with a foreign nation, by which one nation is to acquire from the other an extent of territory. The negotiation is made on the 1st of January, 1876, I will say, and the treaty is ratified on the 1st of July, 1876. Meantime the granting party, who is granting to the other territory, goes and makes land grants all over that territory, grants away the estate that by the treaty it is to grant to the other power. Would it be tolerated among civilized nations for a single moment, that, after a treaty is negotiated and while it is awaiting ratification between the two powers according to the form of their respective governments, either power can go on and change the nature of the subject and dispose of the land that it has engaged to convey away by treaty to somebody else? Of course not. The injustice of it would be monstrous, and it would not be tolerated, and never was tolerated, for a single moment. That question arose very early in this Government, and it was not a new one in public law.

Under the treaty by which we acquired from Spain certain lands and from France certain other lands coming from Spain through France, the King of France, after the date of his treaty releasing his rights in Florida or Alabama or wherever it was down there, and before the treaty took effect by its ratification, made grants to his subjects just as kings did of grants all along our coast at first; and the question arose in the Supreme Court afterward whether those people who took title by grants from the King of France between the time of negotiation of the treaty and the time of its ratification had a good title, or whether the title came to the United States by the treaty and to the claimants under its grants. The Supreme Court unanimously decided, what was a perfectly well-settled principle of public law, that a French grant after the negotiation of the treaty and before its ratification was absolutely null and void; that the treaty took effect from the date of negotiation, no matter how long after it was ratified, and that a treaty being a public act, it was notice to everybody, and the party who took his grant under the King of France got no title at all.

Mr. MITCHELL. Suppose the treaty by its terms was to take effect from the date of its ratification?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose, my friend from Oregon asks, it was by its terms to take effect from the date of its ratification. He puts the case of a grant made by one party to another to take effect from the date of its ratification, and meantime the granting party going on and disposing of the land to somebody else. The law would be exactly the same there, because the point is that where land is the subject of a grant the grant begins at the date of the commencement of the enterprise, and that it is bad faith, public bad faith, and absolutely illegal for the granting party to undertake meantime to make any other disposition of it. Therefore when such a treaty says it shall take effect from its ratification, it cannot be construed to mean that if meantime the granting party has sold all the land that he agreed to convey, the treaty then taking effect from its ratification, nothing would be conveyed.

Mr. MITCHELL. In that case, would it not simply go to the question of bad faith on the part of the granting power?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not by any means; it would go to the question of title. The effect of a phrase in a treaty that it shall take effect from its ratification is not to unfix or to defeat any rights that the treaty proposes to convey, but it is to say at what time active obligations on the part of either party in respect of executory duties they are to perform are to begin; and if in a treaty with Great Britain we were to acquire the province of Canada and it was to take effect from the date of its ratification, and after its negotiation Great Britain conveyed all the public lands she had in that country to a private corporation, it would not do to say that the treaty taking effect from the date of ratification, we got no title to the land. That would be killing the horse after you had engaged to sell him, although the sale would not be consummated and take effect until he was delivered. That would not do, Mr. President. The consequence is——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to say one word more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. KELLY. I hope this bill will be disposed of.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not want to displace the regular order. I did not suppose this matter would come up in the morning hour and was not at all prepared to make any very consecutive remarks about it; in fact I was not present when it came up.

Mr. SHERMAN. We had better go on with the regular order.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not object to the debate continuing, the right to object at any time in the future being reserved to any member of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to continuing this subject, subject to a call for the regular order?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better go on with the regular order.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask leave to make a report from the committee of conference on the Army appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the report will be received.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3717) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 15, 16, 18, 19, 27, 28, 33, and 35.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 1, 2, 6, 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 14, 17, 20, 24, 29, 31, 36, and 37, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment striking out "five" and inserting "three;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment striking out "one hundred and five" and inserting "ninety;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

Strike out all of said amendment after the word "and," in line 6, and insert in lieu of the words stricken out the following: "As provided by law, with a force of enlisted men not exceeding four hundred, after present terms of enlistment have expired;" and the Senate agree to the same.

SEC. 4. That the whole subject-matter of reform and re-organization of the Army of the United States shall be referred to the commission hereinafter provided for, who shall carefully and thoroughly examine into the matter with reference to the demands of the public service, as to the number and pay of men and officers and the proportion of the several arms, and also as to the rank, pay, and duties of the several staff corps, and whether any and what reductions can be made either in the line or staff, in numbers or in pay, by consolidation or otherwise, consistently with the public service, having in view a just and reasonable economy in the expenditure of public money, the actual necessities of the military service, and the capacity for rapid and effective increase in time of actual war.

The commission hereby created shall consist of two members of the Senate and two members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the presiding officers of each House respectively, of the Secretary of War and two officers of the Army, one from the line and one from the staff corps, to be selected by the President with special reference to their knowledge of the organization and experience in service.

Such commission shall assemble as soon as practicable and proceed to the consideration of the matters with which they are charged, and make report to Congress by the first day of the next session through the President of the United States with all the evidence, record or otherwise, which they shall have received and considered.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. D. C. ATKINS,
H. B. BANNING,
S. A. HURLBUT,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope the Senator who makes this report will acquaint us with its generalities at least.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, it will be observed from the reading of section 4, which will be the last section in the bill, that all matters relating to the organization of the Army are to be submitted to a commission, consisting of two members of the Senate, two of the House, the Secretary of War, and two Army officers. The House recedes from all its amendments relating to the reduction, re-organization, and pay of the Army. The remaining provisions in the bill have reference of course to details of appropriations. The House bill as it originally came to the Senate appropriated $24,350,259.06. That appropriation was increased by the Senate $3,211,000 in round numbers. The conference reduced the amendments of the Senate $1,492,193.60, leaving the total of the bill, as it will be if passed, $26,069,167.80 or $1,864,000 less than the Army appropriation bill of last year.

If there are any other explanations called for I can give them, but I believe I have given the substance of the changes made.

The report was concurred in.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Legislative and executive business will now be suspended and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate then proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

During the trial the proceedings were temporarily suspended and the Senate resumed its

LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes its legislative session.

WM. WINDOM,
O. P. MORTON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
SAM. J. RANDALL,
WM. S. HOLMAN,
EUGENE HALE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WINDOM. It may perhaps be proper that I should make a brief explanation of the more important points of agreement made by the conference.

The total reductions from the bill as it passed the Senate and went to the conference committee are $4,156,155.29.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator has them before him, I beg him to give the total appropriation proposed by the House, the total proposed by the Senate, and the amount appropriated by the bill if he can do so without inconvenience.

Mr. WINDOM. The total additions made to the bill as it left the Senate are $29,361.39, which chiefly consist of restoring items that the Senate had stricken out of the House bill. The net reduction from the Senate amendments is $4,126,793.90. The net additions made to the bill by the Senate were $5,099,840.40. Deduct the net reductions made in conference, $4,126,793.90, and it leaves the amount added to the House bill as reported from the conference $973,046.50. The total of the bill as agreed to by the conference is $16,229,779.82.

Mr. CONKLING. That is what the bill now appropriates?

Mr. WINDOM. The total of the bill as it now stands. The total appropriation for the fiscal year 1875–'76 was $26,644,350.09; so that this bill is less than the bill of last year by $10,414,572.27. And, Mr. President, this report shows a reduction by the conference committee upon the bill as it passed the Senate of $4,156,155.29. I deem it my duty to call the attention of the Senate to the items which constitute this reduction. I am unable to see that there is any great saving to the country in the reduction named, and I think the Senate will be unable to see it when I state the items. The report of the conference committee is of course the result of concessions on both sides, but I must admit that so far as the amounts are concerned it is the result largely of concessions on our side. It is not such a report as I would have desired. I am not satisfied with the bill as I report it from the conference committee, nor do I think the committee of the Senate is satisfied; but under the circumstances I believe it to be the best that can be obtained, and therefore hope the report may be adopted.

I now proceed to state the items which constitute this large reduction from the action of the Senate, amounting to over $4,000,000, and I will add to each of these items a little note of comment showing of what they consist.

First, on the Library of Congress there is a reduction of $4,400. This amount is for preparing an index now in progress, and of course the money will have to be appropriated hereafter, so that this item is merely postponed to some future time.

On printing and binding, and on lithographing and mapping, the reductions amount on the first to $491,770.16, and on the latter to $18,000. The expenses of the public printing, binding, &c., for the last year show that these items will be indispensable the current year. Hence striking them out means a deficiency next winter, nothing more nor less.

Then on the District of Columbia general expenses, $500,000. And I beg to add as a comment upon that, that instead of being a just economy, it is in my judgment simply the refusal to bear a fair proportion of the expenses of the District of Columbia, and to that extent is a repudiation of the obligation which we are under to the District.

I want to pause here for a moment, Mr. President, to comment upon the position which this agreement as to the District of Columbia and the laws we have passed leave this District. It is true we have consented to this arrangement, but I am unwilling that the Senate shall vote upon it without knowing exactly its nature. Last winter the commissioners of the District of Columbia sent to Congress a bill providing for taxation. We retained it here until late this summer, I think, and then passed a bill providing for taxation to take effect next December. We have also during this session postponed for one year the redemption of real estate sold for taxes; we have also repealed certain license laws out of which they received about $100,000. So far, therefore, as our legislation is concerned we have taken from the people of the District all power to collect any money under taxation or otherwise until next December. In addition to that we have imposed upon the District by several acts several duties to be performed which will cost money, among others, in a bill which passed the Senate—I do not know now whether it passed both Houses or not, but I believe it has—as to repaving Pennsylvania avenue.

Mr. CONKLING. It has passed both Houses.

Mr. WINDOM. In that bill we require the District to relay the water-pipes; we also require various other duties of the District; and we have an act upon our statute-book which prohibits under penalty of imprisonment in the penitentiary and a very large fine any officer of the District from increasing the indebtedness of the District, so that, summing it up, we have denied to the District authorities all power to collect money under taxation, we have imposed upon them certain expenditures, and refuse to appropriate any money to aid them. That is the position of affairs.

Mr. SARGENT. And they have almost nothing in their treasury.

Mr. WINDOM. They have now $255,000 in the treasury.

Mr. SARGENT. With the August interest coming due.

Mr. WINDOM. We provide that, with the exception of certain current expenses, such as schools and one or two other items, all the money in the treasury shall be appropriated for the payment of interest on bonds. I submit that it leaves the District in a very bad condition; but all things considered the committee felt bound not to break up the conference and defeat the bill on that proposition. But there is one of the savings of $500,000 which enter into this reduction.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator whether or not the schools will be obliged to close before these taxes that have been levied this year are paid into the Treasury?

Mr. WINDOM. I can only answer that by giving the opinion of the commissioners. They say they will. It may not be regarded as a strong argument in favor of the adoption of the conference report; but it is a plain, simple statement of the facts in the case which I desire the Senate to know before they act upon it.

The board of health we have reduced $1,827. The revenue-cutter service is reduced $25,639.49. This amount is merely withheld from a most valuable, economical, and important service, and I very much fear will result in a greater loss than saving.

The item for courts in Utah Territory we have reduced $23,000. There was a certain expenditure incurred amounting to $43,000. It has been audited and the amount is understood to be exactly that sum. The House bill appropriated $20,000 and provided that this should be in full payment of the $43,000 due. The committee secured an amendment striking out that proviso requiring a debt of $43,000 to be paid with $20,000, and have agreed to this amendment; but the $23,000 is a debt due and will have to be appropriated for next year in some deficiency bill.

The item for collection of claims due the United States we have reduced $2,500, and for defending suits against the Secretary of the Treasury we have reduced from the Senate bill $5,000. The officers of the Government who are responsible for the collection of claims due to the United States and for the defense of suits say that this reduction will embarrass them. This false economy will probably result in losses much greater than the amounts saved by the reduction. Five thousand dollars reduction is affected by omitting the item for repairs of the Insane Asylum. This I regard as simply a postponement until next year, for these repairs will have to be made. Then on the Smithsonian Institution there is a reduction of $20,000. That was the $20,000 which the Senate appropriated to take care of a large and valuable collection which the Smithsonian has under its charge. The Senate committee was compelled to recede from that provision.

Then there is the item of $6,000 for the examination of the rebel archives. This strikes out the whole provision made by the Senate for the examination of these archives. The examination of these archives has saved the Government many millions by furnishing evidence to defeat improper claims. The reason for refusing to continue so valuable an appropriation can hardly be founded upon a just economy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What was the reason stated by the House conferees?

Mr. WINDOM. That it was not necessary to examine them any more; that it was a work which need not be done, as I remember now; that it was at least a saving that could be accomplished this year. In fact that is the argument throughout, that certain things can be postponed until the future.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The oblivion extends to the archives as well as the rebellion.

Mr. WINDOM. The United States Official Postal Guide is reduced $10,000 below the amount found necessary last year. The information the committee have on that subject is that this has been the most economical mode of furnishing information to thirty or forty thousand post-offices in the United States that has ever been adopted. This will not furnish it adequately during the coming year.

"Mints and assay offices" have been reduced from the Senate bill $64,000. The acts of this Congress have very largely increased the work required at the mints. Withholding necessary appropriations may render the mints unable to comply with the law. They can comply to some extent with it, but I think the amount of reduction is larger than it should be.

Now I come to twelve items which I will read together and comment upon them all at once: Subtreasury and post-office at Boston reduced $50,000; court-house and post-office at Cincinnati, $50,000; court-house and post-office at Chicago, $225,000; court-house and post-office at Topeka, Kansas, $50,000.

Mr. LOGAN. That leaves the post-office at Chicago without any appropriation.

Mr. WINDOM. It leaves an unexpended balance.

Mr. LOGAN. But I am speaking of any appropriation in this bill for roofing.

Mr. WINDOM. Without any appropriation in this bill.

Mr. LOGAN. It leaves it without a covering this winter.

Mr. WINDOM. Post-office and court-house at Trenton, New Jersey, reduced $20,000, from $50,000 to $30,000; appraisers' buildings, San Francisco, $20,000 reduction; State, War and Navy building, $250,000 reduction; court-house and post-office at Saint Louis, $150,000 reduction; at New York, $100,000 reduction; at Albany, $50,000 reduction; Post-Office Department building, $25,321.85; repairs of buildings under Treasury Department $100,000.

These twelve items for the construction and repairs of public buildings amounting to $1,090,321.85 may show a reduction in the aggregate of the appropriation bills for this year, and hence may serve a purpose next November; but the buildings are now in progress and must be completed. Postponement until next year is in no sense a saving of money; on the contrary, the failure to appropriate enough to carry on the work economically and protect that which has already been done may in some cases work loss to the Government.

The next five items are of like character. Expenses of buoyage, $15,000; signal-light crib, Chicago, $5,000; light-house at Little Traverse, Michigan, $12,000; light-house, Straits of Mackinac, $15,000; light-house, Narragansett Bay, $35,000. These are items that are withheld and will have to be appropriated in the future.

Mr. LOGAN. That $5,000 I understand is for the crib at Chicago.

Mr. WINDOM. It is.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely call attention to the fact that the House passed a bill for that purpose, and I had it put on the appropriation bill as an amendment.

Mr. WINDOM. I was not aware of that fact. At Rock Island arsenal the reduction is $165,000. The arsenal is in progress of construction, and the money must be appropriated hereafter. In the item of navy-yards and stations the reduction is $585,000. The appropriation last year was some $1,200,000. The total appropriation now for taking care of fifty millions of property is $100,000. On the item of manure for public grounds the reduction is $2,000; for the care of various reservations in the District the reduction is $10,000; graveling roadways, &c., $3,000; reduction on Capitol Grounds improvement, $100,000; Coast Survey reduction, $25,000; rent of buildings Coast Survey, $3,600; transportation of United States securities, $25,000; furniture, &c., in buildings under the Treasury Department, $25,000; custodians of various buildings under Treasury Department, $25,000; temporary clerks Treasury Department, $60,000. This amount was stricken down, but will have to be added to some other bill or the permanent force of clerks increased.

The Signal Office is stricken down $100,000; the geographical survey of the Territories west of the one hundredth meridian, $30,000; testing iron, steel, &c., $50,000; care of armory building, $1,500; maps for Powell's survey, $10,000; surveying public and private land claims, $72,400. This is for the general surveys, and of course is only a postponement until some future time. For various surveyor-generals' offices the reduction is $4,500; collecting revenue from sales of public lands, $166,216.79. This item is the difference between the estimates of the Department and the amount appropriated in the House bill. There is some question as to whether those estimates are correct or not, and if it is found that this sum is insufficient, the deficiency can be provided next year.

The item for the purchase of the Freedman's Bank building, $325,000, is omitted. This can hardly be called a saving, because it was proposed to use the money for the purchase of property which would be worth the money to be paid for it and would save in rents an amount, if paid for in bonds, equal to the interest. We rent the building now for as much or more than 5 per cent. interest on what the bonds would amount to.

Now, Mr. President, I have gone through the items of saving in this bill so called the reduction, amounting to four millions one hundred and fifty-odd thousand dollars, with the exception of certain items, which amount to $249,980, that might possibly be called a saving, and I will state the reductions of that character.

There is for the United States Official Postal Guide $10,000, on which I have already commented. Then the Reform School in the District of Columbia $18,480. This was for the enlargement of the grounds of the reform school, and I presume can be postponed without any serious inconvenience. Then there is for manure for public grounds $2,000. I think that is an actual saving. Then in the case of various reservations there is a reduction of $10,000. Whether that is a saving or not remains to be seen when we ascertain how the grounds look next winter. In the item for custodians of buildings $25,000 reduction is made by cutting down salaries already very poorly paid, and what results there may be as to the care of buildings remains to be seen. The $100,000 on the Signal Office is undoubtedly a saving, but it is a saving upon a most important service and of very doubtful expediency. There are the items of geographical surveys of Territories, $30,000; testing iron, steel, &c., $50,000; offices of surveyors-general, $4,500. All these items, amounting to $249,900, might possibly be construed to be an actual saving out of this total of over $4,000,000. Now, Mr. President, one or two other remarks and I will submit the question to the Senate.

I am requested by the Senator from New York to restate the totals of the bill. The House appropriated originally $15,256,731.32. To that the Senate added $4,126,763.90, making the total $19,400,000 in round numbers as the bill passed the Senate.

Mr. BOUTWELL. How much is in the bill now?

Mr. WINDOM. The amount appropriated in this bill as reported now is $16,229,777.82.

There is one item, not of dollars and cents, to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate for a moment, and that is the change with reference to the Public Printer. As the bill now stands, reported from the conference committee, the Printer, who has been elected by the Senate for several years past, will be appointed by the President, and the act will take effect from the date of its passage. I mention this fact at this point for the purpose of saying that, so far as I know, there was nothing personal in the action of the committee, at least so far as the Senate members were concerned. There was no desire to strike at any particular individual, so far as I know; but the ground upon which this change was made was that the House has for several years disputed the propriety of the Senate electing or appointing the Public Printer, for the reason that he is the Printer for the House as well as the Senate and for the Departments. The House insisting upon that and the Senate committee not being able to resist it upon principle, they agreed to this amendment.

I do not think of any further remarks. I will answer any question if I can. The bill is a pretty large one. I will submit a table showing the various items of appropriation to which I have referred:

Postponement until next year is in no sense a saving of money. Mr. SARGENT. I should like to inquire what became of the legislation in the bill repealing the election law?

Mr. WINDOM. The House recede from the provision repealing the election law, so that it is stricken out of the bill. I ought to add, before I sit down, that perhaps the remarks I have made are not very commendatory of the report; but I desire to say that after long and tedious efforts to arrive at a result, it is the best conclusion to which the committee think they can come. Therefore I submit it, and hope the Senate will put an end to the bill by adopting the report.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to ask the Senator from Minnesota, before I give my vote to this report, whether in his opinion this is the bill that the Senate must take or else abandon the branches of the public service covered by the appropriations mentioned in the bill?

Mr. WINDOM. I could hardly say that in so strong terms as the question would indicate. I can only say that after earnest effort to secure a bill which would meet the requirements of the public service, this was the best we were able to accomplish in this conference. I would not be willing to answer the question as broadly as it is asked. These are all discretionary items, and each House has an equal right with the other to exercise its discretion upon them. I think the Senate has no more control over the discretion of the House than the House has over that of the Senate. If the House of Representatives feel, as I am bound to concede to them, that in their judgment the House bill was right and the Senate bill wrong, we can only attempt to show them that we were right and they were wrong; and if we fail, we have to meet on some common ground. I do not know whether a new conference could obtain any better agreement or could remedy any of the defects which I have pointed out or not. I doubt it. And as the session is so near its close, I think we had better take the bill as we have it rather than to attempt to change the agreement by a new conference.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to ask the Senator in regard to the public printing, if the proposition contained in the House bill was adopted to practically abolish the Government printing and to give out all the printing by contract to the lowest bidder? Was that measure of supposed economy adopted?

Mr. WINDOM. It was not. That was stricken from the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand that the reduction of the appropriation for the public printing is about half a million.

Mr. WINDOM. It is $491,770.16 below the amount used last year.

Mr. ANTHONY. That undoubtedly will last until Congress meets again. The idea of appropriating a million dollars for printing and then ordering printing to be done costing a million and a half dollars is a manifest absurdity. We order certain printing to be done, and we do not make a sufficient appropriation to do it. We have now before us from the House propositions which have not met with the favor of the Senate Committee on Printing which would increase the public printing more than a hundred thousand dollars. In order to enable us to do that work we have the appropriations for the public printing reduced half a million.

I know there has been a statement made which has been so often replied to and refuted in this body that it seems supererogatory to do it again; but I will read from the report of the Committee on Printing, signed by the committee unanimously, which disposes of one statement, upon the faith of which I suppose this reduction was largely made, and that is, that the charges made by the Public Printer for the public printing were far beyond the cost at which the work could be done by individuals. Everybody has heard that, and those who cannot remember it know that it has been replied to effectually here half a dozen times, perhaps. I cannot do it better than to read from a report made by the Committee on Printing in June 1874, upon a letter of F. & J. Rives and George A. Bailey, proprietors of the Globe, charging the Congressional Printer with being a defaulter to the Government in his paper account and with other malfeasance in office. The report says:

> The next charge is in these words:
> "We further accused him of charging against the Departments enormous prices for the work done for them, by which means he became enabled to do other work for less than cost, and, as he has done in many instances, for private purposes, for nothing at all."

Here is what the committee say:

> When the Government printing was performed by printers elected by the Senate and the House of Representatives, the prices of the various descriptions of work were fixed by law. These prices are much above the cost of the work. It has been the custom of the Congressional Printer, and of his predecessors, to charge or estimate the cost of the work at these prices, and, deducting the actual expense of carrying on the office from the aggregate of these charges, and taking into the account the amount of material and machinery added to the office during the year, the stock on hand, the work unfinished, &c., to call the balance the "amount of earnings in excess of expenditures." The amount for the last year was $264,812.11.

That is, the amount at which the work was done, is less than what are called the extravagant charges of the Government Printer. They would be extravagant if the Government had to pay them; but the Government pays the lesser sum:

> The original purpose of keeping the accounts in this manner seems to have been to exhibit the savings of the Government Printing Office, then an experiment, over the former system. And as the appropriation for the public printing was made in bulk, without specifying the amount that might be expended by each Department, no attention was called to the exaggerated charges or estimates. When the present system was adopted of appropriating specific sums for the printing of each Department, the attention of the executive officers was directed to the rapid absorption of their appropriations, and the Congressional Printer revised his charges and made the corrections date back to the time when the present system of specific appropriations was adopted, July 1, 1873.
> By the testimony of experts, employing printers of Washington, summoned by the accusers, it appears that the prices now charged by the Congressional Printer do not vary materially from the cost as estimated at their offices. Of eleven examples the average cost was testified by one witness to be $4.55, by another to be $5.39. The average of these two is $4.97. The prices charged for the same to customers are respectively $6.52 and $7.37, an average of $6.94. The price charged by the Congressional Printer is $4.99.

That is to say, the charges made by the Government Printer are less than one-half of one per cent. Four dollars and ninety-seven cents was the price given by the experts and $4.99 the price charged by the Government Printer; and $6.94 the price given by the experts which they would charge their customers. This report concludes in exonerating the Public Printer from the charges brought against him.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I do not intend to vote for this conference report. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to one or two points. The first one is the revenue-cutter service. Manifestly this is a reduction of the revenue-cutter service. The revenue cutters must be kept in port; they are not to be supplied with fuel so that they can render prompt and continuous service. Therefore the facilities for illicit importations will be largely increased by the diminution of the power on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury to keep these vessels in service.

Then, again, take the mints and assay offices. We have all endeavored to get the subsidiary coin minted and into circulation, and yet we refuse the mints and assay offices the appropriate amounts of money to accomplish that purpose.

A single word in relation to the public buildings. It is manifest to all Senators that buildings that are long in progress are always expensive. The most extravagant buildings that we have are those whose erection is protracted from year to year. Here is an appropriation made for the State, War, and Navy Department building, but it is utterly insufficient to even roof it over the present season. The same is true of Chicago. The building there is to remain unroofed during the next succeeding winter. Then take the post-office and custom-house at Saint Louis, and also at Cincinnati. There is an appropriation sufficient to keep the men employed for this year, but it leaves nothing for getting out stone, so that they may go on with the building the succeeding year. It seems to me that the Senate committee have yielded too much in this direction. Take some of the smaller appropriations. Here was an appropriation for Trenton, where the building is completed and roofed in, ready to be plastered, and yet the House refuses to appropriate the meager sum of $20,000 to plaster it and finish it.

Take the building at San Francisco, the appraisers' building, where the commerce of the country is largely increasing and where the building is a very great necessity. The appropriation here made will not complete the building in six years. Take the building at New York, where we have expended, as we have for the War and State Department building, some millions of dollars; and yet by this conference report we refuse the small amount that may be necessary to complete that building. The millions that have been expended on the War and State Department building for the purpose of accommodating those Departments are to lie idle, and we are to pay continuous rent for other buildings and leave this building to be completed at some future time.

I call attention to the repairs of the buildings under the Treasury Department, buildings all over the country. Annually we are required to appropriate money for the annual repairs of hundreds of buildings, and yet the House committee does not appropriate a sufficient sum by three-fifths of what is annually called for to keep these buildings in ordinary repair. Take all our navy-yards. They utterly refuse anything for the repair of the navy-yards. Of what possible use can our navy-yards be unless they are kept in repair? Then take the Signal Office where our country has won distinguished honor and where the nations of Europe are fast copying our example and our method. Yet that is to be crippled and destroyed. We have made geographical surveys. We have the maps ready for publication, Powell's maps, and yet the House entirely refuse to print the results after we have been at the vast expense of making the surveys.

Take the reservations in this city; there are four hundred acres of them; and the House refuses $10,000 necessary to keep the fences and trees and the roadways in ordinary repair. Take another small item. Here is the Armory building, entirely useless at the present time, unoccupied. It was proposed that we should allow it under the charge of the Smithsonian Institution to receive the twenty car-loads that have been sent to the exhibition at Philadelphia from the Smithsonian Institution, the twenty other car-loads that have been received from the several States and Territories, and the twenty more car-loads that have been given to us by the nations that are making their exhibitions from abroad at Philadelphia. The House have indeed allowed us to use the Armory, and have appropriated something for fitting it up, but they have utterly refused the small sum of $1,500 for the purpose of allowing a watchman to take care of it at night and to provide for somebody to be there through the day, as is absolutely necessary if these large exhibitions are to be seen or even to be taken care of.

Under the circumstances, Mr. President, I do not intend to vote for this conference report.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I hope that for most of the reductions made by the conference committee better reasons can be assigned than for one to which I am going to call attention, I mean the public building already started in Albany, which is the capital of the State of New York. That the Senate may see the wisdom of striking out of the bill the amendment introduced by the Senate, which was first to the effect that $50,000 should be appropriated, and second to the effect that the limit which stood in the way of utilizing some money that may remain now should be removed, I will read from a letter written by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury on the 26th of last month. He says:

There is a large amount of granite and other stone piled on the street surrounding the building—

Which, I ought to say, is in one of the most conspicuous and crowded parts of that city.

There is a large amount of granite and other stone piled on the street surrounding the building which will be used in making the foundation of the building. The use of the public streets is undoubtedly of great inconvenience to the public of Albany, and it is feared that unless the material is disposed of the municipal authorities will require the Government to remove it to the site of the building, which can only be done with great cost and inconvenience.

Here is the presentation in part of the predicament of that building, a building which stood upon a part of this site razed to the ground, the materials removed, disposed roundabout at convenient distance, and now by striking out the amendment which removed the limit and by striking out also the amendment which gave $50,000 to the continuation of this building, the whole thing is left in statu quo, the streets encumbered by material valuable for use but detrimental there; and now the United States will be left like any other trespasser who encumbers the highways of cities. Yet there is no fund that I know of applicable even to a removal of what the law denounces as a public nuisance.

I hope as I said, Mr. President, that some or all of the other reductions of this bill are founded upon better reasons than this so-called reduction seems to be.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I am aware that this bill in the shape in which it is presented to us by the conference report is not such a one as is satisfactory to the Senate. It is very far from being satisfactory to myself. I do not think it is economy to dole out small appropriations to public buildings which the necessities of the public require, or that we should strike down the Signal Service which has rendered such excellent service to commerce and to science, or that it is well to prevent the survey of the public lands for settlers requiring homes, or that it is well to do very many things which I might particularize which are in this bill; but I am firmly convinced that it is the best bill that we can get. If you send it back to another conference, what do you send it back upon? Upon which item? Upon a general dissatisfaction? Are you prepared to send it back simply because the Albany building is not taken care of? I think the appropriation of $50,000 ought to be made for that building, but I should like to remind the Senator from New York that some $47,000 of unexpended balances on that building are still available and can be used to prevent the streets from being encumbered, and perhaps go some way toward the foundation of the building. Therefore the case is not quite so lamentable; and in this instance, and it may be in others, there is something to be said in favor of the bill even as it stands.

The appropriation for the building at Chicago was stricken out, it is true, contrary to my judgment. This is one of the items which was passed upon in the conference committee before sickness drove me from it and I was compelled to resign. In the case of Chicago, the Senate amendment was stricken out, which made an appropriation of several hundred thousand dollars to continue that work, but it must be remembered that some $500,000 or $600,000 of unexpended balances are available for the present year. I know that by having an additional appropriation they might get out stone to go on another year, and now they will be compelled to stop, but during the present year the work can go on.

I think it would be wise on the part of the Senate to adopt the report if they desire that the light-house service shall go on or that the Signal Service shall go on, though not in its present amplitude, or that there shall be something done on public buildings, that essential parts of the public service shall go forward which are necessary as we know. Sundry civil bills are to be attended to, even if not in an economical way or as ample as we might desire. I think it might not be well to send the bill back to another committee of conference. I do not know how another committee of conference on the part of the Senate can do any better than this one has done. My impression is that the result of that would be that we should have no bill at all. There has been important legislation stricken from this bill by the action of the House conferees. What the result would be in another conference I do not know. They might refuse hereafter to discard that legislation from the bill. I think it would be the part of wisdom for the Senate to adopt the conference report.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I suppose it is better to agree to the report of the conference committee, but I have no doubt the losses, especially in the matter of public buildings, will be twice as large as the amount that is now saved. For example, at the city of Boston the foundations of the extension of the post-office building have been laid, in some portions completed foundations, and in others, as I understand, not yet completed. It is quite manifest that without a dollar to protect or complete that work—and there is not a dollar in this bill for that purpose—great injury must come to it from exposure to the weather in the summer and in the winter. Probably twice the amount will be expended to repair the damage done that would be now necessary to preserve the work. The Senate put in an appropriation of $50,000, but it has been stricken out by the conference committee.

There is one peculiarity in this bill which attracts my attention. We have here in process of building a State Department very much needed. We are paying each year in rent for the War Department and the Attorney-General's Office a very large sum of money. But $250,000 are appropriated by this bill for the prosecution of that great work, while, I observe, $450,000 are appropriated for the prosecution of the custom-house at Saint Louis, where I believe there are not ample but moderate and thus far sufficient accommodations already in the ownership of the Government.

Mr. CRAGIN. Mr. President, I expect to vote for the report of the conference committee, but I wish to call attention more specifically than has been done to the appropriation made for the repair and preservation of the navy-yards. One year ago Congress appropriated about $1,000,000 for repairs of the buildings, walls, &c., of the different navy-yards in the country. The Senate amended the House bill so as to appropriate $500,000 for this purpose; less than one-half of what was appropriated last year. By the conference report the amount is reduced to $100,000 for the repair and preservation of all the navy-yards in this country. The property in the navy-yards of the United States to-day has cost the Government more than $100,000,000. There are more than five hundred buildings, and by this appropriation only $200 is appropriated to each building. I call the attention of the Senate and the country to this fact; and hereafter when we shall have lost by deterioration, by failing to repair this vast amount of property, four, five, or ten times the amount of the money appropriated, the country will understand the reason. My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] the other day gave an illustration which to my mind was very apt and very pertinent. He asked us what would be thought of the farmer who would refuse to plant because he was too poor to spare the seed necessary for planting. What shall be said of this great country when it is too poor to appropriate money enough to keep in repair its own property, its buildings, which are necessarily going to destruction and ruin?

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I do not stand exactly in the same position with some of my friends. I shall not vote for this report; and I propose to give my reasons for that course very briefly. I never deem it my duty to vote for a thing that I think is wrong just because it may please somebody. I may be somewhat more uncompromising in my notions than others are; but when I think a thing is radically wrong, when I see points in it that strike at certain sections of the country and are very liberal to others, I shall vote for no such proposition. When the bill was up before I read, and read twice, to the Senate a letter from the Supervising Architect of the United States, declaring most emphatically that unless an appropriation was made for roofing the custom-house at Chicago great damage would be the result. I use his words; he says, "It is absolutely necessary for the preservation of the walls of that building." When I see $450,000, I believe it is, appropriated for the Saint Louis custom-house, and every dollar stricken out for the roofing of the Chicago custom-house, it strikes me that there is some reason for it, and a strange one to me, too. There is an unexpended balance; that is true; and yet Senators well know the fact, for they have had this information, that there is an unexpended balance, for the reason that a suspension of work on that building occurred nearly a year ago in order to examine the foundation. That examination was made. A portion of the money that is now an unexpended balance is required for the purchase of materials. The appropriation made by the Senate was required, according to the letter of the Architect, for the purpose of roofing it in when the material was purchased. Yet, with that unexpended balance, which is no more than is necessary to procure the material, the money for the purpose of putting the roof on is refused by the House and by the Senate. The Senator from California said there were $500,000 or $600,000 of unexpended balances, and that was the reason we could dispense with a further appropriation this year.

Mr. SARGENT. Five hundred and ninety-six thousand dollars. I said, however, that I was in favor of the additional appropriation proposed by the Senate, not for this coming year, for I suppose that nearly $600,000 would be sufficient this year, but in order that stone might be cut out ahead.

Mr. LOGAN. I will show the Senator, who was on the conference committee, that he is mistaken. I have a telegram here from the Supervising Architect. Five hundred thousand dollars or $600,000 would not be sufficient, if there was that much of unexpended balance, for the purpose of procuring material and roofing the house, and doing everything necessary to be done. The Senator is mistaken in that respect. The Supervising Architect says that $371,272.61 is the unexpended balance. The unexpended balance you would require them to use for the purchase of material and the payment for stone that has already been purchased and the roofing of that house is not equal to the appropriation that you make for the Saint Louis custom-house which is not so far advanced.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I suppose he is correct——

Mr. LOGAN. I know I am correct. I have the very telegram here.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator will allow me to say that it is now near the 20th of July. It depends upon the date at which the unexpended balance was made out. The other statement of the balance was made in May.

Mr. LOGAN. This unexpended balance is about the time the conference committee reports, I notice. It is very easy for them to ascertain how much it is. It cannot be any more now than it was yesterday, nor than it was last March. Certainly the unexpended balance does not increase. It certainly decreases if they are using it.

There is another point in this bill that strikes me as very strange which I noticed the other day. I do not speak of the House or the Senate as a body, but I speak of the legislative department of the Government. We find hundreds of thousands of dollars were appropriated in a bill the other day either for the purpose of producing rain in order to make a stream where one does not exist, or for the purpose of digging the stream out so that you may paddle a canoe on it, and for purposes of that kind. Senators and Representatives would rise and say it is necessary for the commerce of the country to open streams upon which a skiff was never rowed up or down since the world began. Here at the port of Chicago, where thousands and thousands of vessels float and where millions and millions of the commerce of the nation flow out every year, when we ask for a little appropriation of $5,000 to put a light on the crib in order to give warning to vessels there where many have been sunk in the lake, it is refused. A bill passed the House for that purpose, introduced by a member of Congress from Chicago. It came to the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Commerce. The Committee on Commerce could not get a quorum and they did not report it. I stated the facts to the Senate when this appropriation bill was up and asked that they put this appropriation on the bill, which the Senate did. It had before passed the House, and the amount I believe that passed the House in a special bill was only a thousand dollars less than the appropriation in the bill made by the Senate; and after passing both Houses, then the committee of conference of both Houses strike it out. I suppose that is for the benefit of commerce! They strike out a proposition that has been adopted by both Houses. I ask why that is done?

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are opposed to legislation on an appropriation bill perhaps!

Mr. LOGAN. I presume that must be the reason! I want to know why it is done. I want to know why it is when an appropriation is agreed to by both Houses, when a special bill has passed making the appropriation and it goes to the Senate, and when not reported by the committee back to the Senate so that this body may agree to it, it is put on this appropriation bill, the committee of conference strike it out. I should like some one to explain it, why that is done. I state to the Senate that it is necessary, as they well know it is necessary, for the benefit of commerce. I suppose that if I had asked for $10,000 to scoop the mud out of some spring branch, as was done here by Senators from different States, it would have been appropriated and would have been all right. Why? Because I would have to agree to vote for somebody else's branch provided he voted for mine; but when it comes to an honest proposition that is absolutely necessary, it cannot be agreed to after it passes both Houses. That is a strange kind of legislation it seems to me.

Then I have another reason which I will give for voting against the conference report. It is as immaterial to me as it is to anybody else whether these appropriations are made or not. The House and Senate have agreed to a proposition to strike out every dollar of appropriation for the examination of the rebel archives. Why is that? Is it not a well-known fact to the House and the Senate too that the examination of these rebel archives under the appropriations that have been made heretofore has saved millions of dollars to this Government? The examination of these archives has saved more money to this Government than you appropriate in this whole bill, amounting, say, to $16,000,000; and it can be demonstrated, if time were given to do it. The examination so far has saved to the country more than the whole amount you appropriate in the bill, and still you strike out an appropriation of $6,000 for the continuation of this examination of these archives. Why is that done? Is it done so that the evidence shall not be secured from the best sources that now exist against claims that have no basis or foundation whatever which are being made against this Government every day? There is the record of your confederate cotton and your confederate property which may by examination be shown so that these claims may be rejected; and yet no appropriation is given. Why is that? I will not say that it is because there is a desire that these claims may go through before these archives are examined. I will not say any such thing, for I do not believe that is the purpose; but it is an oversight, and a grievous one, too. It is an oversight when we speak of economy to refuse a small appropriation that would save to the country a vast amount of money. Economy does not consist alone in cutting down appropriations. It is false economy when you undertake to pare off little items and at the same time refuse that which will produce a benefit to the country much larger than the whole amount you cut off.

As has been said, the discussion recently in the chambers of the legislative department of this Government on the subject of economy has developed the theory that what you can cut off of an appropriation bill is the only kind of economy that is known in this land; that is to say, it is saving taxation. It is thought we save taxes by cutting off small amounts from appropriation bills, when in fact nothing is saved thereby. I do not wish to discuss that question. I think there is a great distinction between appropriating money and raising money by taxation. Where you cut off appropriations that are absolutely necessary and at the same time do not reduce taxation, and tell me that that is economy, I tell you that it is false economy. We have for years attempted to reduce the expenditures of the Government, and it has been done every year with the exception of one or two sessions of Congress. Every Congress for the last ten years has done it; but the manner of the economy has been not only cutting down the amount that you appropriated, but at the same time reducing taxation. The taxation has been reduced along with the reduction of the expenses of the Government, and it has been reduced a greater amount than the expenses each Congress, with one or two exceptions. That of course has nothing to do with this bill. I merely mention it incidentally.

For these reasons which I have given, on account of the propositions I have stated in this bill, besides many others about which I do not wish to detain the Senate with discussion, I shall vote against the report. The three items that I have given are enough, as far as I am concerned, to induce me to vote against the conference report.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not think I understand the Senator with reference to the light at Chicago. Does he mean to say that it passed both Houses?

Mr. LOGAN. I said that a special bill was introduced in the House of Representatives by a member from Chicago for that purpose. It passed the House and came to the Senate. It was referred to the Committee on Commerce. They not having reported it at the time that this bill was up for consideration, I moved to put it in this bill, which the Senate agreed to do. Therefore I say it has passed both Houses. I do not mean that it has passed both Houses on this bill, but in the manner which I mentioned, showing the assent of both Houses to the proposition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am going to ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of this report before I sit down. I shall vote against this report. The two Houses have not agreed to any time of adjournment. There is no reason for any Senator voting in favor of the report, unless he thinks it is right, on the ground that we are in a pinch at all. I do not think it is right in many respects, but only one I will mention, and that is the one to which the Senator from Illinois has referred, about the appropriation for examining the rebel archives, in respect to which my attention has been particularly drawn for several years past. If I correctly understand the Senator from Minnesota, the House conferees insist upon striking that provision out.

Mr. WINDOM. That is the reason it was stricken out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And the Senate conferees are forced to agree to it. Whatever may be their motives, it is said that this evidence contained in the rebel archives now in possession of the Government shall be locked up against any use to which it may be applied in sifting out the false from the true claims against the Government. That is the attitude of the House of Representatives. What are the claims on the Government in respect of which these archieves may furnish, as they have furnished, most important and valuable evidence in protecting the Treasury? The law provides for the restoration of captured and abandoned property to people who were loyal to the Government of the United States during the rebellion, and it provides against restoring it to those who were not loyal. Taking that to be the law, it is of great consequence to know, in respect of the many millions that are still undisposed of and claimed, whether the claimants fall within the attitude described by the act of Congress. It has already happened, from investigations that have been made into those archives, that men who have come forward in the Court of Claims and sworn that they bore true loyalty to the Union during the whole rebellion were at the same time voluntary subscribers to the confederate cotton and other loans. Then the law provides that the claims of loyal citizens, anywhere in the Union, for supplies furnished to or taken by the armies of the United States during the four years of the rebellion, may, upon proper proof of loyalty and the justness of their claim, be recommended to Congress by what is called the southern claims commission. In the exercise of its duties it has happened more than once, more than twice, more than many times that these archives, being assorted and systematized, and labeled, and alphabeted, and put within reach, have furnished the conclusive evidence that men who claimed and pretended to be within the authority of the act of Congress were pretenders and falsifiers.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to ask the Senator how long the examination of those archives has been going on and what amount of money has been expended in their examination?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then I should like to ask the further question whether most of those claims against the Government are not already barred by the statute?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Many of them are barred, but every year, in spite of the bar, the Senator and his associates bring in bills here to remove the bar, and whenever the Senator has his way it will be removed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to say, in reply to that, that whenever an honest claim comes before the Senate, whether it comes from Vermont or from a Southern State, that honesty which I learned in youth, and which I trust I have practiced through life, will compel me to vote for an honest claim without reference to the locality from which it comes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Undoubtediy; but how are we to find out what is honest and what is dishonest? Perhaps the Senator's way is to wait the longest possible time and only take the story of the claimant. The general principles of law are somewhat different, and it has been thought necessary in most civilized communities—possibly in Delaware—to be in the interest of truth and of justice and of honesty that there shall be statutes of limitation and repose. Therefore I suspect the Senator is not quite accurate when he says that the best proof of the honesty of a claim is its staleness; that the statute of limitation has run upon it; for that is the effect of what the Senator said.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I beg to say that the Senator cannot put words into my mouth.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot wish to do that. If I can only get them out it will be enough for me.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have stated no such proposition here. In reply to the criticisms which the Senator has made on my criterion of honesty, I believe it will be admitted that the criterion of honesty of the Senator from Vermont is limited by geographical lines.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That may be possible. I know something about geography, and geography sometimes determines what is allowable and what is not. The line between meum and tuum as between states and nations is marked by geography. It may be that the Senator does not know it, but that is so. "Keep on your own side of the line" is a geographical proposition, and a moral one no less.

Coming to the question again, I was saying that the southern claims commission had claims amounting to millions before it, saying nothing about those that had not been presented. I was saying that it had found in its experience that many claims of large amounts, pushed forward on the pretense of fidelity to the Union, turned out from the official records of the confederacy, as far as they had been examined, to be absolutely false and fictitious.

To be a rebel is to be one thing. The man who is a rebel from the conscientious conviction that either his duty to his State or his love of what he considers to be liberty compels him to resist the power of a general government is entitled to respect, for he acts upon his conscience, no matter how wrong he may be; but the man who adds to being a rebel the additional and entirely different quality of being a liar it appears to me is not entitled to very great consideration. I think there is a distinction, and a very broad one. Our forefathers were rebels in what they believed and what turned out to be a righteous cause. Some of our brothers on the other side of the Chamber were rebels in what no doubt they believed to be also (I think they were wrong) a righteous cause, but they failed. To undertake to add to that the idea that you are to lock up in the vaults of the Treasury Department, if they are kept there, or the War Department, the evidence which is to find out whether the man who was a rebel and now comes forward pretending he was not, is adding to the misfortune or the crime of his assault against the Government, for the base lust of gain, the crime of perjury and falsehood, I think is an entirely different thing. The House of Representatives say these evidences of the status of the claimants in the South shall be sealed up and their ex parte statements shall be taken, although if you would appropriate a small sum of money to continue the systematizing and putting in order of these things it might turn out, as it has frequently turned out, that these claims were false and untrue.

Then there is the statute which authorizes settlements in the War Department, in the Quartermaster's Office, for other claims of loyal citizens. They are to be tested by the evidence that these confederate archives of various characters show as to the status of the claimant. That is to be sealed up. That is the attitude of the House of Representatives on this most important matter. It will turn out, if we ever get back to the river and harbor bill, referring to the table of my honorable friend from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] about the expenses of the Government and so on, that millions of the appropriations every year, in one way and another, are appropriations to persons the test of whose right in the first instance to any relief is that of loyalty to the Government during the rebellion. I hold that the attitude of the House of Representatives is upon this point to say that there shall be no more inquiry by any authority of this Government into that fountain, pregnant of evidence respecting the standing upon which claimants to the amount of millions year by year are drawing money from the Treasury. I take it that it must be done—and I say it with respect, for the House of Representatives is entitled to its opinion—upon the principle that hereafter the test of fidelity to the Union in respect of taking money from the Government as to affairs occurring during the rebellion shall be abolished, and that there shall be no more any distinction in respect of claims upon the Treasury growing out of the war of the rebellion between those who stood by their country and those who spent all that they had of power and of money against it. That is an attitude which the House of Representatives has a perfect right to occupy. I neither criticise it nor condemn it. The House of Representatives is an independent body. It is entitled to its opinion, and inasmuch as that appears to be its opinion, we must take it for such as it is. But it does appear to me that before we take this fatal step of sealing up this evidence, we ought to try once more to persuade the members of the House that a fair fidelity to existing law should not compel us to seal up these pregnant fountains out of which has poured so much of security and safety to the Treasury.

Mr. EATON. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. With great pleasure.

Mr. EATON. He speaks of sealing up the evidence. I understand that the evidence is open, that it is labeled, that it is classified. I was about to ask the Senator from Vermont what was the object of this $6,000? The evidence is there, and may be obtained at any time, as I understand, whenever a claim is presented against the Government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President, Connecticut like Vermont is an agricultural State, and my friend may be fond of hunting for a needle in a hay-mow. Without a body of clerks in charge, without a constant system of protection and supervision and arrangement, a system that cannot end until the uses for which the testimony is desired end, it is perfectly impossible to find anything. How are the judges of the Court of Claims to do? Are they to adjourn that court and make an expedition up to the War Department and begin to mouse around to see what they can find? Are the commissioners of southern claims to do the same thing? Are the Committees of Claims of the House of Representatives and the Senate, where millions year by year are determined upon this test of loyalty, to leave their Chambers, and hire a hack or go on foot, and without even lemonade, up to the War Department and see what they can find? Mr. President, in the language of the distinguished Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] "that won't do." If we are in honest earnest that these tests of the law and of public policy are still to be applied, then in honest earnest we must provide the small means necessary to furnish them.

For that reason, without stating others, I shall vote against this report in the hope and in the belief—I trust I may believe it—that when the House of Representatives come to consider the importance of this subject they will do this little thing, when reform is so much in fashion and economy is so much in fashion, to protect the Treasury against the millions of false and fictitious claims that are pressing against it all the time.

Mr. WINDOM. I will detain the Senate a moment, Mr. President, for the purpose of saying that I think perhaps in some of these particulars Senators overestimate the importance of passing these appropriations at this time. It will only be some three or four months until Congress will be in session again, and I will say for one that my reason for agreeing to many of the provisions of this bill was that we could then by deficiency bills supply the necessary funds for the service. I think we shall have a very large deficiency bill at the next session, but there will be less difficulty in passing these appropriations at the next session of Congress than now, and I think it is hardly worth while to defeat this report because of the several little things mentioned by Senators here.

So far as this searching of the rebel archives is concerned, I think it very important; I think the appropriation ought to have been retained; but it is a fact as the Senate knows that we have been searching them for several years and possibly no great damage—although I think it is an improper thing to strike it out—will result between now and next session. I have no doubt that when Congress meets at the next session we can make the appropriation.

So far as the revenue-cutter service is concerned on which my friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] laid a great deal of stress, I will say that there will not be the slightest difficulty in making up the deficiency when we meet next winter. The total appropriation for the revenue-cutter service is $909,530.49 as the Senate passed the bill and the reduction of $25,639.40, while it may affect the service, will not affect it before next winter. The whole bill is framed upon the idea of deficiencies next winter and they can be supplied without any great detriment to the service.

Mr. CONKLING. How much money has been appropriated already for this purpose, I will inquire?

Mr. WINDOM. I cannot answer the question.

Mr. LOGAN. I believe the next session of Congress that will meet in December will be composed of the same members of both Houses as are sitting here now. I should like the Senator to tell me why it is that he has so much confidence that the House of Representatives next winter will appropriate money for the rebel archives or the other propositions mentioned when they refuse to do it now on the ground that it is unnecessary to do it.

Mr. WINDOM. We shall meet next winter under very different circumstances. We shall have passed November, and will be entirely differently situated from what we are now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the question of concurring in this report.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 39, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Barnum, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Boutwell, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Christiancy, Cockrell, Cooper, Cragin, Dawes, Eaton, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Norwood, Paddock, Patterson, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stevenson, Wadleigh, Wallace, West, Whyte, Windom, Withers, and Wright—39.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will resume its session for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap.

The Senate then resumed the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap having adjourned then resumed its

LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes its legislative session.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF JOHN T. KING.

Mr. HOWE. I offer the following resolution, which I ask may be considered at the present time:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate the medical and funeral expenses of John T. King, deceased, who died from injuries received by the recent explosion of gas in the Capitol: Provided, That the bills rendered shall be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Fund of the Senate before they are paid.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I inquire, Mr. President, whether the rules do not require that resolutions of that character shall be referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rules so require.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a very proper resolution, but I think we ought to follow the law of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Vermont to object to unanimous consent for the passage of the resolution now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; the only trouble is that if it passes the Senate by unanimous consent, violating the law of the Senate, the accounting officers of the Treasury may not pay the money.

Mr. HOWE. If we have unanimous consent to consider the resolution, the rule will not trouble it afterward.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands——

Mr. HOWE. Is there any objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it had better be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objects.

Mr. HOWE. Then I ask to have it referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the committee.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 19, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate was ready to proceed upon the impeachment of William W. Belknap and to receive the managers on the part of the House, and that the Senate Chamber was prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

The message also announced that the Senate further insisted on its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. EDMUNDS, and Mr. WITHERS, as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had adopted a concurrent resolution for the printing for the use of the Senate 4,000 copies of the report of the special committee to investigate the late election in Mississippi, with the views of the minority; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1771) to declare forfeited to the United States certain lands granted to the State of Kansas in aid of the construction of railroads by act of Congress approved March 3, 1863.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

The bill (H. R. No. 1427) for the relief of H. P. Jones & Co.; and

The bill (H. R. No. 3855) for the relief of George T. Olmstead, jr.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. JENKS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas it is alleged that the measurement of the distances on the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroads, upon which bonds were issued by the Government to the companies owning said railroads, was hastily and inaccurately made: Therefore,

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Secretary of War be requested to detail a sufficient force from the Engineer Corps of the Army to make a careful and exact survey of the distances of said roads between Omaha and Sacramento, distinguishing between the sections for which bonds were issued to the companies at different rates, exhibiting the number of miles at each rate, designating the point between which the different rates were charged, and report the result of the survey to this House at the commencement of the next session of Congress.

Mr. JENKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF TESTIMONY.

Mr. JENKS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the testimony taken before the Committee on Invalid Pensions under the order of the House be printed and referred back to said committee.

Mr. JENKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3717) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

REDEMPTION OF LANDS.

Mr. YOUNG. I desire to ask unanimous consent to make a statement which shall not exceed five minutes, and then I desire to yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GUNTER] to present a bill which I wish to put upon its passage to have passed at this time.

No objection was made.

Mr. YOUNG. I now yield the floor to the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. GUNTER.]

Mr. GUNTER. I report back from the Committee on Private Land Claims the bill (H. R. No. 3144) to provide for and regulate the manner of redeeming lands sold for non-payment of direct taxes. I ask that the bill be read and put upon its passage. The report of the committee is unanimous in favor of the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all lands, houses, and tenements sold for non-payment of the direct tax due the Government of the United States under and by virtue of an act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, and the various acts subsequent to and amendatory thereof, and which were bought for and in the name of the United States, and the title to which acquired by such purchase still remains vested therein, may be redeemed within two years from and after the passage of this act, by the person or persons, his or her heirs, assigns, or legal representatives, in whom the legal title to such lands, houses, and tenements was vested at the time the same was sold, upon the payment into the Treasury of the United States of the amount of direct tax assessed thereon and all costs incurred by the Government of the United States in assessing said tax and advertising and selling said property, together with 6 per cent. interest thereon from the date of sale: Provided, however, That when any of the persons above named, other than the person or persons in whom the legal title of said property was vested at the time of sale, shall redeem the same as hereinbefore provided for, the benefit of such redemption shall accrue to those who would have been legally entitled to the estate had no such sale ever been had; and the person so redeeming shall acquire no title thereby except such as he may have had or was entitled to have previous to such sale.

SEC. 2. That where any lands, houses, and tenements have been sold for direct taxes, and the title thereto still remains vested in the United States by reason of having purchased the same at such sale, and the legal owners thereof, his heirs, assigns, or legal representatives, shall desire to redeem said property, as hereinbefore provided for, he or they shall make written application to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, accompanied by a description of the particular property in question, and a certified copy from the records of the county or parish in which the same is situated of the title by which it was held at the time of the sale, or if the application to redeem is made by other than the legal owner, then he shall furnish, in addition to the certified copy of the deed as aforesaid, properly authenticated record evidence of his right to redeem under the provisions of this act as heirs, assignee, or legal representative; but if there be no record evidence of such right, then the same may be proven by the affidavits of two witnesses taken before any judicial officer competent to administer oaths under the laws of the United States, or the State or Territory within which the property is situated; and when such application and accompanying papers are received by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, he shall at once furnish to the person making such application a statement of the amount due the United States for the taxes and costs aforesaid upon the land, houses, and tenements proposed to be redeemed.

SEC. 3. That when the legal owner of any land, houses, and tenements, bought and held by the United States as aforesaid, or his heirs, assigns, or legal representatives, shall pay into the Treasury of the United States the amount of taxes and costs due upon the same, as ascertained in accordance with the preceding section, the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to give to such owner, heirs, assignee, or legal representative a certificate that said lands, houses, and tenements have been redeemed; and such certificate of redemption shall operate as a release and quitclaim of all right, title, and interest which the Government of the United States may have acquired by virtue of any proceedings had under the aforesaid act of Congress, approved August 5, 1861, or any act subsequent to or amendatory thereof.

SEC. 4. That in all cases where any lands, houses, and tenements have been redeemed as hereinbefore provided for, and for the recovery of which suit has been brought by the United States in any of the district courts thereof against the owner or occupant thereof, such suit shall be dismissed, upon the payment, by the owner, his heirs, assigns, or legal representatives, to the officers hereinafter enumerated, the following cost of suit, namely: To the clerk of said court, for issuing the writ, $1; for docketing the cause, twenty-five cents; for filing declaration and plea, ten cents each; to the marshal, for serving the writ, $1; to the district attorney, for preparing and filing declaration, $2.50; and no other or further costs and fees shall be charged.

SEC. 5. That in all cases where the legal owner of any lands, houses, and tenements, bought and held by the United States as aforesaid, or his heirs, assigns, or legal representative, shall prove, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, by the testimony of two or more credible witnesses, and a plat and drawing of the property and its boundaries, that the same was inclosed within the lines of any military fortification, held and occupied by the military forces of the United States at the time the direct tax assessed thereon became due and payable, then the said Secretary of the Treasury shall cause the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to give to such owner, his heirs, assigns, or legal representative, a certificate of redemption, without the payment of any part of the tax and costs hereinbefore mentioned, and said certificate shall have the same force and effect as provided for in the third section of this act; and in all cases where suits are pending as aforesaid for the recovery of such property by the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct the same to be dismissed without cost to the defendant.

SEC. 6. That all of the lands, houses, and tenements above described, which are not redeemed as aforesaid within two years from and after the passage of this act, shall be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury for cash, at public auction to the highest bidder, after having advertised the time and place of such sale for a period of thirty days in one or more public newspapers published in the county or parish in which the property is situated.

SEC. 7. That the foregoing provisions of this act shall not apply to any lands now being used as national cemeteries, or upon which public buildings or works have been erected by the Government of the United States; and that all laws and parts of laws heretofore enacted that are in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

During the reading of the bill,

Mr. HALE said: I may as well save time by objecting at this point. This is is a very important bill. Has it been before any committee of the House?

Mr. GUNTER. I will say to the gentleman that it has been before the Committee on Private Land Claims, and has been considered by that committee and unanimously agreed upon.

Mr. HALE. It revolutionizes the whole system established by the act of 1861.

Mr. YOUNG. If the gentleman will allow me a moment I think I can convince him that this bill in no wise conflicts with the act of 1861 or any subsequent act upon the subject, but is a substantial repetition of former acts of Congress providing for the redemption of lands sold for direct taxes; and the only titles which it affects are those which are still vested in the Government by virtue of purchase made under act of 1861 and the act subsequent to and amendatory to the same. It is not intended to interfere with any lands the title to which is held by private individuals.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to hearing the gentleman, but I reserve the right to raise an objection of order.

Mr. YOUNG. The bill only provides, if the gentleman will allow me to explain——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Discussion is not in order. The Clerk has not yet finished reading the bill.

The Clerk resumed, reading the entire bill.

Mr. YOUNG. Now, if the House will bear with me while I explain the bill very briefly, my remarks shall be confined within the limits of five minutes, and I think I can convince gentlemen who are objecting that it is a measure which ought to pass and that there are no objectionable features in it.

Mr. HALE. I do not object to the gentleman continuing his remarks, but I desire to reserve the right to object to the consideration of the bill at this time. It is evident that the bill is too long, too complicated, and too much in detail.

Mr. YOUNG. But if gentlemen will hear my reasons for making it so, I do not think they will urge this objection. For instance, that clause of the bill which refers to lands within the lines of military fortifications was prepared with a view to relieve a large number of people who have been grossly imposed upon. In the city of Memphis, where I reside, several acres of land were inclosed within intrenchments for military fortifications, constructed, I believe, under the direction of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] during the late war, and while he was military commandant of that district. The original owners of some of this land had not redeemed it after it was sold for direct taxes, and subsequently sold out to innocent purchasers who had no knowledge that there was any cloud upon the title. This resulted from the fact that no record of these direct-tax sales was kept at Memphis, but were forwarded to Washington City, and the books of the recorder's office did not show that there had been any such sales. A great many small lots of this land were bought by colored people and the poorer class of whites, who erected small buildings upon them in which they have resided ever since; and they did not even know that the Government set up any claim to it until they were evicted by the United States marshal, by order of the Treasury Department, under the law of 1872.

Another reason why this feature was incorporated in the bill is the fact that in the United States circuit court of North Carolina, and perhaps in other States, it was decided that the Government had no right to impose these direct taxes upon property which was held and occupied for military or other purposes; and that was the view taken by Mr. LAPHAM, a republican member of the Committee upon Private Land Claims and one of the ablest lawyers in this House. It may be objected that these lands should have been redeemed under former acts of Congress providing for the same; but in answer to that objection I have to say that an examination of those laws will disclose the fact that they are so ambiguous in their terms that it will require a cultivated legal mind to comprehend and understand them. Hence it was that I prepared the present bill in terms so plain and explicit that the most ignorant man might readily comprehend them and avail himself of their benefit. That provision of the bill which refers to the costs of court where such costs have been necessitated, was suggested and made necessary by the fact that the regular fees allowed by law, added to the taxes, penalty, and interest would in many cases amount to more than the land was actually worth; and I think surely that the officers of the different courts, and certainly those of my own city, would urge no objection to this clause. I have prepared the bill with great care, and may safely state that no injury can result to the Government or any private individual by its passage, but a very great benefit and advantage would accrue to a large class of poor people that ought to be protected.

Mr. FORT. Does the bill cover any other lands than those now owned by the Government?

Mr. YOUNG. No, sir; it does not. It simply provides that the original owners of all lands sold for direct taxes, and the title to which is still vested in the Government, may redeem the same within two years from the passage of this act, and in no way interferes with any title acquired by private individuals, though it might with great propriety and justice have gone to that extent.

Mr. FORT. Suppose it should be claimed that the whole city of Memphis was included within the lines of military fortifications?

Mr. YOUNG. It would be just as reasonable to suppose that the whole United States was included within breastworks. So far as this objection applies to the city of Memphis I can state that only three or four acres were included within the breastworks or fort erected in the lower part of the city.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. YOUNG. This is a very important matter, not only to my constituency but to many other sections of the Southern States, and I shall be extremely obliged if the House will give unanimous consent for me to continue my remarks for a little while longer.

Mr. HALE. I move that the time of the gentleman from Tennessee be extended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There being no objection, the gentleman from Tennesse will proceed.

Mr. HALE. I wish it understood that while I am entirely willing for the gentleman to be heard fully I reserve my objection of order, with the understanding that I shall have an opportunity for a brief reply.

Mr. YOUNG. I cannot speak from personal knowledge of any section of the country except my own, but I am sure the House will believe me when I give the assurance that I have presented facts as they exist in the district which I represent, and I have the assurance that a similar state of facts exists in almost every Southern State. I would not insist so earnestly upon the passage of the bill at this time were it not for the reason that by so doing the infliction of further injury may be prevented. If it is not passed now, in consequence of the probability of an early adjournment it is not probable that I shall be able to secure a vote upon it at all.

Mr. CONGER. Although the bill does not exclude lots of land used as cemeteries, does it not exclude property which has been taken and on which these cemeteries have been placed?

Mr. YOUNG. No, sir; the bill expressly excludes such lots of land as are now held and used by the Government for any public purpose.

Mr. CONGER. Those for forts?

Mr. YOUNG. Not only forts, but that used for cemeteries, churches, school-houses, and every other public purpose. The bill is so explicit in this particular that no difficulty could possibly arise upon it.

Mr. CONGER. Why does not the gentleman bring in a bill to meet the particular case that he is familiar with? Upon his statement, I have no doubt the House will act upon it favorably.

Mr. YOUNG. The bill does cover my particular case and all other cases of a similar kind.

Mr. CONGER. I mean a bill to cover the facts as they exist in that locality and none other.

Mr. YOUNG. The bill makes provision, and properly so, I think, for all cases of a like kind in the United States. If they are not of this character they are of course not included, and every other locality is entitled to the same benefits which I ask for the city of Memphis.

Mr. CONGER. It is because of its generality that I must object to the bill. The gentleman might have a bill passed for his own case.

Mr. YOUNG. I would not like to ask this House to pass a bill for my particular section alone when other localities are equally interested and have as strong demands upon Congress for legislation to relieve them of the same burden of which I complain. It has already been intimated that I have obtained too much legislation for my own State, and that Congress has already dealt more liberally with me than with some others.

Mr. HURLBUT. I do not think you can carry this bill.

Mr. YOUNG. Possibly not, under the circumstances which surround me, when the objection of one member can defeat the bill; but in my judgment the bill should pass without the opposition of any member. Under the provisions of this bill no possible injury could result to the Government from its passage. It provides that all which the Government claims as due shall be paid before any certificate of redemption shall issue.

Mr. CONGER. But there may be some instances where innocent purchasers under the Government may have erected houses upon the lots, under the impression that they were obtaining good titles.

Mr. YOUNG. It is in some measure the object of this bill to protect innocent purchasers, and as I have before stated, there is no purchaser that can possibly be affected by it except the Government, as it is not sought, as before remarked to interfere with any titles other than those held by the Government. The innocent purchasers whom I desire to protect are those who through their ignorance, and by suppression of the facts were induced to buy the land which had already been sold for direct taxes and bought by the Government. Those poor people have erected small buildings upon the different lots purchased which are valuable to them but worthless to the Government. By the provisions of this bill the Government would receive more money than by a rigorous enforcement of the law as it now stands. This bill has been shown to the former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Bristow, and to the late Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Pratt, neither one of whom, as far as I am advised, urged any objection to its passage, and to me they expressed their entire approval of it. I have a letter from one of these gentlemen upon the subject, but have not got it at hand now. At my written request, however, further proceedings in the courts have been suspended until Congress has taken action upon this measure, and should it fail to do it at the present session these proceedings will be continued, and numbers of poor people will be turned out of their homes.

I am almost daily in receipt of letters from persons at my home urging me to press the passage of this measure at as early a day as possible. It will be observed that the bill was reported nearly three months ago, and I have been constantly endeavoring nearly every day since that time to bring it to the attention of the House, but various circumstances have prevented me from doing so. The bill was given in charge by the committee to the late Mr. Parsons, but in consequence of his illness and subsequent death it was not presented to the House by him; and since that time the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. GUNTER,] has taken it in charge himself, and both he and I have used our utmost exertions to obtain an opportunity to present it, but have not been able to do so till this morning. Every member of the House must see that from the press of business which will occupy the time from now until the adjournment it will be almost hopeless to get it before the House again and have it properly considered.

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. YOUNG. Certainly. I shall be glad to furnish all the information upon the subject I can, and to explain the bill as fully as possible in the little time I have the floor.

Mr. FORT. Is it not a fact that the bill provides that whenever the property is within the lines of the military fortifications—not within the fortifications, but within the lines of the fortifications—and occupied by military forces it is included within the provisions of the bill?

Mr. YOUNG. The terms "military fortifications" and "military occupancy" used in the bill refers to the period of the war. If they referred to the present time that section of the bill which applies to property held and used for Government or public purposes would of course protect all property used for any public purpose, such as cemeteries, forts, school building, &c. But rather than have the bill defeated I am willing that this provision should be stricken out, though I think it should pass with it in it.

Mr. FORT. That would render the bill less objectionable, and with that alteration I do not think I should oppose it.

Mr. HALE. This is too important a bill to be hastily passed, and I do not think the gentleman from Tennessee ought to insist upon it now when there is so little time to discuss it.

Mr. YOUNG. I have already given the reasons for the delay, which I think should satisfy the gentleman that it has been no fault of mine. But I have also stated the reasons why I insist so earnestly upon its passage now.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The extension of time allowed the gentleman from Tennessee has expired, and there being objection, the bill is not before the House.

Mr. YOUNG. Then I ask to withdraw it from further consideration for the present.

Mr. HALE. It seems to me that some temporary remedy might be adopted until the matter can be more fully considered.

Mr. YOUNG. That may be possible, and if I find that I cannot secure the passage of the bill during the present session I may resort to it.

Mr. FORT. With that section stricken from the bill I would have no objection to it.

Mr. HALE. I reserved my objection to this bill until it could be explained. I am now obliged to say that I must insist upon that objection for these reasons: If I thought the bill in its scope would apply only to the local case of Memphis, which has been referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. YOUNG,] who has stated the facts of that local case, I might withdraw my objection. But the bill is one of far more serious importance. It revolutionizes the Government titles gained under the direct-tax act, ordinarily so called, of 1861. The bill ought to be objected to for the very reason which is urged by the gentleman from Tennessee, that this is so late a day in the session. It is a serious question whether in regard to an act embodied in the pages of the United States Statutes of that year, an act that courts have passed upon time and time again since, we should now, in the hurry of unanimous consent and with five or ten minutes debate on each side, pass a bill which will revolutionize all the titles gained under that act. For these reasons I must insist upon my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill is not before the House.

UNAPPROPRIATED PUBLIC LANDS IN OHIO.

Mr. WALLING. I ask unanimous consent to report back, with amendments, from the Committee on Public Lands for consideration at this time the bill (H. R. No. 3158) to grant to the State of Ohio the unsold and unappropriated public lands remaining in that State, and to provide for the safe-keeping of the records relating to lands heretofore disposed of within said State.

The bill was read.

Mr. HURLBUT. I object to the consideration of the bill at this time, because it should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WALLING. Is it subject to that point of order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is unquestionably.

Mr. WALLING. Then I withdraw the bill.

FORFEITURE OF RAILROAD LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. GOODIN. I rise to submit a privileged report from a conference committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1771) to declare forfeited to the United States certain lands granted to the State of Kansas in aid of the construction of railroads by act of Congress approved March 3, 1863, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate do recede from their third amendment to said bill.

JOHN R. GOODIN,
JAMES W. McDILL,
BENONI S. FULLER,
Managers on the part of the House.

JOHN J. INGALLS,
P. W. HITCHCOCK,
WM. W. EATON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. GOODIN. Mr. Speaker, a gentleman on my left desires an explanation of this report. The object of the bill, which was first passed by the House, was to declare forfeited certain lands granted by acts of Congress to the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad Company, in Kansas; and it provided that upon the restoration of those lands to market, the railroad company having failed to comply with the requirements of the law making the grant, the lands should be opened to entry under the provisions of the homestead and pre-emption laws. The bill went to the Senate, where it was changed so as to permit the entry of these lands under the existing laws of the United States, which would authorize private entry of the lands as well as entry under the provisions of the homestead and pre-emption laws. Upon my motion the House non-concurred in that amendment of the Senate. The Senate insisted upon the amendment. In the committee of conference which met yesterday, the Senate agreed to recede from that amendment, leaving the bill as originally introduced by me and passed by the House.

The report was adopted.

Mr. GOODIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LANDS LOCATED WITH MILITARY WARRANTS.

Mr. GOODIN, by unanimous consent, submitted a report of the Committee on Public Lands on the bill (H. R. No. 600) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain and certify the amount of land located with military warrants in the States described therein, and for other purposes; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

EXPENDITURES IN THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask unanimous consent to submit for adoption at this time the following resolution:

Resolved, That the testimony and the evidence taken before the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. PAGE. I object. I do not object to the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Printing, but to its adoption now.

Mr. CLYMER. Will the gentleman allow me a word of explanation? In May last an order was made to print this same evidence for the use of the committee. It has been printed and is in type. Unless this order be made to-day it will be distributed, and thus the Government will be subjected to a large additional cost.

Mr. MacDOUGALL. If it has been printed once, why does the gentleman want it printed again?

Mr. CLYMER. I beg the gentleman from California not to press his objection.

Mr. PAGE. I think the resolution ought to go to the Committee on Printing, that they may decide whether additional copies are necessary. I do not think the type will be distributed for a day or two.

Mr. CLYMER. That is my fear.

Mr. PAGE. I object.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask, then, that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing.

There being no objection, the resolution was so referred.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAND. There are some committees that have not been called for three months. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour begins at two minutes before one o'clock, and the call rests with the Committee on Naval Affairs.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. MORRISON. I rise to make a privileged report. I am directed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill (H. R. No. 3926) to amend the laws relating to internal revenue.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. MORRISON. I ask that this bill be printed and made a special order for next Saturday immediately after the reading of the Journal, and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. CONGER. I reserve all points of order on that bill.

Mr. MORRISON. There are no points of order about it.

SIOUX CITY, BLACK HILLS AND PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. At the expiration of the morning hour yesterday the bill (H. R. No. 3000) incorporating the Sioux City, Black Hills and Pacific Railroad Company was reported from the Committee on Railways and Canals by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. JONES,] and its reading was unfinished. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. SAVAGE. This bill is subject to the point of order I reserved yesterday.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. SAVAGE. I make the point of order that this bill must have its consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as it makes a grant of the public lands to this company.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If that statement is correct the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SAVAGE. I will refer to the language of the bill to which the point of order lies. It enacts that the provisions of an act entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands," approved March 3, 1875, are hereby extended and made applicable to this company. That entitles railroads passing through the Territories to a grant of two hundred feet of public land.

Mr. DAVY. This bill is of too great importance to be rushed through the House without being properly considered, and therefore I move it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I do not propose to discuss this bill at any length, and am not particularly interested in it. I presume the Representatives upon this floor from Oregon and intermediate Territories are.

Mr. SAVAGE. Was not my point of order sustained by the Chair?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is hearing the chairman of the Committee on Railways and Canals on the point of order.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. What is the point of order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is that the bill appropriates the public land of the United States, inasmuch as it gives the right of way through a portion of it under a provision of a certain act which has been read. That is undoubtedly the case in the last section of the bill as read by the gentleman from Ohio, and it must necessarily go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to receive its first consideration. And it is so referred.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I cannot hear distinctly what the Chair states, and do not know what is his decision.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is unquestionably liable to the point of order made by the gentleman from Ohio, and it must be considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SPRINGER. The point of order is this: it appropriates public land by giving the right of way over a certain portion of the public land. That is appropriation of the public land to that extent; and to appropriate one acre or one foot to this railroad company makes the bill liable to the point of order. The point being made it must necessarily go the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. That is the point of order the Speaker has decided.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

LAKE MICHIGAN AND SOUTHEAST ATLANTIC RAILROAD.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Railways and Canals, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 3758) chartering a passenger and freight railway from Lake Michigan to the Southeast Atlantic seaboard, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. EDEN. I reserve all points of order upon that bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That unquestionably is the gentleman's right.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. EDEN. I make the point of order that it should be first considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On what ground?

Mr. EDEN. Upon the ground that the general railroad law which provides the right of way through the public lands of the United States shall be granted to any railroad company duly organized under the laws of any State or Territory, except the District of Columbia, or by the Congress of the United States, which shall have filed with the Secretary of the Interior——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is utterly impossible for the gentleman to be heard, and the Chair would therefore request that the law be sent up to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the right of way through the public lands of the United States is hereby granted to any railroad company duly organized under the laws of any State or Territory, except the District of Columbia, or by the Congress of the United States, which shall have filed with the Secretary of the Interior a copy of its articles of incorporation and due proofs of its organization under the same, to the extent of one hundred feet on each side of the central line of said road. Also the right to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of said road all material, earth, stone, and timber necessary for the construction of said road. Also ground adjacent to such right of way for station-buildings, depots, machine-shops, side-tracks, turn-outs, and water stations, not to exceed in the main twenty acres for each station, to the extent of one station for each ten miles of its road.

Mr. EDEN. That act was approved March 3, 1875. In connection with that I wish to call the attention of the Chair to a clause in the first section of the bill:

And said company is hereby vested under the laws of the United States with all the privileges, powers, duties, obligations, and rights necessary and usual for the purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the seventeenth section of the bill as also presenting the question whether the surrender by the Government of the right of property is a grant of franchise. It is a question also whether the present rule of the House in regard to bills granting property, as well as making appropriations of money, would extend to franchise alone, as the right to cross a stream subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. The question has never been before the House before. I have never known it to be raised under the present rule. But here is a franchise granted; and that franchise is certainly to be regarded as property and seems to me within the meaning of the rule.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Before the decision of the Chair is given on those points of order, I desire to say that I do not think the bill is subject to any such points of order as have been made. The road, if ever built, will not run through any of the public lands of the United States. But I am willing that the bill should go to the Committee of the Whole for the reason which I shall state, and I hope I may be allowed to say a word or two in explanation.

The committee was not entirely agreed upon reporting this bill. There was a majority, however, in its favor. I consider this a very important enterprise. And, as I have said before on this floor, I will briefly repeat that I do not doubt the power of the General Government to grant corporations and especially railroad corporations. In that opinion I am supported by the greatest lawyers and judges this country has ever produced and by the action of every Congress of the United States almost from the very first down to the present.

I am in favor of all these railroad enterprises in the interest of commerce and in the interst of cheap transportation. Why, sir, our Railroad Committee is burdened with petitions from States and cities, coming especially from the large commercial centers, asking our committee to report some bill, or that the Congress of the United States shall enact some law for the furtherance of cheap transportation, so that the people, the producers and the consumers, shall be protected against the immense combinations and frauds of railroad companies.

I regard this bill in the interest of commerce and in the interest of cheap transportation.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I rise to a question of order. I ask the Chair, is debate in order?

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I am proceeding by common consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Although it is proposed that this company shall be chartered by the Congress of the United States——

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman is not discussing the point of order but the merits of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky himself desires that the bill shall take a reference to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPRINGER. I thought a point of order was pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky is entitled to the floor on the question of referring the bill to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I will not occupy more than three minutes. I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that although this company is proposed to be chartered by the Congress of the United States, yet it is subject to the consent and the laws of every State through which the road may pass. As a State-rights man I would not report a bill except under such provisions and conditions. But, sir, as I perceive that it is not the disposition of the House, especially on this side of it, to consider these railroad measures at this session, and as there is some difference of opinion, whether as to principle or policy I can hardly say, and as I desire the bill to be fully discussed, I am perfectly willing that it shall go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDEN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to ask him whether as a State-rights man he considers the Congress of the United States has power to authorize municipal corporations in the States to subscribe to the capital stock of this company?

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I think the Congress of the United States has a perfect right to grant any corporation within the powers of the Constitution, especially for the public benefit. And Chief Justice Marshall thought the same thing. And I advise the gentleman if he wants to see good constitutional and State-rights doctrine to read Chief Justice Marshall's decision in the case of McCulloch against The State of Maryland.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is the point of order withdrawn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the gentleman from Kentucky himself moves to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it is not necessary for the Chair to give a decision on the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to inquire and report whether Congress has the power to create such corporations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question must first be put on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SAVAGE. I desire to say one word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The remarks of the gentleman can only be on the question of reference. The merits of the bill are not before the House.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I do not desire that the merits of the bill shall be discussed now.

Mr. SAVAGE. I have only a word to say in reply to what the gentleman from Kentucky has said. He has intimated that the opposition to some of these bills, or all of them, is made to them as a question of policy, and that at the next session those who are opposing these bills will perhaps favor them. All I have to say in reply to that is that the gentlemen who are opposing this bill, that I at least have any knowledge of, and so far as I am concerned myself, and the other members of the minority of the committee, ground the opposition to the bill on the belief that it is improper, unconstitutional, and in every sense of the word a violation of democratic doctrine.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I concede that the gentleman opposes the bill, as he thinks, on principle.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This discussion is not in order. The question is on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAVAGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FRUIT BRANDY.

Mr. HANCOCK. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 3925) relating to the production of fruit brandy, and to punish frauds connected with the same, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

GOLD AND SILVER MINES.

Mr. BLAND. I report from the Committee on Mines and Mining the bill (H. R. No. 3635) to utilize the product of gold and silver mines, and for other purposes, with amendments.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That coin-notes of the denomination of $50, and multiples thereof up to $10,000, may, in the mode hereinafter provided, be paid by the several mints and assay offices at San Francisco, Carson City, Philadelphia, and New York, for the net value of gold and silver bullion deposited thereat; and of the bullion thus received not less than 75 per cent. in coin or fine bars shall at all times be kept on hand for redemption of the coin-notes, gold for gold, and silver for silver. The gold deposited shall be computed at its coining value, and silver at the rate of 412.8 grains standard silver to the dollar, less the lawful mint charges, and such charge for transportation from the several assay offices to the mints for coinage, and from the latter to the assistant treasuries respectively at which the coin-notes shall be payable.

SEC. 2. That for bullion deposited at the mints of San Francisco and Carson the coin-notes issued shall be redeemable on demand at the assistant treasury at San Francisco; and for bullion deposited at the Philadelphia Mint and assay office at New York the notes shall be redeemed at the assistant treasury at New York.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time cause coin and fine mint-bars (stamped) to be transferred from the mint to the assistant treasuries at San Francisco and New York in such amounts as may be necessary for the redemption of the coin-notes.

SEC. 4. That the coin-notes issued under the provisions of this act shall be receivable without limit for all dues to the United States; and the coin mentioned in this act shall be a legal tender for all debts of the United States, public and private, not specified to be paid in gold coin.

SEC. 5. That the gold-coin notes issued under this act shall be redeemed on presentation in gold coin or fine bars, and silver in silver dollars or fine bars.

SEC. 6. That the coin notes authorized by this act to be issued shall be prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be transferred to the mints and assay offices named in this act as a part of the bullion fund, and from which fund deposits shall be paid for in coin or coin notes at the option of the depositor.

SEC. 7. That the fine gold and silver bars by this act authorized to be issued shall bear the mint stamp of fineness, weight, and value, and the value of the gold bars shall be computed according to their coining rate and the silver bars at their coining value in dollars.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe the necessary regulations for carrying into effect the provisions of this act.

The amendments were read, as follows:

At the end of line 17, section 1, add the following:

And there shall be coined at the mints of the United States the silver dollar hereinbefore mentioned.

In line 4, section 4, strike out the words "of the United States."

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have the fourth section of that bill read again.

The Clerk again read the fourth section, as proposed to be amended.

Mr. BLAND. This is a bill which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. OLIVER. I desire to raise the point of order upon this bill that it must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It creates an obligation on the part of the Government of the United States to pay some money.

Mr. BANKS. There is no appropriation provided for in the bill and it does not follow that any expense would be incurred.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. It is very evident from the terms of the bill that it will occasion additional expenses to the Government in regard to the making of coin notes.

Mr. BANKS. Whenever an appropriation is presented the gentleman is secure when the time comes.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. It should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union under the rule.

Mr. BANKS. O, there is no such rule as that.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will read to the gentleman the rule upon this subject.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. OLIVER. I desire to submit some remarks on the point of order.

Mr. BLAND. I will hear the gentleman first and then I will close myself.

Mr. OLIVER. This bill proposes to create an obligation on the part of the Government of the United States by the issue of coin notes, an obligation which we must meet.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I would inquire of the Chair if the morning hour has not expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me to read the rule before he insists upon the close of the morning hour?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I must insist on the regular order.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to say that to-morrow morning after the reading of the Journal I shall call for the regular order, so that the morning hour shall commence, and I shall press this bill to its passage.

ALABAMA CLAIMS.

Mr. LORD. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 983) to extend the duration of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims be taken from the Speaker's table and passed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the existence of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, created by the act entitled "An act for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain," be, and the same is hereby, continued and extended to the 1st day of November next, with the same effect and no other as if said last-named day had been named in said act for the termination of the powers of said court; and said act is hereby continued in force during said period.

SEC. 2. That the powers of the clerk of said court are hereby extended for an additional period not to exceed two months from and after the termination of the existence of the court, for the purpose of closing his accounts, depositing the records, documents, and all other papers in the possession of the court or its officers in the office of the Secretary of State, as provided in said act; and all disbursements made by him during this period shall be under the direction of the Secretary of State.

No objection being made, the bill was read a first and second time, ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—C. W. BUTTZ VS. E. W. M. MACKEY.

Mr. THOMPSON. On behalf of the Committee of Elections I call up the report of that committee in the contested-election case of C. W. Buttz vs. E. W. M. Mackey from the second congressional district of South Carolina, and I call for the reading of the resolution reported by the committee.

The Clerk read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That neither C. W. Buttz nor E. W. M. Mackey was lawfully elected to the Forty-fourth Congress from the second congressional district of South Carolina, nor is either of them entitled to a seat in said Congress.

Mr. THOMPSON. I yield to the contestee, [Mr. MACKEY.]

Mr. MACKEY, of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I am well aware how useless it is in this House to argue against the report of a committee, and more particularly against the report of the Committee of Elections in a contested-election case. The judgment of the committee in contested-election cases is invariably and naturally accepted by a large majority of members as conclusive, without any attempt upon their part to investigate the matter for themselves. Notwithstanding these facts I cannot allow the report in this case to go upon record uncontradicted. I therefore ask the patient attention of the House to what I am about to say, in which I shall endeavor to be as brief as possible.

The adoption of the report of the committee scarcely affects me personally. Nowhere in that report am I charged with participation or even with knowledge of the frauds which, in the opinion of the committee, vitiate the election in Charleston, and if a new election is ordered the same constituency will, I believe, return me here, if I so desire, in vindication of the fairness and honesty of their original choice. To that judgment I am willing to be referred. Time will show whether my confidence is misplaced or presumptuous.

COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

But the report of the committee is so extraordinary, so extravagant a libel upon the people of Charleston, that I feel bound to protest against the truth of its conclusions in defense of the character of a community in which I was born and have always lived, and by whose votes, irrespective of party, I was elected to this Congress.

From the report of the committee and the evidence in the case it appears that Mr. Buttz charged bribery, repetition, and violence on the part of my supporters in certain counties. Of these charges made in his protest some were abandoned, others sustained by evidence which the committee themselves have not deemed worthy of notice or which they have stricken out as illegal. The committee in their report confine their attention and rest their conclusions entirely upon the character of the vote of the city of Charleston; and it appears that the evidence upon which the committee rely is entirely ex parte, and that their conclusions result from the fact that the uncontradicted ex parte testimony showed not my participation in the illegalities alleged; but, in the language of the report—

The evidence clearly shows that most gross frauds were perpetrated at the voting-precincts in the city of Charleston, through repeating, bribery, intimidation, and violence, and that the same were carried on under such circumstances as to satisfy the committee that they must have been done with the knowledge and assent of the officers of the election.

In support of this charge the committee cite in full the testimony of Rafferty, Foster, Rivers, Gurney, Bonum, and Thompson, and say:

The whole evidence, of which the above is a fair specimen, clearly shows the character of the election in the city of Charleston, and must, we think, satisfy the House that such an election ought not to be sanctioned or tolerated. To allow the returns from such voting-precincts to be canvassed is to encourage fraud and corruption, and your committee have unanimously come to the conclusion that the whole vote of the city of Charleston must be rejected, as fraud was committed by, or assented to by, the managers of the election as well as by other parties, and it is impossible to ascertain how many legal votes were cast.

ELECTION OFFICERS.

This charge is explicit. They declare that the frauds were committed "with the knowledge and assent" of the managers and officers of election.

Now, it is not only a matter of general notoriety, but it appears on the record and is confirmed by the governor's proclamation, that at this election each party had its representation at the management of the polls. One manager represented the independent republican party, another the democrats, and a third the regular republican party. The ticket on which Mr. Buttz was a candidate was known as the regular republican ticket. The ticket on which I ran was known as the independent republican ticket. The democrats supported the independent republican ticket. As it is impossible to suppose that the contestant attempted to prove or that the committee mean to assert that the managers in Mr. Buttz's interest conspired to defeat him, this charge is simply a charge against the integrity of the other managers, namely, the democratic and independent republican. The conclusion thus reached by the committee is that at the first and only opportunity offered to the democrats of Charleston to take their places on the board of managers and contribute to secure a just and honest election they deliberately took advantage of it to perpetrate a fraud so unblushing and shameless that a democratic committee of this House are forced to denounce their conduct and proclaim their infamy. While as a republican I might, as a matter of partisan interest, accept such a verdict from such authority, yet, as a Representative of the city of Charleston, elected by both democratic and republican votes, I pronounce such a charge a foul stigma upon the well-established character of some of the very best citizens of that community, who much against their wishes and with genuine reluctance accepted the position on that occasion of managers of election, and who discharged a delicate and difficult duty with eminent tact and fairness.
